THE NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

Notes and Clippings.

A FRENCHMAN'S estimate of humanity in 1886 foots up "a lot of fools who spend most of their time and money in making iron balls to go through steel plates and in making steel plates to keep out iron balls."

A DAILY paper avers that a sheet of ordinary paper warmed in front of a fire will, in a dark place, giv a very decided electric spark upon the application of the knuckle, with a crackling sound. On placing a sheet of gold leaf between two sheets of paper thus electrified, and passing a pencil point over them in a zigzag course, a luminous flash quite strong will appear.

MISS ANNA BALLARD, well known among journalists in this city as the only female member of the Press Club, writes from Colombo, Ceylon, that the Salvation Army has attacked the island, but that the soldiers are regarded there with little favor. The nativs havn't the least idea what they are up to, and think that their peculiar antics and goings-on are only amusing illustrations of the peculiarities of the English people.

IF Christ had lived to-day and performed the miracle of making wine, as he did at Cana of Galilee, the officers of the internal revenue would hav arrested him, and after carting him all over the state for trial before the United States court, then he would hav been sent to the Albany Penitentiary for one year and a fine of five hundred dollars and costs. If old Noah had lived in these days he would hav been arrested for being drunk, and sent to jail to break stone for ten days at least.—Star of Liberty.

WHEN the unabridged edition of Webster's dictionary first appeared (without a definition of the word unabridged), that great scholar, Caleb Cushing, wrote a criticism on the stupendous work, saying that, for its size, it had as few errors as could be expected. This puzzled the editors, who asked an explanation of Mr. Cushing on the subject of these errors. In reply Mr. Cushing marked 5,000 mistakes in the volume which had been sent to him, and sent it back.

NEW YORK has a fair thirst. It consumes six million barrels of lager beer a year, or at the rate of about five barrels for each man, woman, and child. Considering the large number of Prohibitionists, other total abstinence people, and children not of drinking age, a good many citizens must drink a good many kegs in the course of a year. That's all right, provided the beer is good and they do not exceed their limit. We suspect, however, that the vast crowds of strangers who visit the town consume a million or two kegs. The out-of-town man in the metropolis is apt to stay himself with flagons, especially if he comes from a Prohibition state.—New York Sun.

THE business men of Auburn, N. Y., are very enthusiastic over Revivalist Moody's recent meetings in that city. This does not mean that the business men are interested in religion, but that the people drawn to Auburn by the meetings make business livelier. "One of them is reported as saying: 'I will giv $10, and my partner will do the same, I know, to keep these meetings up a week longer. Mr. Moody draws to the town people who hav money to spend. They come into our store with their Auburn friends, see some of our fine goods, and perhaps goods they hav not seen at home, and we catch them for anywhere from $5 to $100.'" The Auburn business man has evidently learned all that the scriptures hav to teach on strangers and taking them in.

CARDINAL TACHEREAU, of Quebec, has prohibited Catholics from attending the meetings of the Salvation Army, and instructed them to throw the tracts and hymn-books distributed by the Salvationists in the fire. The cardinal has a clear conception of the appropriateness of things in this regard. The tracts and hymn-books of the Salvation Army are mischievous documents, and are fit for nothing better than kindling material. Still they are not so mischievous as that dogma of the Catholic church which permits a priest or cardinal to peremptorily order what disposition others shall make of reading matter that falls into their hands.

A NEW paper out West has started under difficulties. It tells its own story as follows: "We begin the publication of the Roccay Mountain Cyclone with some phew diphphiculties in the way. The type phounders phrom whom we bought our outphit phor this printing ophphice phailed to supply us with any ephs or cays, and it will be phour or phive weex bephore we can get any. The mistaque was not phound out till a day or two ago. We hav ordered the missing letters, and will hav to get along without them till they come. We don't lique the loox ov this variety ov spelling any better than our readers, but mistax will happen in the best regulated phamilies, and iph the ph's and c's and x's and q's hold out we shall ceep (sound the c hard) the Cyclone whirling aphter a phashion till the sorts arrive. It is no joque to us—it's a serious aphphair."

CHESTER BURROUGHS, of Williamsburgh, found eleven-year-old Ida Kaufman wandering in the streets on Christmas night. He took her home, and then went to the police station and told her story as follows: "Her parents are both dead. After their death her Sunday-school teacher took her to her home. She kept her for a time, but she had occasion to use all the rooms in her house, and so the other day she told the child she must go and find a home for herself. From what I can ascertain from her I think she attended Sunday-school in one of the churches in Ainslie street." The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will look after that Sunday-school teacher.

SAYS a dispatch from Rome: "The pope, receiving Christmas congratulations from the College of Cardinals, spoke at some length of the position of the church in Italy. He protested against the anti-clerical movement, and said the holy see was now despoiled of the last remnants of its patrimony. The only liberty left to him was that held by the Roman pontiffs in the earliest ages. The Italian government, he declared, had assisted the laity in unduly interfering with the administration of the church, had expelled religious bodies, and had tolerated an organized hostility against the Vatican. As the head of the church he must continue to protest against the position in which he is placed." The pope should come to America, and if he finds rents are too high in New York, he could go West, get married, and grow up with the country. His mind needs the broadening influence of travel.

The New God.*

It is an open secret that man has always made his gods. If they have not suited him, it is his fault. He has had the power to consult his own taste—like the artist who paints the picture or carves the statue. If the gods have been bad, it is because man, the maker, has been a bungler. He has not made good use of his material.

The gods exist in and through man, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes. If there were no humanity there would be no divinity. Disturb certain molecules in man's brain, and the deity is at once dethroned. In him—that is, in man—"we live and move and have our being," must be the honest confession of every God. If one must worship his maker, then innumerable divinities must hymn their peans to man. When humanity passes from the theater of universal action, then every heavenly power will "shuffle off its mortal coil." When the wave, man, subsides into the vast ocean of being, then its sparkling crest that caught the many-colored rays, and for a moment flashed above the wave most resplendent of all, that also subsides, for its glittering movement was but a part of the mighty billow itself.

It has seemed in the history of the world as if man wanted to deceive himself with his own splendid creations. He has delighted in his gods, and as Saturn was overcome by his child, so man has been overcome and ruled by the offspring of his brain. He has made the mechanism of his heart a commanding voice from heaven. Perhaps this is necessary, as the doll is necessary to the pleasure of the little girl. It may be a radical weakness. Perhaps it is an art element, a poetic demand. Perhaps man needs this halo, this phosphorescence of his mind, to give an added charm to existence. We all like to see the moon over our right shoulder, we like to have the cards run in happy fashion, we like to be told that the stars make fortune for our way, and that the lines of our hand betoken good fates and pleasant paths. We like to feel that the universe is our friend; that the sun loves us and because he loves us gives the blessed light; that nature is interested in our welfare, and the winds of summer blow expressly for our benefit, and the seas roll softly in order that our ships may come to land. Every man has his pet superstition. Fate is so hard, things are so cruel, and life so sorrowful that man asserts a supreme beneficence with a kind of despairing faith. As Rousseau pathetically says, "If there were no God man would have to make one." It is for this very reason, that there is no God—that is, no sovereign goodness—that man makes a God, because if man were not unhappy he would not manufacture deities to console him in the midst of his innumerable troubles. Every God that man has made has been at heart a representation of the tragedy of life. It is man's protest against the awfulness of fate. In old times the priest and the medicine-man were one and the same. Their function is similar—so long as there is disease there must be medicine, and so long as there is suffering there must be theology. The perfectly happy man will be thoroughly Atheistic. He will need no gods. With the last form of suffering will vanish the last form of deity. The more gods a man has, the more woes he has to combat. The gods symbolize catastrophe by what Stephen Pearl Andrews would call a "terminal conversion of opposites." A belief in an infinite God is an assertion of infinite unhappiness in the universe. The more God, the more evil, is an invariable coördination. The man who doesn't want a God is the man who has no sins to atone for, and no pains to assuage. Only when one is sick does he send for the doctor, and only when mankind is in trouble does it resort to theology. As Ingersoll says, the best way to make men believe in gods is to increase the number of earthquakes and cyclones. If there was an earthquake every day, the churches would be thronged. Financial disasters always enlarged the prayer-meetings. When a man can't pay his note, he is ready to become a Christian. The way to produce big revivals is by a depression of trade. When the markets are lively the churches are dull, and when the markets are dull the churches are flourishing. Thorough happiness and business prosperity are the greatest of Infidels.

If there really were a God, there would be no belief in God. The fact that there is a belief in God is proof positive that there is no such being, and the more universal that belief the stronger the demonstration of Atheism. Universal belief in God has been used by theologians as an evidence that there is a God. A little deep consideration, however, will show that this universality is evidence to the exact contrary, for, as I have said before, if men were perfectly happy they would not believe in a God. There would be no need of it; they would be so prosperous in action that belief would have no value. Faith would cease, and life would be all in all. Every Christian—every religionist who believes in a God—always affirms that he does it for the sake of happiness. He must do it, or he would be miserable. This is the supreme argument of orthodoxy. Therefore, if in the nature of things one were supremely happy, he would not have the slightest motive for believing in God, and since no one acts without motive, he would not believe in God. So I say if there were a God—that is, a real God, a real, infinite, and eternal goodness—there would be no conscious belief in him. The fact of his existence would to every perfectly happy mind be an unconscious state. It could not be otherwise, and Atheism would be the natural result. The conscious belief could only come with the existence of evil, but the existence of evil is inconsistent with the existence of a good God. No good God out of vanity would afflict men in order that they might know he was in existence. God could only be introduced to the acquaintance of humanity by the devil himself, and no self-respecting deity would resort to such a surety. Therefore God by his very goodness is forever precluded from endeavoring to convince men of his actual being. He cannot do this except by doing something wrong, and then he is no longer God, but Satan. Therefore, if there were a God—infinite goodness—there could not by any possibility be a conscious belief in him. Therefore, if there is a conscious belief in God, this belief is a demonstration that there is no God; for the belief arises out of man's perception of his misery and as a relief from it. Theism is simply an effort after happiness, and in its very nature disproves the thing believed in.

To illustrate: Is it not a physiological fact that if a man is perfectly healthful he is unconscious of the fact? The moment knowledge comes, disease comes, for knowledge comes not by harmony, but by disturbance. When one is conscious of digesting his food, he has incipient dyspepsia. When one consciously says, "I am healthful," that very moment he is beginning to be unhealthful, for if he were absolutely healthful he would not think of saying anything about it. Carlyle says that perfect health as one supreme characteristic includes perfect unmindfulness of it. The first flash of recognition announces a molecular disarrangement.

Intensity of life always flows to unconsciousness of life. The highest life, as the Buddhists say, is the Nirvana, the unconscious life. The highest poetry is that which knows not itself. The greatest poet, Shakspere, was so thoroughly unconscious of what he himself was that his highest ambition was to be a successful business man, and own a little property. If he had been as ambitious as a poet as he was as stage manager, he would not have written his great dramas. The element of unconsciousness was absolutely necessary to enable him to be the wonder that he was. Self-knowledge would have destroyed the transcendency of his genius. When a poet thinks himself a poet, he ceases to be a poet. When he says to himself, "I am writing something good," we may be quite sure he is writing something bad. When an actor thinks to himself, "I am acting well," the charm is broken, and perfection ceases. Absolute abandon is what makes the flower of perfection. When the woman stands before the glass and says, "I am beautiful," then she ceases to be perfectly beautiful. The beautiful woman must not recognize her own charms. When she herself beholds them, they begin to vanish. The mirror is the greatest foe of beauty. It is worse than old age. It makes too many reflections. It is a glass too much, and intoxicates only to destroy.

Thus in all life—in art, beauty, healthfulness, action—it is the unconscious life that is the grandest life. It must be so with the God element, if there is one. It must be a perfectly unconscious life. To come into consciousness is the negation of itself. To think God, is to annihilate him. To attempt to prove his existence, is to reveal his nonentity. The highest possible evidence, therefore, of the being of God would be absolute and unqualified non-belief. If God existed, the highest compliment we could pay him would be ignorance of his existence. Demonstration is dethronement.

The making of gods and the belief in gods demonstrate that there are no gods, and so the field is clear for the making of a new one. There is no real god in the way, and hence in the making of a god we can suit ourselves. We have the raw material to our own hands to mold as we desire.

Man is in so much trouble and vexation, and is so worn and weary with sorrow, broken in hope, that without doubt for the next few thousand years he will need a god. So long as there is dyspepsia, liver complaint, headache, and heartache, there will be gods. So long as there is a doctor, there will be a theologian. But when the doctor has cured the last disease, he will have buried the last priest. The skilful surgeon is the greatest foe of the church. His scalpel cuts deeper than any sword. Every pain removed destroys an argument for deity. Every new remedy consigns the pulpit to oblivion. Hygiene is heresy per se.

> The devil was sick; the devil a saint would be.
> The devil was well; the devil a saint was he.

The wit of Rabelais prophesies the result of the science of right living. There never was a saint yet who was not on the sick list. No one in perfect health ever sat on the anxious seat, or was born again. Confirmation in the church is simply hospital treatment. It is for invalids, not well people.

Man in his highest estate, when he has reached the serene hights of imagination; when he can overlook the universal world with exalted wisdom; when the splendid reality is understood, and courage comes with discipline; when unselfish knowledge takes the place of selfish faith; when brotherhood is so firmly established that sorrows are ameliorated; when there is so much humanity that suffering is lost in sympathy; when laws of health so prevail that death is always a happy ending; when nature is so controled that cyclones become zephyrs, and earthquakes only melodious thunders, and lightnings, like angel visits, are few and far between; when there are no grasshoppers in the land, and golden harvests shine—I believe in that beautiful and sublime estate all men will be Atheists. They will be so happy, so wise, so contented, so neighborly—they will have such confidence in one another—that they will need no gods. In themselves they will find all wealth of thought, hope, and aspiration. In the elevation, dignity, and splendor of man himself will be seen the brightest form of existence. In life itself will be discovered a magnificence of power which will render every god a useless encumbrance.

If men were ideally perfect, we should need no state as a police force any more than we should need a God. But as men are not ideally perfect, and therefore there must be a state authority, as a mark of imperfection for the time being, so, as a sort of necessary evil, there must be a God for the time being; but, as we try to improve the state and have as good a one as we can, so we must have as good a God as we can. As we must have a state that will advance, and not retard, humanity, so we must have a God that will advance, and not retard, humanity—a constructive God, a God of progress. Therefore let us proceed to make a God. In the Genesis of the new Bible, the process of creation is reversed. In the old Bible, God makes man. In the new Bible, man makes God—and I hope that man will be more successful in deity-making than God was in man-making. God had to drown his creation, and repented that he had made it. Let us make a God that we can pronounce excellent, and have no repentance afterward—a God suitable to civilization, a God that we shall not be ashamed of in the day of judgment.

There is not an existing deity who can pass a civil service examination for promotion to the rank of the new God. Therefore we must start from the beginning. We need a brand-new divinity.

First of all, the new God must be a God of law, and not of miracle. In the progress of civilization, miracles have been entirely abolished. They are no good. They accomplish nothing. They cannot build steam-engines or telephones. They cannot even cure disease. A God who would resort to a miracle nowadays is very unwise, as well as weak. He loses his dignity. It is like putting on cast-off clothing. It's out of date, besides being pretty well worn to pieces. Law is the fashion now. It is the acknowledged power. Law is the illumination of the intellect and the record of all knowledge. What has miracle ever done? Nothing. It has been destructive, not constructive. The triumphs of law are on every side. The march of day and night, the fair ranks of stars, the procession of the flowers, even thought in its illimitable flight, are the expressions of law. Without law they cannot be. Outside of law there is no force. From beginning to end law sweeps with resistless energy. It cannot be changed; it cannot be annulled. God must accept it. If he rejects law, he rejects life. If he attempts miracle, it is suicide. Miracle is simply a trick of law. It is pettifogging. It cheats only the vulgar. A God who can only manifest himself by signs and wonders is unworthy of notice. It is like wearing a placard; it is like the artist who painted the picture of a horse, and, for fear it might not be recognized, wrote underneath: "This is a horse." A miracle is such an announcement of deity. Any potentate who cannot win recognition through law, but must perform like a clown in a circus for effect, cannot carry off the honors of to-day.

Law is democracy—miracle is aristocracy. It is the weapon of tyranny. God must be democracy, or resign leadership. He must do like the rest of us, or vanish from the theater of action. He must regard the order of things. He must study cause and effect, sequence and consequence. He must accommodate himself to mathematics and the process of gravitation. He must be patient, like Humboldt, and recognize the cosmos. He must think with Huxley, and experiment with Tyndall, and invent with Edison. He must rely upon knowledge and the co-relation of forces. The God-like to-day is that which is obedient; which is perfectly natural; which follows the line of the least resistance. The more God, the less miracle. Miracle betokens weakness—disease. It no longer means regeneration, but degeneration. No respectable divinity would any longer be guilty of the performance of a miracle. He would lose his prestige. It's like playing with loaded dice or marked cards. It won't do. The game must be square and the deal straight. There must be no hidden aces. There must be no Gladstone agility, who, as Labouchere asserts, always plays his game with three aces up his sleeve, and then swears that the Holy Ghost put them there. Our new God must be no such juggler—no charmer, charm he never so wisely. He must be a legal luminary. He must swear by the constitution of things. He must practice in the open court of the universe; stick to evidence, and win his case on its merits. The new God must be loyal to what is. He must take the oath of allegiance to reality. If he rides upon the whirlwind or directs the storm, he must take counsel of nature and get her good-will before he does it, or he will inevitably be destroyed.

The God of the future, the God of humanity, the God of this world, must forswear all signs and wonders; all extraordinary and abnormal things; all strange appearances; all cyclones, earthquakes, lightnings. He must renounce all fish stories. He must let the sun keep on its way, and the hands on dial-plates of time. He must not make iron float or poison cease to kill. He had better not try to walk upon the water, for he will have a cold bath and the cold shoulder. He had better not cure disease without a physician's certificate. He had better not send devils into swine, or he will assuredly be sued for damages. We need no such disturbers of the peace. We want a gentle, orderly God, who pursues the even tenor of his way with divine complacency; who has no desire for notoriety; who will not advertise himself, like Barnum or Buffalo Bill; who will go with the tide; who will seek favoring gales; strenuously cultivate the matter of fact; attempt no royal road, but tread the popular way; who will stick to nature, truth, reality, and common sense, and who will be a divinity simply because he has the deepest insight into law and the most undeviating regard for its majestic course.

Miracles hereafter mean littleness and not greatness. In order only can any valid rulership appear.

Again, the new God will be a servant and not a master. There will be no divine despot, but a divine worker—one who can do something—a serviceable deity, not an ornamental one. We want a useful God—no exalted drone; no God to pose as sovereign; no dude deity who is on dress parade, who can think of no higher function than to show off, who studies good looks and desires compliments, who is to be praised night and day, who must have golden service and perpetual incense. Away with such a God! Away with the master and the despot, away with the golden throne and subservient multitude, away with incense, the worship, and the prayer; away with any deity who will command! We want no God on the throne—not one. Such a God must abdicate, and if he can't join the toiling millions and do his share of this world's labor, let him cease to be. Bury him with all his tinsel. Such a God is a disgrace and a curse. The god of the future is the god of service, of labor, of helpfulness; who can lend a hand; who will plow and sow and reap. We want a god of vigorous muscle, of nerve and brain; who can earn a living in the sweat of his face; who can dig and delve, go into the bowels of the earth, sail the high seas, furl and unfurl the canvas, load and unload the ship; who will pull down old tenement houses and build new ones, who will clean the streets, remove filth and disease; who will make bread for the starving poor, bring the cattle from the thousand hills to the homes of toilers; who will put out the darkness with electric lights; who will weave a network of railroads with deft and wondrous power; who will set a million machineries at work; who will strike at the forge, tug at the engine, poke the fire, snap the whip, spur the horse, drive the herd, lug brick, hit the nail on the head, saw logs, chop wood, build the fires, sweep and dust—yea, sew on shirt buttons, darn the stocking, black boots, and kill fleas, musketoes, bedbugs, and grasshoppers. That is what the god of the future must do. He must be a menial god, a slave god, a servant god. That's the glory of deific power—to be a ministry.

We can't afford to have the old God. It's too much waste of material. We need all the force we can get for practical business. This fierce, tumultuous, intense age—every potency of it strained to the utmost—every faculty on the alert—the brain radiating with electric strife—poor girls making shirts at four cents apiece—why, we can't allow that old God to remain on his throne. He must come down. He cannot sleep and dream dull care away. He must awake; he must fling off his regalia and put on the blouse of the workingman. He must stand at the bench, at the oar, at the mast. He must ply the needle; he must tug and tussle with the necessities of life; he must put on the harness; he must learn his trade; he must acquire skill; he must join the grand army and do watch and ward for human welfare. Out upon that old sovereign, sitting upon his throne drinking the sweet incense from this accursed earth! Away with the music!—away with the seraphim and cherubim!—away with the golden mansions built on agonies! Confiscate heaven—fling it open to humanity—draft the king and all his courtiers into the squads of industry and train them to service! Teach them the art of living, for themselvs and others! Turn the great white throne into a machine shop, and set the archangels to greasing the wheels. Let the arm of deity be the arm of some mighty enginery, glittering, wonderful, sweeping with superb poise and curve, so that ten thousand happy hands find work to do. That's the new God—the God of service, the God of work; a mighty God indeed, who finds the making of a pin as glorious as the making of a star, who finds all action equally sublime, who finds all labor equally sovereign; who feels that a throne is a disgrace, that to receive worship is dishonorable, that to rule is criminal, that to serve is godlike, that to give is divine. The God of the future will no longer be sought for in the skies—that is the poorest place for a deity. He will be found in the midst of poverty and disease. He will be found in hospitals by the bedside of the sick. He will be where suffering is. He will be with the aching body, the torn heart, the tortured mind. He will set the broken limb, cool the fevered brow, calm the raging pulse. He will be the physician and the nurse, the mechanic and the artist. He will be the schoolmaster abroad. He will be learning, education, knowledge, discipline. He will be the warm heart, the strong arm, the foot that keeps step to the music of eternal progress.

That will be the God of the future, the beautiful God, the loving God, the God of service, who shall be a flaming minister to the wants of humanity.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

The Money Question.—II.

What would be the effects upon the nation of the adoption of such a system of national money as I described in my former article on this subject? Let us try to study them carefully.

1. No person would be treated unjustly by the change. Those having money now would be able to change it for the new money, or they would be at liberty to keep the old money if they pleased.

2. Under the new system any person having the requisit security would always be able to borrow money; for it would not be necessary to stop loaning money in order to prevent too much getting into circulation, as that would be effected by increasing the rate of interest. The higher the rate of interest, the fewer would borrow, and the more would make deposits. The amount of money in circulation could be controled in this way as certainly as the amount of steam going to the engin is now controled by the governor. Banks would therefore never hav to cease loaning, and they would always loan to all on the same terms and at the same rate.

3. No person would then hoard money. It would always be secure in the banks, and money loaners could then only get interest by loaning to the banks, as all borrowers would go to the banks. There would then be nothing gained by hoarding it up, and when not in use it would be placed in the banks.

4. Under the new system, money would always be equally plentiful, and, consequently, of a constant and uniform value. This would make the prices of everything else much more steady than now, and this would take a large part of the speculativ element out of business. The prices of things now depend largely upon the amount of money per capita in circulation, and this again depends upon the will of our bankers. When it is to their interests to lower prices, they stop loaning money and decrease the amount per capita in circulation. When it is to their interest to raise prices, they loan money freely. The present system of banking is like a game of cards, the result of which is to be decided by skilful tricks. Bankers are the professional gamblers, and the people with whom they play are their ignorant and innocent victims, not one in ten thousand of whom even pretends to understand the tricks of the game.

5. Under the new system we should only accept as security for money things that are the products of labor. None of the natural things of the earth or of the heavens should be accepted. Land, mines, natural timber, air, water, the sun, moon, and clouds, as well as the bodies of men, should be rejected, because in the very nature of things private individuals cannot justly own any of these things. No person can justly acquire an exclusiv right to natural things. All kinds of fixed improvements on land could be accepted as security; so also could gold, silver, diamonds, etc. The government could loan safely to anyone one-half the value of his house, and could assist anyone to build to the extent of one-half the cost of his house by simply charging enough more than the interest to pay the insurance also. How this would stimulate building! How it would increase work! How it would raise wages! How it would improve the homes of the people! and how this would improve their health and morals! To prevent people from borrowing money on land, the government should cease to tax anything but land and raise the tax on it to a full rental. Then it would cease to hav a commercial value, and could not be given as security for money.

6. If money could not be borrowed on land, the rate of interest would decline to the point where it ought to be. It would be more difficult then to giv security for money, consequently it would be more difficult to keep out any fixed sum per capita. This would cause interest to decline.

7. It will be noticed that at present, when money is scarce among the people, that is, when it is hoarded up in bank vaults, interest is high, and when it is plenty among the people and scarce in bank vaults, interest is low. This condition of things would be exactly reversed by the national system which I hav outlined. Interest would be lowest when the people had the least and the banks the most money.

8. Under the national system, if it should be found impossible to put out a sufficient sum of money by loaning, the government could increase it by making public improvements. The whole railway system, the telegraph system, and the express business should be carried on by the government. They should build railways, canals, bridges, etc. This would furnish employment to the people and would put the national money in circulation.

9. The probability is that under this system interest would be very low, probably two or three per cent on an average. But let me compare the results of the two systems upon the average laboring man.

Let us suppose that Mr. A. is a mechanic working at $2 per day, and that he works three hundred days a year. His salary is $600. If he is married, he can hardly liv on less than $10 per week, including $2.50 for rent of house. Let us suppose, then, that he saves $100 a year. A lot of land suitable to build on will cost him $400. This will take him four years to earn. He cannot build the poorest kind of house for much less than another $400, which it will take him another four years to save up. If he has been healthy and fortunate, he can, we will suppose, get into a small house on a poor lot at the end of eight years. Very few are so fortunate as this. Then he will hav to pay taxes on his lots and house; also revenue on his clothes and food. Let us now see how it would work with the same man on the new system. He would not hav to buy any lots. He would simply take them up on condition of paying the rent to the government. In two years he would hav $200 saved, and could begin to build his house. The government would loan him the other $200 and insure his house for $200 for about $8 a year or less. He would get into as good a house in two years as he now does in eight. If he and everybody else paid the rent of his land to the government, then he and everybody else would get back an annual pension from the government. Those who would rent a great deal of land would hav to pay more taxes than they would hav returned in pensions. Those having large families and not renting much land would get more in pensions than they would pay in rents.

In two years more Mr. A. could pay the government the $200, or could expend that amount in enlarging his house and increasing his comforts. It is easy to see how much Mr. A.'s condition would be improved under the new system.

One more illustration: Some years ago the people of Flint, Michigan, decided they must hav a system of water-works. A company was formed and the city council agreed with this company to pay them $7,500 a year for one hundred hydrants, to be used only in case of fire. The company was to charge for water for all other purposes. The water-works cost less than $100,000.

Now, suppose the city of Flint could hav borrowed money of the United States government at about three per cent, and put in the water-works and owned them; they could hav then sold $2,000 more water than the cost of operating the works. One hundred thousand dollars at three per cent would cost $3,000 a year. Deduct from this $2,000 derived from the sale of water to private parties, and the citizens would then hav to pay only $1,000 a year for the one hundred hydrants to be used for fire purposes, instead of $7,500.

I am well aware that there are people who will see great objections to such a system of banking as I hav described. Such people can see great objections to the world revolving around the sun, and to the earth revolving upon its axis. They can see great objections to anything that was not invented in the Dark Ages.

An Enterprising Priest.

Father Palmer, a Catholic priest, of New Orleans, has been arrested on the charge of selling imported wines to saloon men. Father Palmer admits he sold wine which he had imported for sacramental purposes, and which had been left over. It should strike religious people as something worse than blasphemy for an ordained priest to thus turn into the beverage of commerce the blessed blood of a crucified deity.

A Liberal Mutual Aid Association.

In case of the death of even some of our best workers, if preceded by misfortune or long sickness, their dependent loved ones would be left unprovided for. And we know the meager pittance resulting from appeals to charity would afford but slight temporary relief.

In time of sickness, the more prolonged the greater and more intense must be the mental anguish of knowing not alone that lack of necessaries prevents the chance of restoration to health, but coming death will leave loved ones destitute.

I am in receipt of a number of letters in regard to a Liberal Mutual Aid Association, and all without exception express hearty approval of such an organization. Some, however, hav erroneous conceptions in regard to the matter, that I desire to remove.

There is very great need of such an association, but it does not yet exist. To avoid mistakes, and insure the greatest possible good, the discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other leading Liberal periodicals of everything pertaining to such an organization is much to be desired. It is a matter of personal interest to every Liberal man, woman, and child in the United States and Canada.

It would greatly expedite the formation of such an association if all in favor would at once send me their names and addresses.

The selection of location for the office of the Association is a matter for decision by those desiring to join. There are many good reasons why it should be West, as far as Chicago or, perhaps, Omaha. Yet New York city has some claims as the great metropolis, the center to which all business gravitates; then, too, the laws governing such organizations in New York state are of the very best, insuring, as far as human forethought and enactment can do so, protection of every member, and impossibility of fraud or mismanagement; although the judicious selection of officers, and the publication every three months of an itemized account of all receipts and expenditures in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought periodicals, would afford ample safeguards to all members, no matter where the office may be located. There is no chance for sectional jealousies in the Mutual Aid, since all its members claim, "The world is my country; to do good, my religion." Will all the Liberals please send me their names, addresses, and their choice of location for the office of the Association?

The Mutual Aid should be established for the greatest good to the greatest number, and not to afford fat perquisits or big salary to some one person or a favored few. No remuneration should be allowed any officer, except the secretary in charge of the office, and he or she should only be paid, as in any other business, reasonable compensation for actual service rendered. The office, and all pertaining to it, must be conducted with the most rigid economy compatible with efficient conduct of the business of the Association. Under no pretext should the total expenses—including percentage to agents, secretary and clerk salaries, office rent, printing forms, blanks, etc., etc.—exceed the semi-annual dues and one-half the membership fees. When the number of members has increased so that there is more money thus received than sufficient for the most careful and rigid economical administration of the affairs of the Association, the semi-annual dues should be at once reduced.

The Mutual Aid must not be in any way connected with any other organization, but stand entirely independent, relying solely upon its own merits. Liberals of every shade of opinion can unite in the noble work of affording mutual aid, and thus, becoming personally interested in each others welfare, a stronger bond of unity and more fraternal feeling will be cultivated—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished for."

It is a very grave mistake to regard mutual aid as charity. It is not a charity, but a legitimate business enterprise, conducted on strict business principles. Its objects are to enable its members while in health, by means of coöperation, to make provision for sickness, provide for their dependent loved ones in case of death, and secure services of Liberal lecturers at burial.

The best and most equitable way to provide aid for sick members would be by creating a reserve fund, formed by one-half of all membership fees, and ten per cent of all death claims paid.

After one year's membership any member totally incapacitated by sickness—that is, dangerously sick, confined to bed—for more than one full week, would be entitled to loan from the reserve fund. The physicians of the society and of the sick member should consult and report to the secretary of the society the nature of the sickness and amount necessary per week to provide nursing and comforts for the sick, and necessaries for the family; and on approval by the executiv committee and the surrendering of certificate of membership to the association as security for amount loaned, amount so agreed on shall be paid each week to such sick member during total disability from sickness. If member recovers, the amount loaned or part thereof may be repaid any time within two years without interest. If not repaid within that time, amounts loaned and interest thereon will, on death of such member, be deducted from amount of certificate, and the remainder paid to heirs.

Until all Freethinkers practice the ennobling precepts of Liberalism there will always be need to guard against fraud. It would not be justice to offer a premium to people to encourage or feign sickness. The organization would speedily come to grief if certain amounts were to be paid in every case of sickness, with no provision to insure repayment. No society could be self-sustaining on any such Quixotic basis. We want mutual aid, not charity. It is to avoid the cruel humiliation of depending on or soliciting charity that the Liberal Mutual Aid Association should be instituted.

Uniform assessments and graded amounts of death benefit will insure equity for all. The most able and experienced insurance men advise making three classes:

|---|---|
| Aged 21 to 35, death benefit | $3,000 |
| Aged 35 to 45, death benefit | 2,500 |
| Aged 45 to 60, death benefit | 2,000 |

These amounts constitute whole benefits. Members can take whole, half, or whole and half benefits.

Membership fee, whole benefit, $5.00; half benefit, $2.50; whole and half benefit, $8.00. Semi-annual dues, payable January and July, whole benefit, $2.00; half benefit, $1.00; whole and half benefit, $3.00. Thirty days' notice to members to pay assessments.

The Mutual Aid should be just what its name implies; it is not really an insurance company; there can be no profits or dividends to divide. There is no compulsion to pay assessments; it is an agreement among men and women of honor to secure to each other aid in sickness, and, in case of death, provision for loved ones, by each paying small specified sums—assessment of one dollar to pay death claims, membership fees to make reserved fund to loan the sick, and semi-annual dues to defray the expense of conducting the business of the Association. A person is a member and entitled to the benefits of the Association just so long as he complies with the conditions. When any member neglects to pay dues or assessment, that neglect forfeits membership, and all claim on the Association. Repayment of dues and assessments to disaffected members is an absurd impossibility. The dues paid would hav been expended in conducting the business of the Association. Every cent of every assessment—less ten per cent for reserve fund—would hav been paid to heirs of deceased members. How then could the money be paid back?

WOMEN MEMBERS ON EQUAL TERMS.

The most experienced actuaries assure me the objections to insuring women are the result of ancient tradition and prejudice. There is very trifling, if any, more risk in women than men. The Mutual Aid being founded and composed of those who advocate equal rights, should accept women members on exactly the same terms and conditions as men.

There should be women on the board of officers and directors. Many women hav loved ones, in part or wholly dependent on them, who would be left to suffer but for such provision as the Liberal Mutual Aid would afford. It will be the only society of the kind that accepts women on exact equal terms with men, and will doubtless attract large numbers of women, who, thus becoming interested in the good work of mutual aid, would be induced to take activ part in Liberal propaganda work.

Too long the organization of such a society has been delayed. Let us to work! Will the Liberals who favor such an organization please write me at once, giv name and address with choice of location for the office of the society, and any other suggestion or proposition deemed of interest?

Woman's Constitutional Right to Vote.

A portion of the argument of Mrs. Lida Johnson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 11th, seems to be unsound. The right to vote is restricted by state laws, on account of age, crime, and sex. The right to vote is not such a privilege or immunity necessarily belonging to the citizen that its denial is unconstitutional under Art. 14, Sec. 1. There must be a limitation as to age; it is proper that there should be a limitation as to crime; and limitation as to sex is not forbidden in Art. 15. The same principle applies to Art. 1, Sec. 2, for children and criminals are people, as well as women.

But the provision in Art. 4, Sec. 4, is not so readily dismissed. Is that a republican government, to which one-half the people hav given no consent, in which they hav no share, and which has been accepted only by a majority of the other half? Is that a republican form of government which allows a little over one-fourth to rule over the other three-fourths? This is a question which the disfranchised class hav a right to hav decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. HENRY M. PARKHURST.

W. S. Bell in Texas.

After leaving the Pineries I had a long trip to my next stopping-place, which was Trenton. Here I found many wide-awake Freethinkers. The first of them I met was Mr. J. W. Bell, who very kindly took me under his care. I gave a lecture in the Bailey school-house, about two miles from the town, and another in the town hall. In both cases I had large and enthusiastic audiences. I did not find in all Texas a more earnest set of Liberals than I found here. The orthodox sun stood still for the space of two days, while the hosts of Liberals were rallying at liberty's call. I hav nothing but pleasant memories of my short stay among the Liberals of Trenton.

At Paris I made the acquaintance of Mr. R. Peterson, Mrs. Peterson and daughter, and was very courteously and attentivly entertained by them I was greatly interested in their accounts of their travels abroad, as both Mr. and Mrs. Peterson are good talkers. But on my audience I hav no lavish praise to bestow. If you will take my word for it, every time the door opened the people of that audience (with a few exceptions) turned their heads to see who was coming in. As many of them came late, and as they came straggling along one after another, the reader can imagin how often the head-turning was repeated. And, to make matters still worse, they would turn around at such critical moments as I was just making a clinching argument, or getting off a witty point in illustration. It may possibly hav occurred to some of them in the course of the week following that I intended certain remarks to pass for a joke, but, good souls, they evinced no such conclusion while I was talking.

This was one of the first lectures of the kind these people had ever heard, and, it being Sunday, possibly they may hav had too sensitiv an appreciation of the sanctities of the holy day to allow themselvs to indulge in a profane laugh.

Another long railroad ride brought me to Henrietta. My right-hand man, Mr. John W. James, I found sick-abed, but after a few hours he was on his feet, and we were soon busily engaged in making arrangements for lectures in the Court House. There are but few Liberals here who are willing to show their hand (with anything in it). As it is a Prohibition town, quite a good many of the townspeople came out to hear me; and one, a Prohibitionist, said my lecture had converted him from the error of his way. On the second evening my audience was not so large, as the Prohibitionists had gotten up a counterblast.

Next day, on my way back to Fort Worth, while the train was stopped at Bowie for dinner, Mr. Clark Arnold came in the car to see me and to explain why the Freethinkers of Bowie could not hav Liberal lectures.

My last lecture point was my worst. I went to Weatherford without knowing much about the place or the Liberal sentiment, and so, when I got there, I found it a priest-ridden place, and could get but a very few to come out to hear me. It will take a good deal of Liberal talk to wake up the people. I was very pleasantly entertained by Mr. E. P. Nicholson and daughter. I had one hearer from Slip Down Mountain who came all the way on horseback to hear me ring my bell. On the day I left Weatherford it was necessary for me to take an early start. I am not partial to early rising. The old saw about the early bird getting the worm never seemed particularly brilliant to me. I hav always cherished a wish, when I hav had this early-bird chestnut dinned in my ears, that some "varmint" would catch the early bird for being so previous; and although it is a hard thing for any one possessed of kindly humanities to say, yet I must confess that I never hear this oracle about early rising repeated without wishing that the man who originated it had been that veritable worm himself.

As I had lectured some years ago in Joplin, Mo., I thought I could do so again, and accordingly after leaving Texas, and a long ride through the Indian Territory, I reached Joplin to meet with disappointment. Some of the good Liberals who lived here years ago hav moved away, and some hav become poor, and others, who hav become richer, hav not worked much at the Liberal cause. I gave a talk to the Knights of Labor, when I gave my lecture on "Liberty and Morality," and had but very few out to hear. There was a free show in town, and Liberals and Christians, such as they are in Joplin, prefer a "nigger show" to an instructiv lecture.

At Carthage, Mo., I gave only one lecture. I was very cheerfully and nicely entertained by Mr. Watson Heston and wife, and part of the time by Mr. and Mrs. Warner. We had a very good audience, keen and appreciativ. Several expressed a desire to hav me come again and giv a course of lectures.

Mr. Heston is not very robust, and his wife is ill, and, consequently, he is financially embarrassed. He has pluck, but, poor fellow, I was sorry to see him tugging away at duty and destiny under such a heavy load. Perhaps some large-hearted, open-handed Liberal may become to him an earthly providence.

Going back west two hundred miles I reached

Wichita, Kan., November 30th, and lectured December 1st. I found this the most activ of all Western towns, excepting, of course, Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City. But the people hav gone wild. It is speculation upon speculation. Smith buys a piece of land at high rates, and sells it again to Brown at an advanced price, and Brown raises the figures and sells it to Jones, and so it goes, but where is the end? And what kind of an end will come to this balloon business? There are many Liberals here, but they, too, are as crazy as their more orthodox neighbors in the mad chase after the almighty dollar.

I spoke to a good audience, but in the worst hall I ever attempted to speak in. It is a hall with a horrid echo. Mark you, my reader, it was not the worst hall to speak in simply because it had an echo, but because it had the most tormenting echo I ever heard. If there is anything we hate in this world it is to hear two persons talking at the same time, but in this case it was one talking twice at the same time, one voice going down the hall, and another coming back. That makes too much of a good thing. One lecture at a time is enough. W. S. Bell.

J. L. Andrew.

After meeting my engagements in New Jersey and Eastern Pennsylvania, I made my way to Western Pennsylvania, lecturing in Butler, Millerstown, Petrolia, Parkersburg, and Oil City. In all of those places there are some stanch Freethinkers, and in nearly every place the audiences were quite satisfactory. In Butler the lecture was given in the parlor of Nixon's Home. The Methodist minister was invited to be present, and duly came. He was courteously offered the privilege of making what remarks or criticisms he considered necessary. He only stated that, as he was desirous of making the right preparation for the next world, he could not afford to dabble in philosophical questions. He also affirmed that Paine and Voltaire regretted their antagonism of Christianity, which was conclusiv proof that they had done a mischievous wrong. Avoiding, under the circumstances, anything that savored of a discussion, I reminded him that neither Paine nor Voltaire had ever expressed any sorrow because of their assaults on Christianity, and that true wisdom consists in the making the best of this life, rather than in a superstitious preparation for the next.

For some time it has seemed to me very strange that a man who is at all acquainted with the real thoughts and feelings of the age could really accept the religious theories that were extant in the darkest days of European civilization. The reluctance of Christian ministers to publicly discuss the gravest problems of religious thought can never be justified by the statement that unbelief is confined to a few. It is not skepticism that the church has to deal with to-day; it is not mere doubt; it is a condition of widespread unbelief, affecting nearly every class and condition of society. Nor is this unbelief limited to men. I hav found among women of several churches as strong unbelief as I hav found in the minds of men. And it would be no discredit to the intelligence of the ministers to claim that they share the prevailing unbelief. With this conscious and evident decline of faith comes a declining zeal; and there is more attention being given to practical questions than ever before. It is interesting to see what hold the church has on the masses.

Last week the ministers of Davenport, Ia., met to discuss the question of public attendance at church. That city has a population of at least twenty-three thousand, and yet, on actual count, only about three thousand two hundred attended church on a recent Sunday evening. All those who ever attend church would amount to no more than eight thousand, leaving fifteen thousand who never avail themselves of the benefit of the clergy. Without a doubt, this is an average attendance in cities of that size. The churches hav reasonable cause for alarm when the people pay no heed to them. The disregard of sensible people toward religion is the argument of the Catholic clergy against a purely secular education. Speaking of this question, there is some reason to expect serious troubles in this country respecting the conflicting claims of the state and religious sects concerning public education and general taxation for its support. Either state authority in that line must be ignored, or people, irrespectiv of their religious belief, must contribute to its support.

In Indiana lectures were arranged for in Rome City, Ligonier, and Corunna. In spite of cold weather we had good audiences. At Ligonier on the first night there was about one hundred and fifty present, and over three hundred the second night. It is the desire of the Liberals of Noble county, Indiana, to hav a large meeting next summer at Rome City. There is every necessary facility to make such a meeting a success. The city itself has less than a thousand population, but there are several large hotels within a mile for the accommodation of visitors. There is a large lake, in which there is an island of about ten acres, which contains a pavilion that will seat about four thousand persons. Excursions are very frequent to this place during the summer months. If the Liberals of northern Indiana begin in time there is no reason why a successful gathering should not be held there. They are very desirous of securing Mr. Ingersoll for one lecture. If they succeed they would expect an audience of several thousand. It was estimated that at least twenty thousand went to hear Sam Jones at Rome City last year; and it is very reasonable to suppose that Mr. Ingersoll could draw a much larger audience.

On my way West I lectured in Molene and Rock Island. I expect to spend the winter in Kansas, and shall be glad to hear from all those in that state who desire lectures. Address, care of Prof. D. D. Bryant, Ft. Scott, Kansas. J. L. Andrew.

New York Freethinkers' Association.

Since my return from New York sickness has prevented my doing any work for the Association. While in New York the executiv committee convened. It was then decided, 1. To hav certificates of membership designed and printed at once; C. B. Reynolds was to attend to this. 2. A list of the names of members of each county was to be forwarded to the president, T. B. Wakeman. 3. Circulars of instruction were to be prepared containing hints and suggestions as to the best methods of carrying on the work in each county—until such circulars were prepared the leaflets of the Canadian Secular Union were to be used. 4. T. B. Wakeman was instructed to prepare Liberal lesson leaves to be used in science schools; Prof. G. G. Grower, lesson leaves on chemistry and electricity. Only a part of the plan of work has been carried out. The county committees hav not been appointed. An organizer was to hav been sent to the different counties. We hope by earnest work to redeem the time lost. To carry out this plan there is need of funds. Let the Liberals who are desirous of seeing the work move in this state send in their names and donations. Remember the membership fee is only twenty-five cents.

The donations and membership fees since October 17th are as follows:

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

The work of the American Secular Union for the coming year will be the same as that of the last year. It will include lectures in the field by the secretary, the pushing forward of the Nine Demands by legislativ action, the publication of documents in regard to these Demands, the organization of societies, etc. The contributions show the generosity and determination of those who are interested in the work of the Union. We ask those friends to giv to the fund who believe in the work, and who are able to do something. If all will contribute, a sufficient sum will be raised to vigorously prosecute the work. Already under the auspices of the Union an effort is being made in the territory of Idaho for the enforcement of church taxation. These efforts will be continued wherever opportunity occurs; and every point of advance be made available throughout the whole country. Samuel P. Putnam.

The Roman Catholics.

The writer is a Liberalist of the extreme truth seeking order, and Agnostic to everything not apparent to his reason. He is not opposed to religion. In his survey of all religions which now interest the inhabitants of our extended Union, he has always cherished the hope that enlightened humanity as a whole, if left to itself, would select that religious faith nighest the elevation of its mind; the outcome of which would be something like a competitiv universal brotherhood of kindness.

But it seems the Roman Catholic religion is one that scorns to come within the scope of this brotherly compact of religious faiths. With the Roman Catholic "submission" is the word, and subserviency to the will and dictum of the "holy father" at Rome, extending through his endless line of priests, bishops, archbishops, and cardinals, etc.

In fine, this pure phalanx of priests of the holy father assumes to do the thinking, praying, and cursing for the whole world, as in the past, for all nations and all peoples. Verily, how surpassingly good is this disinterested kindness, this voluntary act! But are not these Catholics, these holy men, presuming too much upon the ignorance of us Americans?

The writer has been drawn to examin into these priestly exertions just now through their unusual efforts to Romanize this vast republic. In looking into the past history of the holy apostolic church of Rome, dating far, far away in past centuries, we find its history a trail of blood, butcheries, tortures, and meddlesome intrigues with all nations! Its holy pretensions hav ever been found those of hypocrisy, audacity, and crime. Based upon ignorance, they hav ever been antagonistic to progress and learning. They hav ever suppressed advancement in the arts and sciences, but when by circumstances a new discovery has forced itself upon the world, this holy autocrat at Rome was the first hypocritically to claim its merit—vide astronomy, printing, electricity, magnetism, animal and mineral; galvanism, etc.

Is our glorious republic prepared to surrender all its political power and greatness to the dictum of the holy father—the holy buffoon at Rome? Are we to forget the cruelties and butcheries of the Conquest of Mexico? Are we to forget the tortures of the Inquisition? Are we to forget the sale of indulgences for uncommitted and premeditated crimes, for the support of the holy father? Are we to forget the absolution for crime? Are we to forget that no contract is held binding when made with a heretic? Are we to forget that the term "Protestant" took its name from its conflicts with the holy father at Rome? Were it possible to believe the exertion of this holy hierarchy was really philanthropic in thus attempting to control the thoughts of mankind to the acquirement of a higher state of happiness, we could not but applaud the benevolence of the intention. But the history of its past horrid acts, and the present priestly masquerading, from the altar-boy here to the holy buffoonery at Rome, giv only the assurance of a priestly grasp for power. This peculiar church well knows the art of fascination. From their costly cathedral down they hav this object in view. The eye, the ear, and the smell are to be gratified. Even the pealing echoes from the Gothic arches hav a solemnity, and subdue even a simple-minded Infidel into subjection. We ask, Hav we not reason to be alarmed when they, the Catholics, unblushingly demand a separate appropriation of the state school fund for their schools? And why? To indoctrinate their children with bigotry and ignorance, and a hatred and contempt for every other species of faith. Jesse.

The Blessed Doctrin of Substitution.

From the London Truthseeker.

It is sometimes said—and truly said—that even Mr. Spurgeon is becoming less Calvinistic; but a strong paragraph, in one of his latest published sermons, shows that the Ethiopian does not change his skin. He said:

It has been my joy to preach to you for many years the blessed doctrin of substitution. Now, if Jesus became our surety and substitute, and suffered in our stead, it is an inevitable consequence that we cannot suffer punishment, and that the sin laid upon our surety cannot now be laid upon us. If our debt was paid, it was paid, and there is an end of it; a second payment cannot be demanded. You know the story, the very excellent story, which I think was first told by Mr. Moody, of the man who in the French war was drawn for a soldier, but a friend stepped in, and was accepted as his substitute. That substitute served in the war till he was slain in battle. The man for whom he served was drawn a second time, but he declined to serve. He appeared before the court, and pleaded that he had been drawn once, had served in the war by his substitute, and must now be regarded as dead, because his representativ had been killed. He pleaded that his substitute's service was practically his service; and it is said that the law allowed his plea. Assuredly it is according to divine equity even if it be not according to human law. No criminal can be hanged a second time; one death is all the law requires; believers died in Christ unto sin once, and now they penally die no more. Our condemnation has spent itself upon our gracious representativ. The full vials of divine wrath against sin hav been poured upon the head of the great shepherd, that his sheep might go free; and therein in our joy, our comfort, our security.

Ireland and the Papacy.—II.

These archers carried the cross-bow, the most potent weapon of those days, and an arm altogether unknown to the Irish. So powerful was it that at one hundred yards it would shoot a bolt completely through a fully-armored man, and consequently death would be almost instantaneous. All good Catholics believe that when a man dies in a state of sin he goes straight to hell. When passions are awakened one will be apt to say and do what he might not in calmer moments. The church, knowing full well that in the excitement incident to a battle, with his passions fully aroused, a man would be very likely to commit some sin, considered the advisability of prohibiting the use of this deadly weapon; but the matter was compromised, and the Lateran Council, in 1139, "strictly forbade its employment among Christian enemies."

The atrocities committed by the invaders are almost unparalleled in history—one of the favorit amusements being to cut open a pregnant woman and carry the unborn infant aloft on their lances, tossing it to and fro. I know of no historian who disputes their atrocious conduct; they only differ on the quantity, not on the quality.

In 1171 Henry went to Ireland in person. Six months thereafter the island was subjugated, and, at a council held at Cashel, he fulfilled his part of the contract with Adrian by making "special provisions for the support and protection of the clergy." He also appointed an English lord high constable, an earl marshal, and high steward, and "distributed vast tracts of Irish territory among English nobles, on the strictest feudal principle." In April, 1172, he returned to Wales, where, at St. David's church, a solemn high mass was offered up in gratitude for his success. The principal celebrant was the pope's legate.

It is claimed that the English occupation was intended for the benefit of the inhabitants, who had fallen into evil ways, become dissolute, and were no better than so many wild beasts. Catholic writers say the holy father was so moved by these reports that he was compelled to act as he did. Be it so. It is a question too lengthy to be discussed here. I simply claimed the donation. Yet even on this point I might take an exception and say that the Irish laymen were as good as their clergy. We look for the highest possible standard among teachers of morality and religion, and very frequently look for it in vain; and if St. Anselm and St. Bernard can be believed, the Catholic clergy of Ireland led very irregular lives, and daily broke every one of the Ten Commandments.

I think the true reason was that the Irish colleges had become somewhat independent of Rome. Their scholars were continually bringing up questions which troubled the holy see. The two saints above quoted, being deeply imbued with the Italian ideas of the papacy, were unable to hold their own in controversy with the Irish clergy. It was mainly on their representations that Adrian gave the English invasion the color of a "holy war." Moreover, the orders were too numerous to suit the pope, for, at the synod of Kells, in 1152, three thousand members of these orders attended, and there were less than three hundred secular priests.

Possibly, if the discussions and writings of the Columban order were more closely scanned, impartial criticism might discover that they were a thorn in the side of the holy father. In speaking of them, McGee says: "The Columban order, which attached more importance to the acquisition of knowledge and missionary enterprise . . . issued out of their remote island, carrying their strongly-marked personality into every controversy and every correspondence."

No early Catholic writer seems to question the right of Adrian to make this gift. Every country was considered the property of the holy see. Boniface VIII. claimed Scotland, and, had it not been for the dauntless courage of Edward, it would hav been donated to some favorit. Boniface boldly declared that it belonged to Rome because "it was contained in the universal grant of Constantine, the emperor, of all islands in the ocean, to the successors of St. Peter." America, claimed on these grounds, was divided, almost before its discovery, between the Spaniards and Portuguese. By the same right, the popes meddled with the election of all rulers, and, whenever it was judicious, refused their sanction to the elevation of any obnoxious prince, and denied the rights of the church to the people who served them.

And this selling of countries was nothing unusual, the pope always making a shrewd bargain. In 1265, Clement IV. sold to Charles of Anjou a certain portion of Italy, and ordered the people, several millions in number, to accept Charles as their ruler. By the terms of sale Charles was to pay the holy see eight hundred ounces of gold yearly—and it was expressly stipulated that, should any payment be delayed, Charles was to be excommunicated. If this happened a second time, all the inhabitants were to be placed under the ban and deprived of their sacraments and divine worship. But the ban operated differently with different parties. Charles of Anjou was a weak prince; Charles V. was strong. So, when his soldiers occupied Placentia, which was claimed by the pope, the ban was placed on the soldiers, not on Charles V.

Nowadays we laugh at the "anathema sit" of the holy father, and it affects THE TRUTH SEEKER and Brother Macdonald as much as it changed the course of that comet which excited the ire of one of Leo's predecessors. But a few hundreds of years ago it was different. Then superstition was rife, and when the successor to the meek and lowly Jesus sent out his curse, it had both a moral and physical effect. The churches were draped in mourning and then closed; the bells refused to ring; the sacraments, without which they could not enter their heaven, were refused the dying; the clergy, who were also the doctors, left the sick unattended; the dead were refused burial, and their putrid corpses filled the atmosphere with disease, sweeping off the inhabitants by the score. The devil, always hovering around, seeking whom he might devour, in the shape of a ghoul feasted on the unburied child, and the fond mother knew full well that, having died without baptism, her darling was condemned to everlasting torture. Every thunder-shower was magnified into an exhibition of God's wrath, and the commonest incidents of a daily life plainly showed that the deity sided with the holy father.

Even Jesus, who had shown so much compassion for suffering humanity by becoming one of themselvs; passing through all the trials and troubles incident to infancy, and ending his career by dying for them on the cross; and who, in his glorious ascension still not unmindful of their claims, refused to allow his heart to become etherealized, so that it might ever be sensuous and sensible to human pangs—even he, at the command of the pope, withdrew from the interdicted country and informed its inhabitants through his earthly representativ that his return hinged on their paying the disputed Peter's pence.

The English pope, with his Italian surroundings, not considering the Irish as Christians, authorized the use of the cross-bow against them, and his "anathema sit," working on the superstition of the people, enabled his late master, Henry, to conquer the island. He obtained what he sought, and for years each Irish household paid into the hands of an English collector the sum of one denarius—say, one penny. When Henry VIII. broke from Rome this collection was still continued, only it was diverted into another channel—hinc illæ lachrymæ.

Now, for my second proposition. I might hav said very truthfully that the redeeding of Ireland was made by the pope on the accession of each English ruler, from the time of Henry II. up to and including Mary, wife of Philip. For, in the papal benediction bestowed on a new ruler in sympathy with Rome, the various English kings were always mentioned as rulers of Ireland. But when I made that statement I particularly had in view the Spanish Invasion, known as the Armada.

Henry VIII. had upset all the papal calculations. He believed himself equally infallible and started a popedom of his own, with himself as head performer. When his daughter Mary ascended the throne, Pope Julius III.—ex-Cardinal Del Monte of Council of Trent fame—negotiated her marriage with Philip of Spain. As Spain was intensely Catholic, the reasons are obvious. They were married in 1554, and by agreement the pope waived (for the present) the restoration of the church property which had been confiscated by Henry VIII.

On St. Andrew's day, November 30, 1554, the queen, Philip, and both houses of Parliament knelt before Cardinal Pole, who gave the papal absolution to the entire nation, freeing them from all the penalties of schism, and "restored them to the communion of the holy church."

But, contrary to all expectations, Mary died without issue, and Elizabeth, a Protestant, in due course of time mounted the throne. Philip made advances to her, but couched in such language that the queen peremptorily declined. Imagin a lover of to-day, in claiming a lady's hand, telling her, through one of his friends, and a male friend, too, that she must not expect him to remain with her only till she became pregnant. This was the language of this favorit son of the church.

Angered at the refusal, Philip prepared the Armada. It consisted of 132 ships, fully equipped, and the priestly element was represented by over three hundred members of the Holy Inquisition.

Before sailing from Lisbon, it was placed under the special protection of the Holy Virgin and St. Jago. A solemn pontifical high mass was celebrated, at which the body of the omnipotent God was offered up to appease the wrath of those very elements he had created and "carried in the hollow of his hand." But the storm king, unmindful of the commands of his lord and master, dispersed the fleet, destroying many. The hardy Briton captured and sunk nearly the balance, and the papal anathema hurled at them with impotent rage culminated in their little island becoming the commercial metropolis of the world.

McGee says there was no religious significance attached to the fitting out of this expedition. Let us see. The pope's legate attended to the religious part of the affair, and the fact of the Inquisition taking such a prominent position seems somewhat significant. Moreover, there is no question that Pope Sixtus V. both recognized Philip's claims and promised monetary aid. Adrian had deeded Ireland to the English; he, by the same right, could deed both Ireland and England to Spain.

There is voluminous testimony in proof that Sixtus V. promised to pay one million gold crowns when the Spaniards landed on English soil. This amount was never paid, and the interviews between the pope and the Spanish ambassador, as reported to Philip, show in bright colors the inconsistencies of his peculiar character. Being the son of a vine-dresser, his ideas never seemed to soar above his origin, and he showed that peculiar attachment for money which is a prominent characteristic of the Italian peasant even to this day.

"I told him," says Alvarez, in writing to Philip, "that your majesty had fairly earned the million crowns; half a million was due immediately, and your majesty hoped that when he understood the distress of your army in Flanders he would not only make no difficulty in providing that sum for you, but would let you hav the second moiety in advance. He replied that he did not see why he should be expected to go beyond his engagements. I said your majesty looked rather to the spirit than the letter, and you considered that even if he had given no promis at all, he was bound to come forward and assist your majesty, considering what you had done and spent in the cause of God." "His holiness did not reply, but turned up the whites of his eyes, and looked piously to heaven."

I consider the above as having a "religious significance." Had this, and other interviews of a like nature, never been held, it is hardly possible that such damaging evidence would hav been so securely kept in the archives of Catholic Spain.

The present position of Ireland, politically, morally, commercially, would be too lengthy a subject to discuss here. It is an open book, and can be read by any who so desire. The reasons given are as diversified as the mental status of the various reasoners. We can agree, however, that the Catholic portions of the island are as loyal to the pope as the other sections are hostil. Had all, regardless of creed, been allowed the means of education and self-improvement, possibly the "Isle of Saints" would not now be such a strong recruiting station for the holy see.

But religion, or want of it, was the prime factor in placing that once prosperous island in her present pitiable position, and the careful reader of history, while he deplores England's treatment of her, feels to condone the crime; for it was the only way in which her possession could be assured.

And on what is the Irish loyalty to Rome founded? Merely an idea which Ignorance and her twin sister, Superstition, hav fastened on these people. It is ridiculous to say that Rome desires the Irish to be educated. She has always been opposed to popular education. She knows too well that when her children begin to read, they begin to think, and the various schisms that hav torn her asunder hav proven to her that thought is destructiv to arbitrary creed.

Nothwithstanding Gladstone's heroic struggle, he was doomed to defeat from the start. The Vatican had not forgotten his "Controversy." His "Dawn of Creation and of Worship" was issued as a mild sop, and met its inevitable fate. Rome recognizes no Christianity outside of her pale. To her all are pagans but the inhabitants of the Eternal City. Parnell will be equally unsuccessful unless he joins her communion. Some time ago there was a rumor to that effect. If it should prove true, then, being compromised to the Italian method, he will receive the support of every priest.

In connection with the recent election in England, I noticed in the July 18th issue of the New York Sun, a paper notorious for its subserviency to Catholicism, the following from the pen of its London correspondent, W. H. Hurlbert. It is a quotation from a private letter received from Louis J. Jennings, one of the most advanced English friends of Home Rule:

> The priests were not heartily with us, they fearing a secular, gratuitous, and compulsory state of education far more than they love Erin, your friend the cardinal to the contrary notwithstanding.

However, the present agitation must be productiv of good. I reason thus because I hav noticed that the son of the Irish emigrant is not so loyal to Rome as was his uneducated father.

I might also make a remark about that body known as the Knights of Labor. When they first came to the front, their platform received the indorsement of many true humanitarians, as also the support of thousands, possibly millions, who hav since turned away in disgust. And what was the cause of this change? Simply, Rome. T. V. Powderly, an Irishman by birth, and Catholic by profession, elected to his present position by Irish votes, prostituted his high office by submitting the rules and regulations to the approval of the successor of the very man who was the cause of his nativ country occupying her present abject position. Mr. Powderly, being an educated man, should know that wherever Rome rules ruin ensues. She is Rome first, last, and all the time.

If Colonel Ingersoll could only be induced to look into this Irish question, sift it thoroughly, and then lecture on it, I feel to say it would be productiv of immense good. Hundreds of thousands, ignorant of these facts, would be made acquainted with them, and one lecture from him would bring them more quickly to the notice of the public than if a dozen "high privates in the rear rank" of the Liberal army, like myself, were to write them up for a hundred years.

Personally, I disclaim any antipathy to Rome, beyond what should be naturally expected from a Liberal, from one who is desirous to see the great human family advance rapidly on its grand march of improvement. Catholicism, per se, is no better, no worse, than any other form of Christianity, and so long as a certain portion of humanity are so constituted that they must be shaken over hell at stated periods, in an attempt, vain at times, to make them bearable as citizens, so long can she be tolerated.

I do not suppose this article will hav any weight with those who are wedded to their Italian masters. They will bow to the decisions of Rome. She owns them, and therefore can commit no wrong, or, as Pope Gregory IX. more graphically puts it: "Of nothing the pope may make something. He may render valid a sentence which is null, because in the things that he desires his will takes the place of reason. He can dispense with right; he can make injustice to become justice."

But there are thousands of noble Irishmen throughout our land, men who dare to read, to think, to act for themselvs. To each one I say, These are facts, historical facts; indisputably historical. Investigate them for yourself, and on being satisfied of their truth, remember the lines of the poet:

> Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
> The saddest are these, "It might hav been."

And ask yourself the question, What might hav been the position of my nativ land among civilized nations had it not been for papal interference?

McARTHUR.

It Is a Question of Free Speech.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: After the support which you received in articles published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it seems like a work of supererogation to say more in that line, but noticing how difficult it is to beat the simplest ideas into heads enveloped with rank prejudice, I desire to say a few words. It seems incredible that intelligent men, after having a matter explained to them as clearly as language can explain it, will continue to argue from their own standpoint of egotistic prejudice, instead of from the standpoint of facts. To say that we hav free speech, but everyone is held responsible for the abuse of his freedom, is simply to state in another way that speech is not free. Who is to decide when speech has transcended its proper limits? The majority? Hav not the majority been shown to be wrong in innumerable instances? It ought to be clear as the noonday sun that if a man has a right to advocate a change of government, he has an equal right to advocate the abolition of government. To deny this is to deny that any man has a right to express any opinion whatever.

After all that has been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER on this subject of Anarchy, it would be quite as logical and quite as just to accuse you of a "leaning" toward Christianity because you do not demand that police shall be stationed at the church doors to prevent the clergymen from entering on Sundays, as to accuse you of a leaning toward Anarchy because you advocate freedom of speech on social and political subjects. After reading all the arguments of Anarchists, I cannot see any prospect of a time when Anarchism will become practicable as an actual system of civilization, but my respect for THE TRUTH SEEKER will begin to wane the moment it ceases to advocate absolutely free speech on all subjects of human interest.

It is clear that C. L. Carter, M.D., has a long way to travel before he will be a free thinker. He says, "Those people are mistaken as to what is a free government." Well, is it justice to hang a man for being mistaken?

My private opinion publicly expressed is that if every mother's son of those policemen at the Haymarket had been blown to the Catholic hell in which he so implicitly believes, it would hav served him perfectly right. Of course I shall be accused of sympathizing with Anarchy. Not so. I say this because from all the evidence it is clear that the police will fully precipitated the conflict on that tragic night. Mr. J. Tomkins says they were "nobly doing their duty." They were doing nothing of the kind. If they had been "nobly doing their duty" none of them would hav been injured, so far as it is possible to foresee. Mr. Tomkins kindly informs you that "there are plenty of people who are ready to make Liberalism and Anarchism synonymous terms." So the editor of the foremost Freethought journal in America must ascertain what "plenty of people" are "ready to make," and trim his sails accordingly.

Don't worry, Mr. Tomkins, about what "plenty of people" are ready to do. Though people as "plenty" as sands on the sea-shore should try to make a lie the truth, they could not succeed. I want our weak-kneed, soi-disant Liberals to understand that the verdict against the Anarchists was not simply a verdict against Anarchy nor against murder, but against Freethought. Christians are chuckling fully as much at the thought that they hav given Infidelity a blow as that they hav silenced a few Anarchists. I want our weak-kneed friends to understand that when they join in the Christian clamor against free speech, they are digging away the foundation from under their own castle. They will see it by-and-by.

Mr. Editor, in all the years you hav occupied the editorial chair, the grandest, richest laurels you hav ever won hav been won during this very summer in connection with these Anarchist cases.

Instead of favoring treason and disunion, it is clear to every unprejudiced observer that you hav advocated only simple and exact justice, and you will hereafter be honored for possessing the courage to stand by your convictions in the face of adverse criticism. Nail to the mast the motto "Absolutely free speech and free press," and if THE TRUTH SEEKER must go down in consequence of sustaining that motto, it will go down like a majestic ship, with its colors flying.

The Past and Present.

From the Investigator.

The Christianity of Paine's day is not the Christianity of our time. There has been a great improvement since then. One hundred and fifty years ago the foremost preachers of our time would hav perished at the stake. A Universalist would hav been torn to pieces in England, Scotland, and America; Unitarians would hav found themselvs in the stocks, pelted by the rabble with dead cats; after which their ears would hav been cut off, their tongues bored, and their foreheads branded. Less than one hundred and fifty years ago the following law was in force in Maryland:

Be it enacted by the Right Honorable, the Lord Proprietor, by and with the advice and consent of his Lordship's Governor, and the Upper and Lower Houses of the Assembly, and the authority of the same:

That if any person should hereafter, within this province, wittingly, maliciously, and advisedly, by writing or speaking, blaspheme or curse God, or deny our Savior Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, or shall deny the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or the Godhead of any of the three persons, or the unity of the Godhead, or shall utter any profane words concerning the Holy Trinity, or any of the persons thereof, and shall thereof be convict by verdict, shall, for the first offense, be bored through the tongue, and be fined twenty pounds, to be levied off his body. And for the second offense the offender shall be stigmatized by burning in the forehead the letter "B," and fined forty pounds. And that, for the third offense, the offender shall suffer death without the benefit of clergy.

The strange thing about the law is that it has never been repealed, and is still in force in the District of Columbia. Laws like these were in force in most of the colonies, and in all countries where the church had power.

In the day of Thomas Paine, the church was ignorant, bloody, and relentless. In Scotland the kirk was at the summit of its power. It was a full sister of the Spanish Inquisition. It waged war upon human nature. It was the enemy of happiness, the hater of joy, and the despiser of religious liberty. It taught parents to murder their children, rather than to allow them to propagate error. If the mother held opinions of which the infamous kirk disapproved, her children were taken from her arms, her babe from her very bosom, and she was not allowed to see them, or to write to them a word.

It would not allow shipwrecked sailors to be rescued on Sunday. It sought to annihilate pleasure, to pollute the heart by filling it with religious cruelty and gloom, and to change mankind into a vast horde of pious, heartless fiends. One of the most famous Scotch divines said, "The kirk holds that religious toleration is not far from blasphemy." And this same Scotch kirk denounced beyond measure the man who had the moral grandeur to say, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." And this same kirk abhorred the man who said, "Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system."

At that time nothing so delighted the church as the beauties of endless torment, and listening to the weak wailings of infants struggling in the slimy coils and poisonous folds of the worm that never dies.

About the beginning of the nineteenth century a boy by the name of Thomas Aikenhead was indicted and tried at Edinburgh for having denied the inspiration of the scriptures, and for having, on several occasions, when cold, wished himself in hell so that he might get warm. Notwithstanding the poor boy recanted and begged for mercy, he was found guilty and hanged. His body was thrown in a hole at the foot of the scaffold and covered with stones.

Prosecutions and executions like this were common in every Christian country, and all of them were based upon the belief that an intellectual conviction is a crime.

No wonder the church hated and traduced the author of "The Age of Reason."

Some one not connected with the church had to attack the monster that was eating out the heart of the world. Some one had to sacrifice himself for the good of all. The people were in the most abject slavery; their manhood had been taken from them by pomp, by pageantry, and power. Progress is born of doubt and inquiry. The church never doubts—never inquires. To doubt is heresy; to inquire is to admit that you do not know—the church does neither.

More than a century ago Catholicism, wrapped in robes red with the innocent blood of millions, holding in her frantic clutch crowns and scepters, honors and gold, the keys of heaven and hell—trampling beneath her feet the liberties of nations—in the proud moment of almost universal dominion, felt within her heartless breast the deadly dagger of Voltaire. From that blow the church never can recover. Livid with hatred, she launched her eternal anathema at the great destroyer, and ignorant Protestants hav echoed the curse of Rome.

In our country the church was all-powerful, and, though divided into many sects, would instantly unite to repel a common foe.

Paine struck the first grand blow.

"The Age of Reason" did more to undermine the power of the Protestant church than all other books then known. It furnished an immense amount of food for thought. It was written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system.

Paine did not falter from the first page to the last. He givs you his candid thought, and candid thoughts are always valuable.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Result of Meddling with the Unknowable.

When Mr. Lilly, like another Solomon Eagle, goes about proclaiming, "Woe to this wicked city," and denouncing physical science as the evil genius of modern days—mother of Materialism and Fatalism, and all sorts of other condemnable isms—I venture to beg him to lay the blame on the right shoulders; or at least to put in the dock along with Science those sinful sisters of hers, Philosophy and Theology, who, being so much older, should hav known better than the poor Cinderella of the schools and universities over which they hav so long dominated. No doubt modern society is diseased enough; but then it does not differ from older civilizations in that respect. Societies of men are fermenting masses, and as beer has what the Germans call oberhefe and unterhefe, so every society that has existed has had its scum at the top and its dregs at the bottom, and I doubt if any of the "ages of faith" had less scum or less dregs, or even showed a proportionally greater quantity of sound, wholesome stuff in the vat.

I think it would puzzle Mr. Lilly, or anyone else, to adduce convincing evidence that at any period of the world's history there was a more widespread sense of social duty, or a greater sense of justice, or of the obligation of mutual help, than in this England of ours. Ah! but, says Mr. Lilly, these are all products of our Christian inheritance; when Christian dogmas vanish, virtue will disappear, too, and the ancestral ape and tiger will hav full play. But there are a good many people who think it obvious that Christianity also inherited a good deal from paganism and from Judaism, and that if the Stoics and the Jews revoked their bequest the moral property of Christianity would realize very little. And if morality has survived the stripping off of several sets of clothes which hav been found to fit badly, why should it not be able to get on very well in the light and handy garments which science is ready to provide? But this by the way. If the diseases of society consist in the weakness of its faith in the existence of the God of the theologians; in a future state, and in uncaused volitions, the indication, as the doctors say, is to suppress theology and philosophy, whose bickerings about things of which they know nothing hav been the prime cause and continual sustenance of that evil skepticism which is the nemesis of meddling with the unknowable.—Huxley, in the Fortnightly Review.

Pope Powderly.

From the New York Sun.

Mr. Powderly issues orders like an unquestionable autocrat. He commands the Knights of Labor not to giv any money to the condemned Anarchists, and this he does, apparently, not as a matter of argument and opinion, but as an absolute decree. For our part, we hav no anxiety about the Anarchists, and are just as willing that they should be hanged with their pockets empty as with their pockets full; but it seems a queer thing in this country for a gentleman with spectacles to set up as a positiv lord over the minds and thoughts of thousands of intelligent and self-supporting men, and to tell them whether they may or may not bestow a little alms upon a few poor wretches who are trembling on the brink of the grave.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

The Pilgrims and American Independence.

The Boston Congregational Club held a celebration on the 21st ult., in honor of Forefathers' Day, the occasion being the 266th anniversary of the landing of the ilgrims Pat Plymouth, Mass. December 23d is generally regarded as the day when the landing was made; but this is immaterial. The solemn fact that these old Puritans landed is one which cannot be gotten over.

At the gathering above mentioned, Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, made an address, and, rather strangely, he said nothing about the tariff. At the same time everybody must regret that there was not in 1620 a duty on Puritanism sufficiently high to hav kept it out of the country. Among other things, Mr. Blaine said:

"In a notable paper from Lord Bacon he defines the rank in which men connected with states should be held in history, and in his favorit Latin he gave the founders of the states. One of the most eminent New England ministers not many years since, in quoting that paper from Lord Bacon, gave, I think with great justice, to the Puritans and Pilgrims of New England the classic title of Conditores Rei Publicæ—the actual founders of the republic—and I hav often thought since I hav made personal acquaintance of the Puritans and Pilgrims, or their descendants, not sharing their blood myself, that, if the civil influence can be separated from the religious, the Puritans and Pilgrims hav made a far deeper impression upon civil and patriotic America than even on religious America. They had divisions and sects. They had their share of differences. They were troubled with damnable heresies. They quarreled with neighbors, and had exactly that kind of trouble that belongs to the aggressiv theologian; but when their descendants put into the cause of liberty the real teaching of their religion, they then had for forces the Baptists of Rhode Island, Dutch Reformers of New York, Presbyterians of New Jersey, Quakers of Pennsylvania, Catholics of Maryland, Royal Episcopalians of Virginia, Huguenots of Carolina, and Methodists of Georgia, and they could not hav made that union upon a single tenet of creed, with the exception of their belief in God; so that when Dr. Bushnell spoke of the Puritans as the Conditores Rei Publicæ, he spoke the verdict of history; for, according to Jefferson—coming from a region that did not hav an over degree of admiration for New England men—but for the Adamses, and he specially named John Adams, they could not hav conducted the Revolntionary war, and could not hav made the Declaration of Independence."

It is always difficult to tell what would hav happened if something else had not happened, and no one can ever know whether or not we could hav had the Declaration of Independence without the Puritans. But one thing is tolerably certain, which is, that the Declaration of Independence never would hav been written or realized but for those who were not Puritans. Of the four foremost men in the Revolutionary days, not one was a Puritan or of Puritan ancestry.

Washington was a Virginian, and his ancestors never saw New England, and probably never wanted to see it. If Washington had any religion, it was very far from being Puritanism.

Thomas Jefferson was another Virginian, whose ancestors came to Virginia before Plymouth rock had been pressed by the feet of the Pilgrim Fathers. He was an Infidel, and held Puritanism in contempt.

Thomas Paine was an Englishman, and if anything could be greater than his love for liberty, it was his abhorrence of religious bigotry.

Benjamin Franklin was as far as possible from being a Puritan. He cannot be mentioned in an article on Puritanism without changing the subject.

John Adams was perhaps of Puritan stock, but not of Puritan sympathies.

It will be seen, therefore, that Mr. Blaine's statement that the Puritans and Pilgrims were the real founders of this country is not only untrue, but does great injustice to the actual fathers of our republic. The Puritans did as well as could be expected considering the religious views they held, but the fact remains that while they were quarreling among themselvs, exiling Quakers and hanging witches, others uncursed by their execrable creeds were laying the foundations of political and religious liberty.

Professor Denslow was Misunderstood.

The following note comes from Baltimore, Md.:

"MR. EDITOR: I hav read Professor Denslow's answer to the propositions of the lecturer in the Manhattan Liberal Club. I do not now wish to discuss or criticise Mr. George's or Mr. Clark's axioms of political economy, but it strikes my mind that Professor Denslow, who would consider the lecture of the day as, at least, an intellectual amusement, did not even reach in his answer 'a good way above the minstrels.' Every law scholar will agree with me that the state is more than an aggregation of individuals, and can, therefore, hav rights which no individual can possess. Hence the state, the nation, can hav claims to the land, though man did not make it. Where is the logical absurdity in asserting that the state keeps the land (and landed interests of the nation) in trust for the people, though man as an individual cannot own it?

GEORGE DYRENFORTH."

Professor Denslow may hav been misreported. In condensing a fifteen minutes' address into a few lines it is not always easy to preserve the full meaning of the speaker. Our correspondent's criticism has been submitted to Mr. Denslow with the following result:

"NEW YORK, Dec. 21, 1886.

"MR. EDITOR: Before Mr. Dyrenforth answers my point, he must first see it. At the date of his attempted answer he had not yet seen it. He supposed it to be that the state could hav no rights that an individual does not hav. That is not my point by any means. On the contrary, I assert that the rights of a state consist mainly of those which individuals do not hav. My point is that if labor is the only rightful source of title to land, as George asserts, then land is not a thing to which title can be asserted, except that title is based on labor. It is not a question as to the rights of a state, but as to the ownability of land. George's dogma is, 'Land is not ownable by man, on moral grounds, because it was not created by man.' George says 'it was created by God.' I say it was never created at all as substance. Neither does man create the substance of a chair or table. All he can do is to appropriate its substance to himself, and then modify from something that is useless into something that is useful. This he does also with land. The value of land is due to the demand of society, and not mainly to any labor done upon it by its owner. But so are all values, whether of goods or of labor itself, due to the social demand for them, not to the expenditure of force or effort in producing them. Hence land and labor and all commodities derive both their title and their value from like sources. Title originates in appropriation, and value originates in demand. One economic principle governs them all—they are paid for as they are desired or wanted. In this sense want is mother of wealth, and poverty goes with progress.

"Mr. George comes down with a hard and fast pseudo-theological assumption that man cannot own land because nothing is ownable except by the man whose labor makes it.

"This principle, if true at all, is true as to all attempted owners who did not make the land, whether they be men, beasts, angels, corporations, devils, states, empires, or what not. The land either is or is not morally ownable by a person that did not make it. George has a choice between the two persons, viz., the state and the individual, and says it must be the state. So far as he should say it must be the state from expediency, because ownership by the state causes a more activ production, or a more widespread distribution, or a more equal consumption of wealth, I would be prepared to meet him on economic grounds, for this would be an economic question.

"But when he leaves economics and plumps at us the pseudo-theological assertion that man cannot own land because he does not make it; that God alone makes land, and that no man can hav the moral right to own what he does not create, then it becomes a valid answer to say that on this moral ground the state can hav no better right than the individual, since, relativly to God, the state is merely man, like the individual, and, not having made the land, cannot own it. The land must be left unowned, under George's ethics, to the God who made it. V. B. DENSLOW."

It is well to encourage the discussion, in an intelligent and understanding manner, of the social theories of Mr. Henry George; not because they are in themselvs of any more importance than many other men's theories, but because they are at present occupying more than any others the attention of the public at large. The practical working-out of these theories means the abolition of taxes upon everything but land-values; and Mr. George would hav it distinctly understood that there is a difference between a tax upon land-values and a tax upon land itself, though that difference is not conspicuous to a casual observer. Further, these theories mean free trade, and, according to Mr. James Redpath, the abolition of patents, of collection of debts by law, and of copyrights on books. It may be noted, though, that the publications of Mr. George bear upon the back of the title-page the customary "Entered according to act of Congress," etc., and he is at present receiving a handsome "increment" which he would not hav enjoyed but for the fact that the interest which society feels in these works has created a demand for them. When this "increment" arises from land that society has rendered valuable, Mr. George defines it as "unearned." The distinction is a fine one. It is true that the books are the product of Mr. George's genius, but it often requires as much genius to buy land judiciously as to write a book, and the value of either depends, as Professor Denslow says, on the demand of society.

Mr. George's theories, like any others, should be closely scrutinized before they are adopted. There may be flaws in them.

The First Churches.

"MR. EDITOR: Will you hav the kindness to answer through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER the following questions, viz.: 1. When and where was the first Roman Catholic church founded? 2. When and where was the first Protestant church founded? 3. Was there a Christian church founded before the Roman Catholic church?

"C. H. BETTS."

1. The Roman Catholic church, as its name denotes, was founded at Rome in Italy. Its history is generally traced back to about the year 100. In the fourth century Roman Catholicism was embraced by Constantine, the first Christian emperor, and the sword was brought to the aid of the cross. Catholicism flourished best under the worst emperors.

2. As far as we can ascertain, the first Protestant church was founded in the lower states of Germany, by Martin Luther and his followers, about 1524–1529. The Lutheran church is the oldest of the Protestant sects.

3. History says that when Peter and Paul came to Rome in the year 60 they found a Christian church established there. It is supposed to hav been founded by those who had heard of the alleged miracles of Christ. The scene described in Acts ii, 1–10, is sometimes said to hav marked the birth of the Christian church. The apostles, says the account, were all with one accord in one place. There were the regulation "rushing sounds," "cloven tongues of fire," and other manifestations of that character. The apostles were thereupon filled with the holy spirit, passed under control, as our Spiritualist friends hav it, and used language which surprised the bystanders. They were accused of being "full" of new wine. True, Peter lifted up his voice in protest and said, "For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day," that is, 9 o'clock. But if Peter had fully understood the tenacity of intoxication from the beverage specified he would hav realized the weakness of his defense. It is a well-known fact in the science of over-stimulation that 9 o'clock A.M. is an early hour for the effect of a new-wine drunk on the preceding night to pass entirely away. The scoffers were doubtless aware of this, hence their mention of new wine in connection with the remark that the apostles were "full." Religious people will thank us for thus digressing to point out a fresh illustration of the divine observation that the children of darkness are wiser in their day and generation than the children of light.

As a matter of fact, the time when Christianity emerged from paganism, in which it had its source, is a very indistinct point in history, even admitting that such a point exists. The Christianity of to-day is the outgrowth and descendant of the first superstitious notion that found an abiding-place in the brain of ignorant and barbaric man. The church of to-day is "rebaptized paganism," and its prototype is buried beyond discovery in the dust and ashes of ten thousand years.

Shining Lights.

The attention of the religious world is distracted nowadays from strictly theological subjects, and centered more particularly upon distinguished exponents of Christianity. For instance, considerable interest is felt in the Rev. Mr. Goodell, of Providence, R. I. This gentleman's ministerial conduct toward Deacon Foster's wife has got him into a divorce suit, and Deacon Foster's diaconal relations with Mrs. Goodell hav complicated the matter very much. Which of the four is the guiltiest depends upon the opportunities each has enjoyed for being wicked.

In Philadelphia the Rev. Mr. Messaros is before the Court of Quarter Sessions charged with attempted criminal assault upon a lady of his congregation. The conduct of which he is now said to be guilty cannot be mentioned here, and his previous record is bad.

Over in Brooklyn the case of Father Sherman and his victims comes up occasionally, and Pastor Staunton still holds the public eye; while the Rev. Mr. Downs, of Boston, is as irrepressible as ever. There is no doubt that when these religious lights hav sunk below the horizon of forgetfulness, others equally brilliant will successivly appear.

Right here we would say that Bishop Missionary Taylor is trying to raise twenty thousand dollars for a steamboat to carry Christian morality into the interior of Africa. If Christian morality may be judged by its effects on some ministers, it would, perhaps, be worth twenty thousand dollars to this country to hav it carried up the Congo as far as that river is navigable—and left there.

Locksley Hall Sixty Years After.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson, has written a new poem, entitled "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," and the New York Independent has taken the trouble to hav it cabled to this country. The poem is a long one, containing some three hundred lines of eight trochees each. In the first part of the poem the author devotes himself to a melancholy retrospect. He sees that the enthusiasm of his youth was mistaken. Now he would hav the world stand still. We quote:

"Forward rang the voices then, and of the many mine was one;
Let us hush this cry of Forward till ten thousand years hav gone."

But if the world must stand still, why this attention to evolution?

"Is there evil but on earth? or pain in every peopled sphere?
Well, be grateful for the sounding watchword, Evolution, here.
Evolution ever climbing after some ideal good,
And Reversion, ever dragging Evolution in the mud."

If we are not to shout forward any more for ten thousand years, evolution will get tired of waiting for the procession.

These two lines may be regarded as a shot at the Roman Catholic church:

"From the golden alms of blessing man had coined himself a curse:
Rome of Cæsar, Rome of Peter—which was crueler, which was worse?"

It is not easy to understand what the following couplet refers to. What was the light which France showed, and who is the Irishman that put it out? Let no guilty man escape.

"France had shown a light to all men, preached a gospel all men's good; Celtic Demos rose a demon, shrieked and stayed the light with blood."

It is when the poet touches the evils of the times that he writes the wildest. The notion of human equality is scouted:

"Ay, if dynamite and revolver leave you courage to be wise,
When was age so crammed with menace, madness written, spoken lies?

Envy wears the mask of love; and, laughing sober fact to scorn,
Cries to weakest as to strongest, 'Ye are equals, equal born!'

Equal born? O yes, if yonder hill be level with the flat,
Charm us, orator, till the lion look no larger than the cat;

Till the cat, through that mirage of overheated language, loom
Larger than the lion, Demos end in working its own doom.

Russia bursts our Indian barrier. Shall we fight her? Shall we yield?
Pause before you sound the trumpet? Hear the voices from the field?

Those three hundred millions under one imperial scepter now,
Shall we hold them? Shall we loose them? Take the suffrage of the plow?"

Well, why not take the "suffrage of the plow" as well as the suffrage of the pen or sword? Also as the three hundred millions of British subjects are directly interested in the proposed war with Russia, in which they will be called upon to take an activ part, their feelings certainly should be consulted.

There is too much talk going on to suit Brother Tennyson. The tonguesters may overthrow the English government:

"Chaos, cosmos! Cosmos, chaos! Once again the sickening game,
Freedom free to slay herself, and dying while they shout her name!

Step by step we gained a freedom known to Europe, known to all;
Step by step we rose to greatness; through the tonguesters we may fall."

Following is his ironical exhortation to the republicans:

"Tumble nature heels o'er head, and, yelling with the yelling street,
Set the feet above the brain, and swear the brain is in the feet,

Bring the old dark ages back without the faith, without the hope,
Break the State, the Church, the Throne, and roll their ruins down the slope.

Author, Atheist, essayist, novelist, realist, rhymester, play your part;
Paint the mortal shame of nature with the living hues of art;

Rip your brother's vices open, strip your own foul passions bare:
Down with reticence, down with reverence, 'forward,' naked let them stare.

Feed the budding rose of boyhood with the drainage of your sewer;
Send the drain into the fountain lest the stream should issue pure;

Set the maiden fancies wallowing in the troughs of Zolaism;
Forward, forward—ay, and backward, downward, too, into the abysm;

Do your best to charm the worst, to lower the rising race of men;
Hav we risen from out the beast? then back into the beast again.',

We should say that something needs turning "heels o'er-head," when, as a result of the present state of affairs, such things exist as the rhymester describes a little further on:

"Is it well that while we range with Science, glorying the time,
City children soak and blacken soul and sense in city slime?

There among the glooming alleys Progress halts on palsied feet,
Crime and Hunger cast our maidens by the thousand on the street;

There the master scrimps his haggard sempstress of her daily bread.

There a single sordid attic holds the living and the dead.

There the smouldering fire of fever creeps across the rotted floor,
And the crowded couch of incest in the warrens of the poor!"

The next two striking lines are rather difficult to scan. They are poor poetry. No wonder old Poetry passes hence at the sight of them:

"Poor old Heraldry, poor old History, poor old Poetry passing hence,
In the common deluge drowning old political common sense!"

It will be remembered that in his first poem on the subject plain Mr. Tennyson denounces the lord of Locksley Hall as in every way an undesirable person. Now he says of him:

"Worthier soul was he than I am, sound and honest rustic squire, Kindly landlord, boon companion. Youthful jealousy is a liar!"

The whole tenor of the poem is in favor of that reversion which, as the poet expresses it, "drags evolution in the mud." It is a plea for the established church, for the aristocracy, and for all the conservatisms which block the way of progress. In his first "Locksley Hall" the poet said:

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

The process of the suns for sixty years does not seem to hav had a widening effect upon the thoughts of Mr. Tennyson. The life of an author cannot be called a success when it is a contradiction of his own best and bravest words.

Editorial Notes.

THE Winsted Press has given its readers J. E. Remsburg's lecture on the Sunday question delivered in that town recently.

THE article by Colonel Ingersoll on another page we hav credited to the Investigator. It reads very much like an extract from a speech which Mr. Ingersoll delivered some fifteen years ago for the benefit of the Paine Monument Fund.

As a sample of the intelligence the average editor brings to the consideration of the cases of the Chicago Anarchists the following may be taken from the San Antonio Light, Texas:

"No mere sentimentalism should be permitted to stand for one moment between the men who threw those bombs in the Haymarket Square and the gallows. The time has fully come for all such methods of obtaining redress of grievances, real or imaginary, to be punished as redhanded murder of the most inexcusable and unjustifiable kind. The bomb-throwers are in the same catalog of criminals with passenger-train wreckers who to spite an official will endanger the lives of a whole train-load of innocent men, women, and children."

If this sapient scribe will kindly catch the man who threw the bombs, no doubt the condemned men will help him deal with them as specified. But the men he desires to hang are not, according to the judge who sentenced them, the culprits. There is where the whole trouble is, and that is just what the enlightened public protests against—hanging men acknowledged to be innocent.

THE editor of the Christian Advocate is not satisfied with the result of his labors in the cause of morality. Not long ago he printed a very proper editorial article pointing out the deleterious nature of a letter in the World detailing the proceedings of the Lord and Lady Colin Campbell divorce trial. He has now discovered that "though the strongest terms were used in characterizing the evil, three ladies of respectable position called at the house of a neighbor to borrow his copy of the paper referred to, that they might read the letter denounced." The editor adds, "Nor is this the only instance of which we hav heard." From which Dr. Buckley draws the inference that it is a prurient curiosity rife in the public mind which calls for the vile stuff in question, and that the newspapers are merely filling a long-felt want. At the same time, it is deplorable that the official organ of the Methodists should hav offended against the law which makes the direct or indirect advertising of immoral literature a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment.

A GREAT deal of interest is taken by the Chicago Knights of Labor in the case of the Rev. Dr. McGlynn, of New York. They are anxious, it is said, for a speedy decision in the matter, so that the order will know what to expect from the Catholic church. In an article in the organ of the Knights, in which the labor and Irish landlord questions are discussed in connection with Dr. McGlynn, is the following paragraph:

"When the church strikes at the means of life, and makes it an article of faith that the tens of thousands of Irishmen must toil and starve that a hundred English landlords may liv in idle luxury, it simply drives the great masses of the people out of its fold. Life is a struggle for existence, and when the church proposes to use the religious sentiment and theological superstition of men to make the struggle hard for the thousands, while relieving the one from any struggle, then is rung the death knell of any church. . . . Henry George's theories can well stand the anathema of the church, but the church cannot afford to anathematize them."

The Chicago Knights are evidently made of sterner stuff than their Eastern brethren, their general master workman, or even the leader of the political movement in New York. A declaration of independence of the church would not be a bad thing for the Knights of Labor to draft and sign.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG lectured in Paris, Ill., December 21st. Paris was once the home of D. M. Bennett, and it was here that THE TRUTH SEEKER was first published. Mr. Remsburg met many of Mr. Bennett's old neighbors, all of whom remembered him as one of the most honorable and generous of men.

MRS. H. S. LAKE is speaking at Haverhill, Mass., this month. The first Sunday of January she speaks at the Boston Spiritual Temple; the last two Sundays of January at Worcester, Mass.; the first two Sundays of February at Berkley Hall, Boston. She may be addressed for further engagements in care of the Banner of Light, Boston, Mass.

W. F. JAMIESON is having good success in Denver, Col., where he is engaged for Sunday evenings for six months. He says that he will, however, giv way for any of his brother lecturers traveling through the West, so that they can hav an opportunity to address the Denver people. Notice, several weeks in advance, should be given, so that Mr. Jamieson can respond to the many calls for lectures which he is receiving. He has calls at Abileue, Industry, and Enterprise, Kansas; Osceola, Wilber, and other towns in Nebraska. These calls he cannot get time to fill until spring. He will giv four lectures in Canon City, Col., December 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th; in Black Hawk, two lectures; three in Central City; Loveland, some time in January. He has concluded to make Colorado his future home. He considers it superior to Minnesota as a state—far ahead of it in climate, and more Liberal people than he ever met in any one state.

Literary Notes.

IN the Forum for January the Rev. J. M. Buckley has an article on "The Morality of Ministers." A treatis on this subject is always timely.

ATTENTION is call to the attractiv advertisments of Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," and Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons for Little Folks." The address, 28 Lafayette Place, is appended because after January, 1887, that will be the home of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the next ten years.

HENRY W. AUSTIN will publish in the January issue of the Southern Bivouac an article entitled, "My Pilgrim Fathers." The tenor of the article is widely different from that usually employed in describing these distinguished gentlemen, as the following extract will show: "Some people, the other day, found fault with Mr. Froude for bleaching Henry VIII., but who has protested against the whitewashing of the Pilgrim Fathers which has been going on systematically for two hundred years? Occasionally, 'tis true, at the Plymouth memorial banquets, some gentle speaker gently suggests that while the good old times were very grand, they were somewhat hard and narrow in their religious practices. But such historical heresy is quickly quenched by some historical fountain of eloquent whitewash, and the doubly false, because only half true, pictures of history are disseminated through our newspapers, so that they strengthen the wrong teaching of our school-books."

Obituary.

DIED.—On Sunday, Dec. 19th, at St. Luke's Hospital, of cancer of the stomach, John B. Johnson, weaver, in his 79th year.

The deceased was born in Manchester, England, where in 1832 he activly assisted in the founding of the weavers' union. He was an early convert to the social theories of Robert Owen, and was an enthusiastic advocate of the famous "People's Charter." After the disastrous failure of 1848 he fled to America, where he continued his efforts in the cause of popular progress, and ultimately identified himself with the Socialistic Labor Party, and was its nominee for mayor of New York in 1880.

When recognizing the approach of death he refused the Christian sacrament pressed upon him and declared his complete acceptance of the Positivist religion founded by Auguste Comte. He retained possession of his strong common sense to the last, and passed over to the great majority as a child sinks to sleep. HUGH MCGREGOR.

Letters from Friends.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Now that the pope is mixing up his religion with our politics, is it not time for us to mix up our politics with his religion? Ought men who are the mental and moral slaves of a foreigner to be elected to offices of honor and trust in a free republic? W. H. BENSON.

COLUMBUS, O., Dec. 20, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Glad to see the "Petrified Blasphemer." It's splendid! A copy of the paper containing the account was mailed me to discourage and strike a blow at my pernicious blaspheming, and the same, as soon as read, I mailed you, and am convinced the blow is now the other way—boomerang! Go on in the good work of ridicule; continue the work of illustration. Respectfully, R. H. RALSTON.

HALE, KAN., Dec. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see so much about chess turning to wheat that I hav concluded to add my knowledge upon the subject. In your issue of December 4th Mr. A. Moot says: "I am positiv that he [Mr. Burk] nor any other man ever saw wheat and chess that grew from the same root." I want to say to all your readers that I hav seen wheat and chess growing from the same root, on the same stalk, on the same head; and will make affidavit to it. FRANK WILLETT.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Dec. 2, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 to replenish THE TRUTH SEEKER's magazine on my delinquent subscription, which I think ought to be stopped as soon as the ammunition runs out.

I readily see by the contributions of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the greatest need is organization to more effectually advance liberty, which is the true source of all happiness. Professions nowadays are stale commodities. What you are doing is what moves the world. We must hang together or in the end we must hang separate. PLINY SMITH.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., Dec. 13, 286.

MR. EDITOR: As the presiding elder of the Broad Gauge church, of this place, I am requested to send you $11.05 for the following missionary documents, as per inclosed bill. These documents are to follow a Bible-smelling committee, who has been appointed by the other gentlemen of the cloth—or sky-pilots—of our city to sell or giv away Bibles. Our church, being opposed to the circulation of obscene literature, has appointed a similar committee to circulate documents showing what their Bible really is. This is the first instalment. We shall probably send for another soon.

ELDER ANDREW WILLARD.

SOUTH ROYALTON, VT., Dec. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to express my sincere thanks to you for the last cartoon in your very interesting paper (December 18, 1886). That number ought to be circulated all over our country, to wake up every man and woman to the situation of things in regard to our free speech, free press, and political liberty. Even here in these United States—so called—of America we hav slumbered too long on the brink of a worse than Vesuvius. Catholicism is fast sapping the very foundation of all freedom and liberty. How can our statesmen be so blind to the dangers which are at the door of the temple of freedom? Oh, for a Gabriel to blow a trumpet which would echo through the land, and raise the dead to life before it is too late to ward off a bloody, cruel war!

Please find $1; I wish it were $1,000 instead; but we hav to struggle to take care of our bodies. But the mind must be fed as well as the body, in order to liv and be a blessing in our day and generation.

Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1887 and four copies of the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to giv away where they will do most good; the remainder to help you publish your paper. Wishing you every good that can come to a friend of humanity,

Yours ever, MRS. H. J. SEVERANCE.

LINCOLN, ILL., Dec. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I was just reading about a saloon-keeper buying a church to get rid of it. It was in his way—the law would not permit him to sell whisky so close to a meeting-house. It reminds me of a saloonist in my boy days, keeping a saloon in a church basement, and renting the upper room to a body of good Christians. Some wag, being of the poetical persuasion, placarded the building with these lines:

There's a spirit of joy, a spirit of woe,
A spirit above, and a spirit below;
The spirit above is a spirit divine,
The spirit below is a spirit of wine.

We hav in our beautiful little city a holy evangelical church, run by saloon-keepers—a snug, well-appointed gospel mill, where a beer-drinking priest deals out his stuff to a beer-guzzling laity, and all goes right, as the whole mess is neutral in politics and religion. How reaching and all-embracing our lovely Jesus is! The sins of drunkard-making are washed out every Lord's day, and the bedrabbled linen is cleansed of the blood of the drunkard by the blessed bier of the lamb. How easy things go!—come to the flock, and get this evangelical faith; it covers up all—come in—we will sing; and such a song, and how the melody floats around the holy room! and while the auriculars take up the words, "This is the way I long hav sought," the olfactories gather the sweet fumes of the garden of Gethsemane as they exude from a hundred beer-sotted throats. Oh, our blessed religion is so expansiv! Like a rich man's conscience, it will stretch and never tear. Ask one of these lovely Christians about the style of religion he embraces, and he will put you off evasivly. You will think of the two "nigs" stealing chickens. The one up on the roost says to the one on the ground, "Jim, ain't dis kind er wrong ter carry on like dis?" The one on the ground says, "Pete, dat am a great moral queshtun—han' down anodder pullet!" So they go right along, and follow the priests. The great moral questions are passed over in full faith that faith is the thing most needed. In fact, it is about all that there is, as it were, visible; for the Christian work of our savior is passed over and forgotten—lost to sight in the fashionable scramble to exhibit millinery on living show-frames, in temples with fine carpets, stained windows, and cushioned seats. "Why will not men think?" SLO HYOUM.

MINIER, ILL., Dec. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 50 cents, for which you will please send me one dozen copies of Mr. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon." Some of the good church people hav asked me several times for it.

The Christian church is holding a protracted meeting here at present. The other night the preacher showed us the beauties of the conspiracy between God and Moses against Pharaoh the king and his people. I must say he made a grand fizzle of it. Think of it—God, in the dead hour of the night, killing the first-born in each family, so while there was confusion his good people might escape. Is this not sublime? I was amused last night when I entered the church a little late to find but a small audience, of which a good number were Infidels, and, most of all, one of our most Liberal ladies presiding at the organ helping them out with the music. Would they do likewise for us? In the sermon we Infidels were carried back to the beginning of life, in which connection the preacher made the statement that from nothing came nothing, which we heartily indorse; also, that this country had made great advancement on account of liberty, which again is true. Since the shackles hav been broken, at least in part, from mind, lips, pen, and press, we are glad to note the advancement. I hope to see the day when the balance of the locks and chains will be broken and fall from humanity, which will be sure death to the church.

As soon as we can obtain a good lecturer, we will hold our meetings, where we will giv advanced ideas instead of superstitious sermons. Best wishes to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Brother Heston. Every number speaks volumes.

J. SCHAAF.

MILFORD, NEB., Dec. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: What course does THE TRUTH SEEKER advise, what course does it take, in these gusty times, "presaging the storm?" That is a fine bit of verse of Mr. Putnam's:

You say there is a God above the boundless sky, . . .
What is this monarch doing upon his golden throne
To right the wrongs stupendous, giv joy instead of moan?
'Tis we must build the paradise, and bravely right the wrong;
The God above us faileth, the god within is strong.

I quote from memory, and perhaps quote at it rather than quote it. What is this "god within?" or what are we doing to "build the paradise and bravely right the wrong?" Is it enough to say of all the churches that they are centers from which emanate bigotry, tyranny, superstition, and hypocrisy? that they cause more immorality than morality? more vice than virtue? more greed than charity? That from the smallest and weakest to the largest and most powerful they are a fraud and a humbug, affirming "the things ye know not of," and preaching "the things whereof ye cannot prove?" Must we not hav something to take their place that will promote true morality, hence happiness, charity, "peace on earth," and "good will toward men?" Must we not do all we can for the general welfare? It cannot be exactly true that "the love of money is the root of all evil," but it certainly comes very close to it. And should not we and everybody else encourage coöperation—Socialism—among those who hav sufficient confidence in each other to undertake it, but no law to enforce any such thing? And will not we advocate graduated taxation, government control for the public as well as the stockholders of all public institutions, so that one class cannot—to so great an extent as now, anyway—be the robbers of another or all the others? If not this much, what then? C. M. CLARK.

CARTHAGE, MO., Dec. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: On the 29th of last month, Prof. W. S. Bell paid our little city a flying visit and gave this church-ridden community his lecture on "Liberty and Morality." Owing to short notice, many Liberals in the city and surrounding country did not know he was here, yet a fair audience responded, and enjoyed his lecture most thoroughly. Mr. Bell is a logical, incisiv, and gentlemanly speaker, and his numerous witty illustrations of the shams of Christianity and society often set the audience in a roar and kept the few Christians among them in a good humor. It was an intellectual feast to all the Liberals who heard him, and even the piously inclined admitted that his discourse was able and enjoyable, although they did not agree with him in some things. If he could hav given several lectures here, he would hav drawn crowded houses, as he aroused many careless Liberals, and quite a number of church people seemed disposed to hear the witty Infidel. We found Mr. Bell a very genial and pleasant comrade, and his brief visit here has made him many warm friends. As he is abundably able, and is doing splendid work in the cause of Freethought, we wish him great success. Out of about twelve hundred voters here, there are not less than seven hundred who are Liberals, but, with the exception of a noble few, they are afraid to do anything not agreeable to the church for fear of hurting them in business. Such craven cowardice and niggardly servility is contemptible, and they deserve to be domineered over by the church until they die off and make room for men who hav courage enough to stand by their convictions. This place has eleven God-houses, but only two small factories. Everything is stagnant except the heartless and hypocritical curse of Christianity. Large sums of money are collected at fairs and festivals for the benefit of worthless preachers who enjoy good salaries, and yet we see men tramping the streets in search of work, and little children shivering in scanty rags and half-starved. But Carthage is very respectable, painfully so—aristocratic mediocrity! respectable hypocrisy! Honesty in rags, and muscle and brains begging! Delenda est Carthago! WATSON HESTON.

BLUE SPRINGS, GA., Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav never had an education in school, I never thought that it would do for me to expose my ignorance, though I hav a practical education. I left a mother in August, in 1861, to join Company F of the Eighth Georgia Battalion. I was captured at Lost Mountain, in this state, and was in prison in Camp Douglas, Chicago. From there I enlisted in the Sixth U. S. Volunteers, for the Western frontier. My company was ordered to Fort Douglas, Utah, among the Mormons. On the trip after we left Fort Laramie I became herniaed, and was left at Fort Hallock, in the hospital. I became a cook for the lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth U. S. Volunteers, he taking me back to Denver, Col., and from that I got into the mines at Black Hawk and Central City, Col. I served for seventeen years in the mines.

I came home in 1881. I hav spent $1,300 in prospecting in Georgia. I find plenty of gold, silver, and galena in this county.

For fear I should occupy too much time and space, I will tell you what I want. I want a Liberal chemist. I want an honest man, who can analyze and tell me the truth, so that when he makes a decision I can say on oath exactly what a metal is and the worth of it in gold, silver, copper, or galena. I hav some samples now on hand that I want tested. I hav some that looks like silver and galena, though the party who brought it to me gave me some metal which, they say, came out of the quartz. It is tin, and I don't believe that it came out of the rock. I propose to prospect and open at my own expense until it will pay one dollar a day for a deed to one-half of the discovery of the lode, ledge, or deposit, with all deposits, pockets, and angles pertaining thereto. They will make a deed to this effect.

I hav a history of seventeen years on the western frontier and how I learned to read and write. "The Age of Reason" was the first book that ever I saw that caused me to study. I sent with a club from Quartzburg, Boise Basin, I. T., in 1880, and got the "Life of Thomas Paine," morocco bound and gilt edged. That is my guide to-day. As ever, Your true friend, W. FELT LINDEY.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, OR., Dec. 6, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for next year, and "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen Gardener, and "The Order of Creation," by Gladstone, Huxley, Réville, Müller, and Linton.

You will please conduct your paper as seems best to yourselvs, either with or without illustrations (I like it best with), and I shall be satisfied, as I hav been. Only continue to allow all kinds of Freethinkers to be heard when they debate and don't get angry. Yesterday I went to Brownsville in company with a school-teacher. While passing a beautiful house the teacher noticed and called attention to an elegant, large, gilt-edged Bible which was conspicuous in the bay-window in the second story. I said that it reminded me of some words ascribed to Jesus about whited sepulchers which were clean without but impure within. He said that those impure stories were historical and necessary to complete revelation. I said that I did not see that it was either necessary or of any use whatever for God to tell stories which were so obscene that neither of us would be willing to read them in public. And further, it was blasphemy to accuse God of being their author if he was pure. Blasphemy was mild when compared to the dogma that as in Adam we all died, so in Christ are we all made alive. What could be more preposterous than to believe that an all-wise and absolutely just being either would or could create a pair of beings about six thousand years ago and place them in a garden and forbid them to eat of the fruit of a tree that was there when he foreknew that they had that in their natures which would cause them to eat the fruit, and when at the same time he had given them their dispositions and could hav given them different ones (or else he was not omnipotent), or he could hav left them unmade, or at least he could hav removed some of the temptations or told Adam that there was a very shrewd enemy in the form of a serpent? My friend, the school-teacher, listened patiently and said he would reply when going home if I would listen as long as he had. I promised to listen and did so, but although he talked quite as long, I failed to see that he had refuted anything I had said. He said he should deny my premises, and then proceeded to make some dogmatic affirmations without proof and build an argument on them. If I could see the least bit of reason in them, I could remember them, and would willingly giv them to you. But as I fail to do either, I hope you and he will forgiv me. GEORGE F. ELLIOTT.

ALLIANCE, O., Dec. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Procrastination is the thief of time. I thank you for sending the paper after our subscription expired. We could not get along without it. We hav tried to get some subscribers for you, but failed. Then Mr. Rockhill said, "Send $5 for two years' subscription;" and now I send $5 to apply on subscription, and $3 for I. R. Hains.

I am glad that the second sober thought has prevailed, and Chicago will not write her name in so dark an infamy as the hanging of those seven men would hav entailed. And when, oh, when, will the peoples of the world rise above the barbaric age of the gallows? Is it any better than legal murder done in a spirit of revenge? And we are all made murderers.

No, not all. I, as a woman, hav no voice in making the laws, and I hope that when women hav the franchise one of their first acts will be to wipe from our statutes that most revolting of public crimes, and I here and now utter my protest against it, even if those men in Chicago were worthy of death. But I think, as you do, it should not be considered a crime in our free country for anyone to express his thoughts. Yet there are some thoughts we wish people were educated above indulging in.

I hope you will excuse me for saying that I am sorry you resigned your position with the officers of the Secular Union because some of the Freethinking public misrepresent and misunderstand your position and principles. If reformers wait to be appreciated by those they seek to benefit, the Golden Age will be indefinitly postponed.

If we are truth seekers, we should divest ourselvs of bigotry and intolerance; should be willing to accept evidence, and not let prejudice blind our perception of truth. I suppose the Secular Union has enough work on its hands when it takes the Nine Demands as a text to preach from, to try to educate the people up to a recognition of the justice of the Demands, and also the danger of disaster to our nation when they are ignored. But I think we should seek for the truth on all subjects, and present it through its organ, THE TRUTH SEEKER. In whatever direction we look there seems to be great need of reforms, and so many of these are questions of vital importance to the well-being of the people! We need the light of knowledge shed on the evils of society, and many seekers for the truth in regard to the causes of disease, crime, unhappiness, and the many wrongs that crush out the joy of living—for I believe with Ingersoll that happiness is the birthright of all, or should be.

I must say we read with interest and appreciation of the abors of Watts, Putnam, Remsburg, Reynolds, etc., who nav all spoken for us "allies in Alliance," as T. C. Leland used to call us. I don't see the point when C. Fannie Allyn thinks the Spiritual papers not as Liberal because they don't publish the other side of the question. I don't see as it is necessary for them to; but it would be wrong, perhaps, if THE TRUTH SEEKER should refuse to publish both sides of the subject, or of other subjects of public interest. And, although we are Spiritualists, we appreciated largely Nelson Hunt's poetry, "There is no Death." And Mr. Rockhill says he knows what the Indian wanted of his dog and gun. He could shoot at a mark with the gun for pastime, and the dog was to bark when Nelson Hunt got there. MRS. S. S. ROCKHILL.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Dec. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I must say that I presume that you know your own business, but whether you do or not you certainly hav the right to manage it in your own way, and do what you think is the best for yourself and your patrons. I must say also that I am sorry to see you show so much sympathy toward the Chicago Anarchists. Mr. Editor, when it comes to this, that you nor I can do business in our own way while we obey the laws of our country, it is about time to sell out to some one who likes to do it in the other way. For instance, I am doing a legitimate business, am employing, say, six, eight, or ten men, more or less. Tom, Dick, and Harry come along from Europe (for we know that almost all strikes are caused by foreigners); they say to my men, "You shall not work for Goodell any longer unless you join our league, and charge him a higher price." Now, what right hav they to do that? When the people of our nation hav to submit to such things, can we call this a free nation? Talk about free speech—where is the freedom when you or I are allowed to go through the country talking publicly and advising the people to strike for higher wages, and if the employers don't submit to their dictation to murder them, or burn their property—do anything, but make them obey their orders? You call that free speech? Now, I don't know whether those men who are sentenced to death in Chicago threw the bomb that caused death or not, but if they made incendiary speeches, as has been represented they did, they deserve death, for I hold that you nor I has the right to go through the country exciting the people in any such way. If the ignorant, or any others, accept our advice, and do as we hav dictated and recommended, we certainly are just as guilty as those who really committed the act. Mr. Editor, I think there has been too much sympathy expressed by several writers in your paper, for the good of it. Some people believe, and express that belief boldly, that THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates all sorts of wrong-doing by the Anarchists; but, of course, that is not so, yet I would rather see less of it. I hav long thought I would write a few lines to you on the subject, but now I hav done. THE TRUTH SEEKER I prize much as a whole; it grows better every year. Of course, we must not expect that every article pleases every reader.

I shall send you some money the fore part of the year for the general good of our cause. N. D. GOODELL.

[Our correspondent expresses regret that we should show sympathy toward the Chicago Anarchists. We were not aware of having shown any special sympathy for these misguided and foolish enthusiasts. We are interested in seeing them fairly tried and punished according to their offense. This interest we hav from time to time expressed, and future developments will show whether or not it has been unduly excited. Strikes are a different mattter, the discussion of which, as the story-writers say, may be "reserved for another chapter."—ED. T. S.]

BRONSTON, KY., Dec. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The outlook at present is not encouraging for the great American republic. Unless the great mass show that they understand the true principles of the government of the United States—that is, that the true power of government is based on and derived from the voluntary consent of the governed, and not from any priest, or king, or God inhabiting the skies, or any other place, and that this government, by the consent of the governed, is for their own individual, mutual, and collectiv benefit, that they may thereby enjoy life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness here on this earth and in this life, acknowledging no other power to govern them than their own written Constitution, which may be changed from time to time to suit the advance made by science and civilization—I say that, unless the great mass of the American people truly understand their Constitution, it will not be a great while till we will see our dear republic torn to pieces and governed by a lot of petty kings set up by the "power and grace of God," with such mottos as these everywhere to be seen: "Be subject to the powers that be," "All authority comes from God," "'Tis better to obey God than man." Priests and kings hav always governed, and laid under tribute, and fleeced the great mass by pointing them to a God in the skies, claiming that they are this God's agents, and that unless we do as they tell us, this great God of the skies will, when we die, cast us into a great lake of fire and brimstone where we will hav to burn and suffer forever and forever in a world that will hav no end. Will the priests and kings succeed in getting the great American republic completely under their control? A word or two to the great mass, and I will close. No great civilization can be built up unless it be on the corner-stone of the family. A man and his wife, and their sons and daughters, properly educated, form the greatest and grandest foundation of human society. The ownership of land should be limited to the actual necessities of the individual or company. Trade should be positivly free; church and state forever separate. All property should be taxed alike. The government should find out what amount of money was most healthy for its citizens, and furnish that amount. Our present circulation per capita is not enough. There should be no conflict between capital and labor. Every man should become rich if he can by fair, square, and honest dealing. The doctrin taught by the God of the skies on the subject of riches has caused an immense amount of poverty, misery, and wretchedness to the inhabitants of this earth. It is right that each man and his family should support themselvs, and make property in some way by their own exertions.

I will giv a rule that will make everlasting friends of capital and labor. That is this: Let each man keep an exact account of his business; if he be a daily laborer, let him see to it that when Saturday night rolls around his income is greater than his expenses; if the expenses should be the greater, he must economize at every point. This is a free country. He must change his business and never cease trying until he gets the income greater than the expenses, and then all will be lovely. So of every business. When this rule is adopted, there will be no more trouble between capital and labor. J. N. BROWN.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Dec. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot but note, in reading in the North American Review the essays of Robert G. Ingersoll and Jeremiah S. Black respectivly, the philanthropy and generosity of the one, and the selfishness and maliciousness of the other. I hav especially noticed in the works of R. G. Ingersoll the absence of all that which tends to promote a feeling of animosity in the mind of the reader who may differ from the author in the vital points that are treated of. I hav utterly failed, even once, to find the place and circumstance of his abusing any professor of religion or believer in the faith which he is professedly arrayed against. I hav utterly failed to find the place in any of his numerous works, whether the nature of the work be agressiv or defensiv, where he attacks the character of his opponent or devotes himself to the task of proving the inhumanity and consequently the false motiv of the other. I hav yet to find the passage recording an accusation against any Christian man or woman, either personally or indirectly. In his essay Mr. Ingersoll confines himself entirely to the Christian religion, giving no cause of offense to any professor or believer beyond that which his statements would naturally contain. Upon the other hand, Judge Black regales himself with comments upon the personal character of his opponent, and in many places meets decisiv arguments and statements with invectivs and assaults upon the motivs and emotions of Mr. Ingersoll. This is not gentlemanly, nor is it acting in accord with the claimed divine command of the God whose character Mr. Black is so carefully trying to clear from the accusations of the eminent Infidel. For my part, I think it would be a much more manly thing for any believer, and for Mr. Black in particular, to confine himself strictly to the discussion of the points at issue, as is clearly the aim of R. G. Ingersoll. Then would he meet the Honorable Believer upon his own ground—free from all emotions and motivs which tend to make his arguments pueril and defectiv. Let gentlemanly conduct beget gentlemanly conduct, and so fulfil the law of humanity. Let Infidels and believers alike confine themselvs strictly to the subject under discussion, and leave revilings and personalities to those who can find no better argument or persuasion. As Colonel Ingersoll strikes at the root of Christianity by reviewing the Old Testament scripture and detecting its weaknesses—of which it has many—and placing them before the world parallel with his own opinions and belief, it is necessary, and therefore becomes every man who attempts to meet him openly before the world with the object of confuting his arguments, to meet him fairly and squarely, and attack nothing but Infidelity and the arguments brought forward by him in support of his belief. I know nothing of the personal character of either the one or the other, only so far as the writings of both authors reveal it; and judging from these alone I conclude that Mr. Ingersoll is philosopher enough to deal fairly with everyone and attack no individual personally or in a disrespectful manner. Many Christians, and prominent ones at that—men who should know better, and who should be taught better if they do not know—are guilty not only of disrespect, but of positiv abuse, when the question of their belief is assailed.

Under this score could be named many of the popular divines of the day, among the first of whom is ranked T. De Witt Talmage, of Brooklyn. Mr. Talmage is guilty of using language which would put to shame an honest unbeliever. Indeed, I believe it to be almost a characteristic of the average Christian. Mr. Ingersoll deals fairly with the faith, and uses it no worse than necessity demands. Again, upon the other hand, Judge Black (from the reading) seems to be personally arrayed against his antagonist, and fully meditates total annihilation. The force of his argument is fully lost by his endeavors to convict his opponent of inhumanity and immorality. He completely loses sight of the main theme in places, and entirely devotes himself to making charges which he must certainly fail to prove. Would it not hav been better for Mr. Black to hav boldly attacked the ground-work of Infidelity—shown wherein the unbeliever was wrong, and carefully corrected him, if this were possible—not losing sight of the fact that liberty of thought is the one great object of his opponent's work? Why not show as noble a spirit, and one as free from vindictivness and that spirit of intolerance of the belief of others which was characteristic of the Roman church of the Middle Ages, as does the great apostle of liberty? A calm and deliberate course of reasoning alone will suffice to settle this question in the minds of the thinking people of to-day. Infidelity will exist as long as facts remain substantiated in the minds of philosophers and profound thinkers. If Christians can confute the arguments brought to bear upon the bulwarks of the church, let them proceed to do so at once—however, not indulging in matters pertaining too much to the spleen, nor in the things which pretend to be confutations, but which are in reality only subterfuges to evade the points at issue. If Christianity will not bear the light of philosophy and science, it is not a sufficient thing for men to pin their faith to. If it will, let us keep the fact no longer from the world, but open wide the door of salvation that all may see and enter in. 'Tis true, the world was saved, if the world needs salvation.

If Christianity can save, if it has saved, if it ever will save the world, it is time we were seeing some of the fruits. It is evident that it does not save the people from sin, for here in our own America—the center of Christianity, we might say—we behold a degradation that is appalling. The Christian world is boasting to-day of the churches it has erected, the school-houses it has built, the colleges it has founded, but it neglects to say anything about the asylums it has been obliged to prepare for the insane of its own making, the jails and penitentiaries for the confinement of those it has failed to save, the almshouses it has caused to be built for the benefit of those who are not benefited by this wonderful light of the church. We never hear from the pulpit anything about what Christianity has failed to do. So far as I can see, Christianity is not saving mankind to any great extent. If the Bible is true, three times as many more souls sink into hell every year than soar on wings eternal into paradise. How is this? Of the population of the globe, which is estimated at 1,294,000,000, the Christian world can only claim at its best 371,000,000. Why is this? There are still 483,000,000 Buddhists, and 189,000,000 savage tribes, not including Mohammedans and Hindoos, which are respectivly 103,500.000 and 139,500,000. Then we must still count the Jews, who reject Christ—8,000,000. This looks bad for Christianity, if it is the only true way. She has been in existence eighteen centuries, and do you think she is saving the world? If God is depending on this religion for the salvation of the world, most of the inhabitants stand a poor chance of ever seeing the pearly gates or the golden streets of the New Jerusalem. If she progresses in the same ratio in the next eighteen hundred years, perhaps she will hav made some faint impression on the unsaved of other climes; but we can never hope to see the majority of the race in that land where all is bliss, while hell will be so thickly populated that there will not be standing-room left. When we apply the test of figures, we find that Christianity is not saving the world. Even the ranks of the church are broken, and those she relies most upon are found to be rotten sticks.

If we view the matter from a philosophical standpoint, we must conclude, then, that no system of religion is entirely true; that no one doctrin or creed will save the world; that man must rely upon himself and look to none other for aid; that all the Gods that ever had an existence in the brains of the people never did, nor never can, affect the race one iota. Christianity may sound well when preached from an orthodox pulpit, but when tested by a practical test it is weighed in the balance and found wanting. I am in sympathy with all Freethought movements that are reasonable. I believe that a higher education is needed for mankind. This is all that will elevate and benefit. And we, who hav entered the fields of research, should be willing to do anything to gain that end, and thereby accomplish the good we so devoutly long for. I would force upon the world, if I could, the sentiments so ably expressed by the poet Lowell:

> Be noble! and the nobleness
> That lies in other men,
> Sleeping but never dead,
> Shall rise in majesty
> To meet thine own:
> Then shalt thou see it gleam in many eyes,
> Then will pure light around
> Thy path be shed—
> And thou wilt never more be sad and lone.

This nobleness can only be obtained by strict conformance to the rules of morality and humanity laid down and engraven upon all refined and educated minds.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Children's Christmas Tree.

Come and see, see, see,
Our bending Christmas tree
Full of mystery and splendor
Drooping down and over me;
Full of little lights a-shining
As stars upon the sea,
That our Santa Claus, Claus,
With his funny, furry paws,
Ignoring gravitation
And its laws, laws, laws,
Brought through the gleaming spaces
And the snow, snow, snow,
From a land of northern pines
Where the Borealis shines,
With a radiance almost awful
In its glow, glow, glow.

Happy "time, time, time,"
Says the clanging Christmas chime,
And the bells are sweetly telling,
In a tuneful, rhythmic rhyme,
Of the toys, toys, toys,
For the darling girls and boys,
Though they rend the winter morning
With their laughter and their noise.

Oh! the buns, sweetest buns,
For the merry little ones,
And a thousand hands hav wrought them
Wondrous guns, guns, guns.
Such a clatter and a bang,
Like an army's measured clang
Of jolly soldiers marching
To the strains their fathers sang.

And the dolls, cunning dolls.
'Till the number quite appalls,
That the doting little mothers
Guard from careless haps and falls,
And from Rover's racing raids
Through the gardens and the glades.
These miniature matrons,
In their glossy bangs and braids,
Tending dollies through the chills,
And a hundred other ills,
And, with more mature mammas,
Hav their heartaches and their thrills.

Here are books, books, books
In the branches and the nooks,
Full of pretty, painted pictures
Of the robins and the rooks;
And their little throats would sing
Songs to charm the prondest king,
But they every one are frightened
At Madam Fashion's looks.

Hark the drums, warning drums,
Sound a solemn call that comes
With a thrilling tap to tell us
Of the sorrow in the slums.
Of the silent grief that grieves
Summer morns and winter eves
That so many thorns are scattered
With the roses and the leaves.

Oh! the joys, joys, joys
Of the precious girls and boys,
What makes the home an Eden
But their prattle and their noise?
Bring them in from all the valleys,
And the prairies rolling wide,
From the homes upon the highlands,
Where the summer flowers died;
From the hills of far Europa,
With its castles on the Rhine,
From the western world of sunset,
Where the golden glories shine;
From the snowy, frozen Norseland,
Where the Vikings used to be,
From the flowing, classic Tiber,
And the islands of the sea.
May our love for each be tender
As an angel's falling tear,
Strong to aid earth's lonely children
With our cheer, cheer, cheer,
And the ready hand of welcome
Reaching far or clinging near,
Is the spirit to remember
Just a year, year, year.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-EINCH.

Are Your Hands Clean?

Dora, Nellie, Katie, and Mary were busily engaged in discussing the character of one of their schoolmates, Alice Bradley.

"Oh, she is so vile! She tells fibs and cheats, and she is as cross as two sticks. She talks about people"—and oh, dear, there was hardly a fault known that these little girls did not bring up as being possessed by Alice. In the midst of the conversation, the father of Dora, who was in an adjoining room writing, called, "Dora! Dora!"

"What, papa?" she answered.

"Come here, my child."

She obeyed him, and he asked quickly, "Dora, are your hands clean?"

"Why, yes, papa!" the child replied. "See!" holding up her little white hands, and then ran back to her mates and resumed the conversation about the absent Alice. Each child tried to outdo the other, seemingly, in bad remarks concerning Alice, who had somehow incurred their displeasure.

Presently Dora father called again, "Dora, my child, come here."

Again she ran to his side, when he questioned once more, "Dora, are your hands clean?"

"Of course they are, papa, I've just washed them," and back she ran to listen to the unkind words and to add her own to them about Alice. Their tongues ran on, and their voices rose to a higher key as they rehearsed the evil qualities and bad conduct of the little absent playmate. In the midst of the din of voices they heard the deep tones of Dora's father calling, "Dora! Dora! my child, come here!"

"What is it, papa?" she inquired as she leaned upon his arm.

"Dora, are your hands clean?" he inquired slowly and sternly.

"Why, papa, are you crazy?" asked the child. "Don't you see they are clean?" holding her hands close to his face. "They're just as white and clean as they can be."

"Dora," said her father, gravely, "I thought they could not be clean, nor those of your friends, either, when you are engaged in such untidy and unfriendly work as picking to pieces another's character. Alice is as good a child as either of you, and yet you are making her out worse and more wicked than it is possible for any child to be. My little daughter cannot be engaged in any such dirty work and expect to keep her hands white and unsoiled. Are you and your companions above reproach? Hav you no evil habits, no bad qualities, no wrong motivs or impulses? Think, my child, before you censure and deprecate others, if you are wholly blameless, if you are above criticism, if your conduct is always right and proper—if your hands are clean!"

Dora saw the drift of his meaning, and returned to her companions, pondering her father's words. She said no more of Alice Bradley in an unkind or thoughtless way, but turned her attention, and that of her mates, each one upon themselvs. The lesson was fixed in her mind, at least, forever; and, now she is a woman grown, I heard her say that whenever she was tempted to speak an evil word of another, or think an evil thought, her father's face, long since buried from her sight, would rise before her, and his deep voice would penetrate her ear—"Dora, are your hands clean?"

Let us take the lesson home. It is a good one. Let us strive to keep our hands and our minds clean and unspotted. Let us look for the good in our friends, and not the evil, and liv the good that is within ourselvs.

4.—SUBTRACTION.

From "a figure's outer bound,"
To make it neat,
Take clay reversed or swampy ground,
And leave St. Pete.
Or take direct a jingling sound,
St. Pete you greet.
Four letters, just one-half, 'tis found
You must delete;
And yet, what will the most astound,
The last reversed
Is not the first,
But shows, in brief,
A sort of Asiatic chief.
But these subtracted as I say,
Will always that same name display;
But Pete or Peter, saint or salt,
Whether it be for worth or fault,
"For ye," says Christ, "are the salt of the earth;"
"If it lose its savor," 'tis little worth.
"Remember Lot's wife" is wholesome talk
When salt is salt, and chalk is chalk—
For the pun of our Lord
On this very word,
"Thou art Peter, and on this Rock"—
This petrified fossil,
The cranky apostle,
Who knew to lie, to curse, and to mock—
On him the church of Rome has built,
And guilded his guilt with greater guilt.
Rock, saint, salt, sin, it's all the same,
Our figures outer boundary's name
Will help each chick to crow its grief
For Peter's shame.

Correspondence.

BANGOR, ME., Dec. 12, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written a letter for a long time, so I thought I would amuse the readers of the Children's Corner by telling a little story.

A BAD HABIT.

Lillie had a very bad habit. She would tell lies. Though her mamma tried to make her tell the truth, she would not, and it got so bad after a while that when asked a question she would tell a lie. One day her mamma said that she should go to New York (she lived in the suburbs of the city) in the afternoon. She told her friends that she was going away. "Where—to New York?" "Yes," said Lillie, "and then take the steamer for Europe." One of the little girls was to hav a large party the next day. She thought that Lillie could not come to it, so she said nothing about it, for she did not want to make her feel bad.

That afternoon Lillie and her mother took a public carriage and went to New York. When she came back and found that the little girl was going to hav a party, and had not invited her, she felt very bad. "There! I will never tell any more lies," said she. She was cured of a bad habit.

P. S.—Habit is hard to overcome. If you take off the first letter, it doesn't change a bit. If you take off another, the whole of it remains. If you remove another, it is not t-totally used up. All of which goes to show that if you wish to be rid of a bad habit you must throw it off altogether.

Yours truly, MARIE STEWART
(aged 10 years).

FOOTE, IA., Dec. 18. 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for the Corner. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am six years old and read in the Second Reader. I liv on a farm in Iowa. I hav four brothers and one sister older than myself. I do not go to school this winter. Well, I will close for this time.

Your little friend, LOLA E. OLDAKER.

BRUNSWICK, MO., Dec. 20, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER four or five months and is sorry he did not take it sooner. There are about twenty-three hundred inhabitants here, and there are ten churches. My father thinks that there was never a lecture on Freethought here. I do not go to church, but I go to school. I am a little girl twelve years old, and I think that the Freethinkers are the best and wisest people in the world.

Yours truly, BESSIE ISAACS.

BRADFORD, O., Dec. 12, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see so many letters from little boys and girls in THE TRUTH SEEKER I thought I would write. I am nine years old. I go to school every day. I like all my studies very well. I first studied geography last winter. I like it better than all my other studies. I read the Children's Corner every week, and I like to look at the pictures. Yours truly, CLAUDE SMITH.

[J. R. PERRY.—Thanks for your pleasant letter. Yes, we would like to hav the story, if not too long, for our columns.—ED. C .C.]

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Leadville Piety.

Republished by Request.

I was standing in front of the hotel when my attention was attracted by a dilapidated, antiquated-looking specimen of a saloon bummer, who was passing along the street ringing a bell. At intervals he would cease ringing and shout: "Religious racket right away at the big tent! Roll up, tumble up, or slide up on yer y-ear, for we'll hav a bang-up dish o' gospel talk from Faro Bill, and d-o-o-o-n't you forget it."

Turning to a dapper little gambler who stood near, I asked:

"Who is this Faro Bill?"

"Who is he? Well, now, if that ain't the boss play for high! You kin break me right here if I thought there was a bloke in the mines that didn't know Bill. He used to be one o' the boys, but got capped into a religious game by a slick-tongued gospel sharp about two months ago. He's chopped on all his old rackets, and don't stand in with nothin' that don't show up a Bible or a prayer-book in the lay-out. Billy used to be the boss gambler of the camp, and warn't afeared to sit in a game with the flyest sport that ever slung a card; but he's clean gone on the pious lay now, and seems to hav lost all the good there was in him. The boss mouth-piece of the heavenly mill has gone down to Denver, an' Bill is a-goin' to stand in an' sling gospel to the boys as well as he can."

This explanation, given in the most earnest tone, started me instanter for the big tent. It was used at night for a variety theater, where "artists" of questionable character performed acts of still more questionable decency, and was rented for religious services every Sunday morning. I found the tent filled to its utmost capacity. Many had, no doubt, come through curiosity to see how Bill would deport himself in this, his initial sermon. Upon the stage sat a burly, red-faced man, with arms folded in a careless manner, who looked over the large audience with an air of the most decided independence. This was Faro Bill, the speaker of the occasion. When he arose he glanced around the tent for a moment, evidently collecting his thoughts, and began:

"Feller citizens: The preacher bein' absent, it falls on me to take his hand and play it fur all it's worth. You all know that I'm just learnin' the game, an' of course I may be expected to make wild breaks, but I don't believe there's a rooster in the camp mean enough to take advantage o' my ignorance an' cold-deck me right on the first deal. I'm sincere in this new departure, an' I believe I've struck a game that I can play clear through without copperin' a bet, fur when a man tackles a lay-out like this he plays every card to win, an' if he goes through the deal as he orter do, when he lays down to die, an' the last card is ready to slide from the box, he can call the turn every time.

"I was readin' in the Bible to-day that yarn about the prodigal son, an' I want ter tell yer the story. The book don't giv no dates, but it happened long, long ago. This prodigal son had an old man that put up the coin every time the kid struck him for a stake, an' never kicked at the size of the pile, either. I reckon the old man was purty well fixed, an' when he died he intended to giv all his wealth to this kid an' his brothers. Prod givs the old man a little game o' talk one day, an' induced him to whack in advance o' the death racket. He no sooner got his divvy in his fist than he shook the old man an' struck out to take in some o' the other camps. He had a way-up time for a while, an' slung his cash to the front like he owned the best payin' lead on airth; but hard luck hit him a lick at last an' left him flat. The book don't state what he went broke on, but I reckon he got steered up agin some brace game. But, anyhow, he got left without a chip or a four-bit piece to go an ante on. An old granger then tuk him home an' set him to herdin' hogs, an' here he got so hard up an' hungry that he piped off the swine while they were feedin', an' he stood in with 'em on a husk lunch. He soon weakened on such plain provender, an' says to himself, says he: 'Even the old man's hired hands are livin' on square grub while I am worryin' along here on corn husks straight. I'll jist take a grand tumble to myself an' chop on this racket at once. I'll skip back to the governor an' try to fix things up, an' call for a new deal,' so off he started.

"The old man seed the kid a comin', an' what do ye reckon he done? Did he pull his gun an' lay for him, intendin' to wipe him as soon as he got into range? Did he call the dogs to chase him off the ranch? Did he rustle around for a club an' giv him a stand-off at the front gate? Eh? Not to any alarming extent he didn't. No, sir. The scripture book says he waltzed out to meet him, an' froze to him on the spot, an' kissed him, an' marched him off to a clothin' store an' fitted him out in the nobbiest rig to be had for coin. Then the old gent invited all the neighbors an' killed a fat calf, an' giv the biggest blow-out the camp had ever seen."

At the conclusion of the narrativ the speaker paused, evidently framing in his mind a proper application of the story. Before he could resume, a tall, blear-eyed gambler, with a fierce mustache, arose and said:

"'Tain't me as would try ter break up a meetin', or do anythin' disreligious. No, sir. I'm not that sort of a citizen. But in all public hoo-doos it is a parliamentary rule fur enybody as wants to ax questions to rise up and fire them off. I don't want ter fool away time a-questionin' the workin's of religion; oh, no. As long as it is kept in proper bounds an' does not interfere with the boys in their games, I don't see as it can do harm. I just want ter ax the honorable speaker if he has not giv himself dead away? Does it stand to reason that a bloke would feed upon corn an' husks, when there was hash factories in the camp? Would enybody hev refused him the price of a square meal if he had struck them fur it? Would eny of the dealers who beat him out of his coin see him starve? As I remarked afore, I don't want ter make eny disrespectable breaks, but I must say that I hav got it put up that the speaker has been a tryin' ter feed us on cussed thin taffy, an' no one but a silly would take it in."

Bill glared upon the speaker and fairly hissed,

"Do you mean to say that I am a liar?"

"Wall, you can take it just as you choose. Some folks would swallow it in that shape."

Bill pulled his revolver, and in an instant the bright barrels of numerous weapons flashed in the air as the friends of each party prepared for activ duty. The brevet preacher was the first to fire, and the rash doubter of spiritual truth fell dead on the ground. Shot followed shot in quick succession, and when quiet was again restored a score or more of dead and wounded were carried from the tent. Having secured attention, Bill said:

"Further proceedings is adjourned for the day. You will receive the doxology."

The audience arose.

"May grace, mercy, and peace be with you, now and forever, Amen; an' I want it distinctly understood that I am going ter maintain a proper respect for the gospel if I hav ter croak every dirty son-of-a-gun in the mines. Meetin' is out."

Bad News from T. Winter.

T. Winter now is very sick,
But still his mind is bright;
And whilst his hand can hold a pen,
He is resolved to write.

So all my brothers, far and near,
Who love a brave Freethinker,
Let your friendship now be felt,
And never prove a sinker.

Now's your time to float me on
O'er floods of pain and sorrow;
And what you wish to do to-day,
Leave none to do to-morrow.

My heart is with you, every one,
I wish your lives bright cheer,
But as to me, the way I feel,
My end is drawing near.

Colonel Kelso's Book.

MR. EDITOR: I take great pleasure in seconding the excellent notice by John Peck of John R. Kelso'sgrand book, "Spiritualism Sustained."

I hav but recently finished reading it—and a grand treat it was. I said to my friend, "Whoever sends a dollar for that book and reads but the last chapter richly gets his money's worth." If all of Brother Kelso's books are as ably written as this one—and I hav no doubt they are—no thinker can afford to be without them. I lent the book to a friend, and, after reading it, the lady said to me, "Mr. Mitchell, when you die I want you to will me that book, for it is the best one I ever read." SEWARD MITCHELL.

MR. EDITOR: I see that John R. Kelso is out again with a new work entitled, "Spiritualism Sustained." He handles the subject with the proof at command in his usual masterly style characteristic of all his writings. There is one thing very evident—he proves beyond a question that all the old patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, and all believers in the orthodox religion, were or are Spiritualists, no matter how much they may denounce Spiritualism as a doctrin of the devil, as I hav heard many of them do. Assuming Spiritualism to be a fact, the work will be a very interesting one to those who are fond of such reading. If Mr. Kelso had given his own personal experience in investigating the subject which was the cause of his conversion to the new faith, I presume skeptics would hav been better satisfied.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

The Busts of Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll. Cabinet size; true to life, price, $1.50 each. Every admirer of these apostles of Religious Liberty should hav them.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. panel, 10½x17, $3; boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents; card, 20 cts.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is not a catch-penny get up, such as a pad, belt, pastille, nor magnetic appliance, but simply a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, which cures by absorption. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J. and say where you saw this advertisment.

N. B.—Dr. Fellows begs leave to say that he is an Infidel of the most pronounced character. Bro. Liberals, your patronage is solicited.

News of the Week.

THE eleven horse-car lines of the Brooklyn City Railroad were tied up last week Thursday by order of the Knights of Labor. At the end of fourteen hours a settlement was reached, and the men went back to work. The Knights claim that it was a victory for them.

PETER MASTERSON, a New York alderman, was killed last Sunday by being thrown from his carriage while riding in Central Park.

MORE people got drunk on Christmas day than on any other day of last year. Within twenty-four hours from noon on that day the police arrested nearly seven hundred "drunks."

GEN. JOHN A. LOGAN, of Illinois, the candidate for vice-president on the Republican ticket in 1884, died in Washington last Sunday afternoon of rheumatism and brain disease. General Logan was born in Murphrysboro, Ill., in 1826, and was of Irish descent. He served in the war and in Congress for many years.

THE Rev. Dr. Samson, a Baptist preacher of this city, will hold a "conference of skeptics" every Sunday, for twenty-five successiv weeks, in the lecture-room of the Berean Baptist church, where he will "answer" all questions asked by those who do not believe in religion. Dr. Samson is an able man, but he is mistaken in supposing that he will answer the questions of skeptics. He will merely display his skill at evading them.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND still suffers from rheumatism.

THERE were twenty-six excise arrests in the city last Sunday.

GOVERNOR HILL has refused to commute the sentence of Mrs. Druse.

DR. MCGLYNN, the supporter of Henry George, has probably been suspended from his priestly functions, as he has not officiated at his church for two weeks.

THE Knights of Labor pickets who hav been on trial in Amsterdam, N. Y., hav been held as disorderly persons, and required to giv $250 bail for their good behavior for one year.

A PROMINENT life insurance man in Hartford, Conn., says that his experience and the records of life insurance hav shown him that young men of twenty years of age who abstain entirely from all kinds of intoxicating drinks hav a good prospect of living to be sixty-four years of age, while the moderate drinker, at twenty years of age, can only expect to liv to be thirty-five and a-half years old.

THE Rev. H. C. Higgins, of Kirksville, Mo., an inmate of the state insane asylum there, was found dead on the brick walk which surrounds the asylum last Saturday morning. Higgins had a room on the fourth floor. He had constructed a rope from his bedding and attempted to reach the ground, but, the rope breaking, he fell to the pavement and was killed. He was seventy-one years old, and had been a prominent clergyman in Missouri.

ON Christmas day Mr H. H. Warner, of Rochester, N. Y., made a free will offering to his responsible employees of a choice of $250,000 worth of stock in his business, or the same amount in cash, the decision to be rendered by July 1st, next. Mr. Warner is the founder of the Warner Astronomical Observatory and organizer and director of probably the largest propriciary medicin business in the world. This gift is in line with a purpose which he long ago formed to giv his responsible employees a share in his business when it was successfully established.

THE ORDER OF CREATION.

A Discussion Between
Gladstone, Huxley, Muller, Linton, Reville.
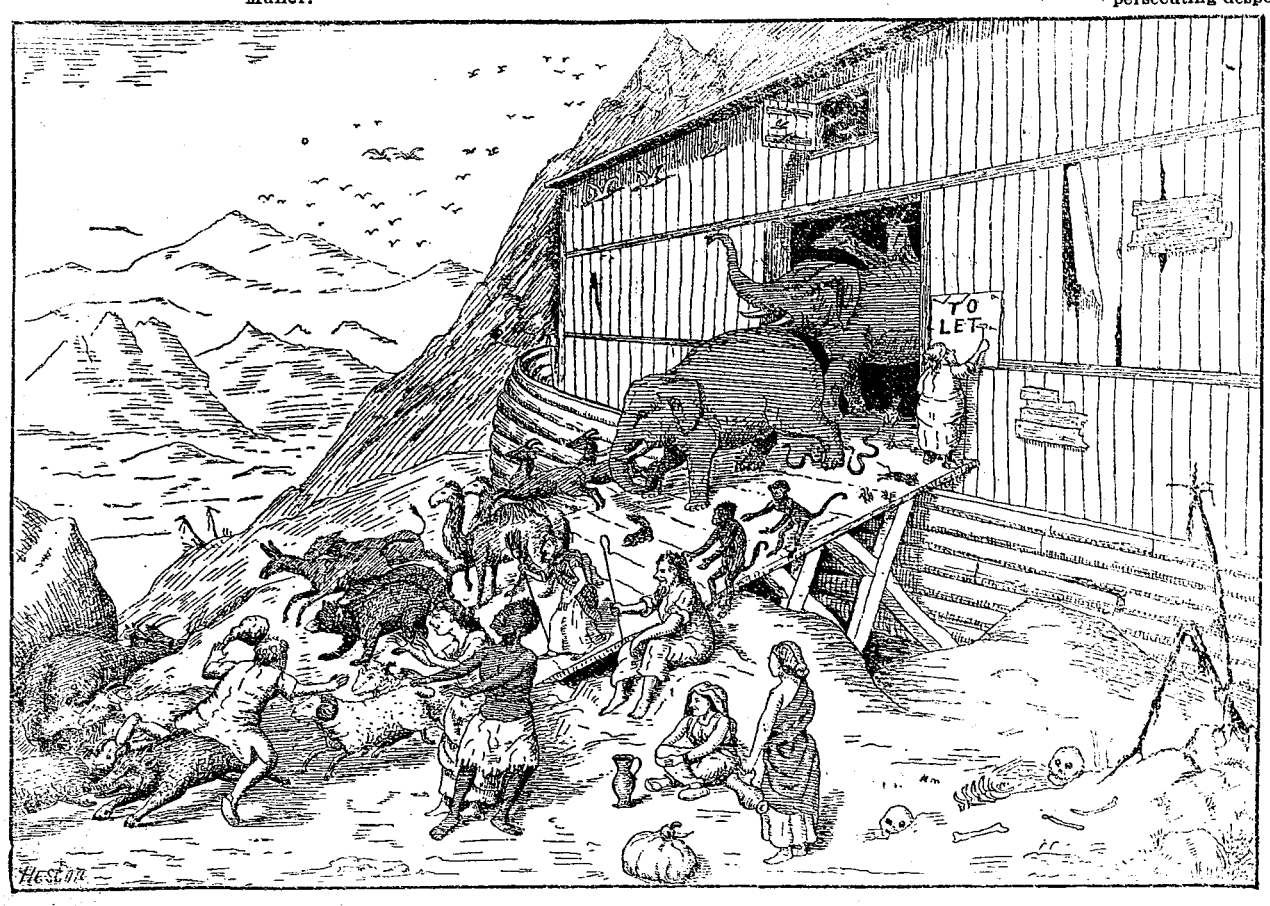
On the Conflict between Genesis and Geology.

CONTENTS:

I. Dawn of Creation and of Worship. By Hon. W. E. Gladstone.
II. The Interpreters of Genesis and the Interpreters of Nature. By Prof. T. H. Huxley.
III. Postscript to Solar Myths. By Prof. Max Muller.
IV. Proem to Genesis: A Plea for a Fair Trial. By Hon. W. E. Gladstone.
V. Dawn of Creation. An Answer to Mr. Gladstone. By Albert Reville, D.D.
VI. Mr. Gladstone and Genesis. By Prof. T. H. Huxley.
VII. A Protest and a Plea. By Mrs. E. Lynn Linton



This is a new book and contains the latest discussion on the mistakes of Moses. The names of the participants are a guarantee of its able character.

Gems of Thought.

THE work of persecution, torture, tyranny, and death to those who dared to dissent, as a matter of course, existed longer in the Romish church than in its offspring, the Protestant, but this was only because its opportunities were more favorable to it. So far as the newer church has had the power and the opportunity, it has shown the same bloodthirsty, ferocious, tyrannizing, and persecuting despotism—D. M. Bennett.

TURNED OUT TO GRAZE.

And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his sons' wives with him; every beast, every creeping thing and every fowl, and whatsoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark.—Gen. viii, 18, 19.

DESCARTES lived and died a good Catholic, and prided himself upon having demonstrated the existence of God and of the soul of man. As a reward for his exertions, his old friends the Jesuits put his works upon the "Index" and called him an Atheist; while the Protestant divines of Holland declared him to be both a Jesuit and an Atheist. His books narrowly escaped being burnt by the hangman, . . . and he was driven into subterfuges and evasions which were not worthy of him. "Very cowardly," you may say; and so it was. But you must make allowance for the fact that in the seventeenth century, not only did heresy mean possible burning or imprisonment, but the very suspicion of it destroyed a man's peace and rendered the calm pursuit of truth difficult or impossible. . . Let those who are sure that they would hav done better throw stones at him. I hav no feelings but those of gratitude and reverence for the man who did what he did, when he did; and a sort of shame that anyone should repine against taking a fair share of such treatment as the world thought good enough for him.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

THE man who in his day was the grandest of Freethinkers; the man who dared question even the authority of Moses; the man who said. It has been said by them of old time so and so, but I say unto you something else; the man that dared utter new thoughts concerning God, concerning practical questions of morality; the man that dared even criticise the very heart of the nation, the temple and its worship; who dared touch the people in the most sensitiv and tender part of their religious life—he has been erected into a despot and set up as an enemy to that which he himself practiced; held up as a reason for our not doing that which he sets us an example of doing in the grandest possible way.—Savage's What Are Brains For?

O FREEDOM! thou art not, as poets dream,
A fair young girl, with light and delicate limbs,
And wavy tresses gushing from the cap
With which the Roman master crowned his slave
When he took off the gyves. A bearded man
Armed to the teeth art thou; one mailed hand
Grasps the broad shield and one the sword!
—William Cullen Bryant.

THE smallest pilgrimage was that to Rome; the greater, that to the Holy Land, by which the palmers obtained remission of their sins and also were shown by the monks of Egypt, Sinai, and Palestine many interesting relics, and vestiges of supernatural events. They were shown the barns which Joseph had built, vulgarly called the pyramids; the bush which had burnt before Moses and was not consumed, and the cleft of the rock out of which he peeped at the "back parts" of Jehovah; the pillar of salt which was once Lot's wife, and which, though the sheep licked it out of shape, was continually restored to its pristine form; the ruins of the temple which Samson overthrew; the well where Jesus used to draw water for his mother when he was a little boy, and where he used to wash his clothes; the manger in which he was born, and the table on which he was circumcised; the caves in which the disciples concealed themselvs during the crucifixion, and the cracks in the ground produced by the earthquake; the tree on which Judas hanged himself and the house in which he resided, which was surrounded by the Jews with a wall that it might not be injured by the Christians.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

To ask for evidence is not generally regarded as a symptom of a diseased brain. Delusions, illusions, phantoms, hallucinations, apparitions, chimeras, and visions are the common property of the religious and the insane. Persons blessed with sound minds and healthy bodies rely on facts, not fancies—on demonstrations instead of dreams. It seems to me that the most orthodox Christian must admit that many of the miracles recorded in the New Testament are extremely childish. They must see that the miraculous draft of fishes, changing water into wine, fasting for forty days, inducing devils to leave an insane man by allowing them to take possession of swine, walking on the water and using a fish for a pocket-book, are all unworthy of an infinit God, and are calculated to provoke laughter—to feed suspicion and engender doubt.—Colonel Ingersoll.

As supernaturalism retires to the rear, and rationalism and a belief in the laws of the universe advance and are looked to for guidance and wisdom, the more the happiness of our race will be secured, and the sooner will the enmity and cruel jealousies arising from diverging religious creeds cease to hav an existence among the sons of men. —D. M. Bennett.

Odds and Ends.

WE hav long suspected Baron Tennyson of having the gout, and his latest poetical feat confirms the suspicion.

THERE is a man out in Illinois whose name is Joseph Gotobed. He is said to be of a very retiring disposition.

A NEWSBOY who jumped from the Brooklyn bridge into the river still languishes in jail. No one will undertake the job of bailing him out.

IN sixteen million years not a drop of water will remain on the surface of the earth.—R. A. Proctor. The outlook for the Prohibitionists grows gloomier every year.

AN Illinois citizen became enthusiastic upon first seeing the Atlantic ocean. "Why," he said, "it's immense! grand! What a prairie it would make if it would only keep still!"

AN austere-looking lady walked into a furrier's yesterday, and said to the yellow-headed clerk: "I would like to get a muff." "What fur?" inquired the dude. "To keep my hands warm, you simpering idiot," exclaimed the madam, crushing him like a thunder storm.

HE was a traveling printer, and being out of employment he hired himself out to a farmer. One day the farmer said: "I want you to set that hen." "How do you want me to set her—full face extended and displayed?" "No," said the simple farmer; "condensed, in a 'box.'"

A LONG head: Mrs. Greene: "Timothy, what hav you done with the letter that was lying on the bureau?" Timothy: "I put it into the letter-box, ma'am." Mrs. Greene: "Oh, provoking! Didn't you see there was no address on the envelope?" Timothy: "Yes, ma'am, but I thought you didn't want nobody to know who you was writin' to."

A MAN of tact always manages to get out of difficulty. The clerk of the parish whose business was to read the "first lesson," came across the chapter in Daniel in which the names Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego occur twelve times, and finding it extremely difficult to pronounce these names, he went through the chapter referring to them as "the aforesaid gentlemen."

FASHIONABLE young woman (to dealer): "I want to look at a cane that would be suitable for a Christmas gift." Dealer: "For a young or old gentleman, ma'am?" Fashionable young woman: "Oh, quite young." Dealer: "Do you know what size hat he wears?" Fashionable young woman: "Five and a half, I think." Dealer: "I see. The largest size will please him best. The smaller the hat, ma'am, the larger the cane."

A YOUNG man living in Arkansas, wrote to his father in Daviess county, Ky., some months ago the following. He said: "A Campbellite preacher once came into these parts and one Sunday afternoon went to see some of the families down in the Lake settlement. At one house he asked the lady where her husband was. She replied: 'He is out hunting.' 'What,' said the preacher, 'Has he no fear of God?' 'Oh, no!' she replied, 'he has his gun and dogs with him.' The preacher then inquired, 'Hav you any Campbellites about here, as they call them?' She replied, 'I really don't know, my husband hunts and kills all sorts of varmints and stretches their skins on the side of the house. You can go and look at them and see for yourself.'" The preacher, of course, did not examin the "varmints'" skins to find a Campbellite, but he no doubt concluded that they needed a missionary in the Lake settlement.

"I DIDN'T intend that you should see it just yet, George," remarked a young wife to her husband, "and I was afraid that you might think me foolish to spend so much money for a chair, but it is so comfortable and luxurious, and I thought you would be pleased——" "Pleased!" he repeated enthusiastically; "why, I am delighted. It's just what I've wanted for a long——" "Oh, it isn't for you, George, dear, it's for mother."

CALLED BACK.

We rather thought, Padre McGlynn,
You somewhat of a goose,
When you came out and stepped aboard
The Henry George caboose.

And now you see we were not wrong,
For you hav raised the dander
Of him who livs in ancient Rome,
Your daddy, Proper-Gander. —Life.

A MOTHER gave her little boy two bright new pennies and asked him what he was going to do with them. After a moment's thought, the child replied: "I am going to giv one to the missionaries, and with the other I am going to buy a stick of candy." After a while he returned from his play and told his mother that he had lost one of the pennies. "Which did you lose she asked?" "I lost the missionary penny," he promptly replied.

A MILESIAN living on Morgan street recently retained a lawyer to procure a divorce for him from his wife. "What grounds hav you for the application?" asked the lawyer. "Well, sor," replied he, "me wife, Mary Ann, was a widdy fwhin I married her, an' she diz be blowin' in the wages I makes at the gas foundhry fur masses fur her other old man, an' I can't be shupportin' her here and him in purgathory at all; that's me case, sor, an' I want th' bill afore next pay day."

"How marvelous this charm of Christmas time," said a lady to her husband. "There is something in the very air that thrills, and kindles, and ennobles. How can anyone deny the divine origin of the day in the face of this universal kindly feeling, this 'good-will toward men,' that can only be heaven-born." "Yes, indeed," he replied. "What is it you hav there, my dear?" "It's the satin lining for the table scarf I'm making for Mrs. Crabapple. She sent me a bureau cover last year with common silesia, and I fancy that when she sees this four-dollar lining, she will feel cheap enough."

Notes and Clippings.

WARNINGS multiply. While standing during the opening prayer on Sunday, Dec. 26th, with the congregation of the Winter Hill Congregational church in Somerville, Mass., of which he was a member, the Rev. Dr. S. H. Keeler, a man of 86 years, fell dead.

JUDGING from the way money is coming into the benevolent treasuries of the various denominations, it looks as though a good many people were spelling missions with an o—o-missions. By-and-by, if things go on in this way, it will be oh-missions! It is a bad spell.—Chicago Advance.

ABNER MAGOUN, of South Hanover, Mass., visited New York a short time ago, and took rooms at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. He is crazy on the subject of religion, and imagins that he is a savior like Jesus Christ. He made known his divine mission, and was committed as a lunatic. Nineteenth-century messiahs meet with poor encouragement.

ARTHUR E. SAUNDERS and Alfred W. Granger, of Westfield, Mass., were recently arrested for violating the "Lord's" day by fishing for pickerel through the ice at Southwick ponds on a Sunday. At the trial they produced several witnesses to prove that their catching of a fish was a work of charity, and was not done until attempts had been made to buy one to satisfy the craving of a sick woman. One of Southwick's doctors testified that he had ordered a fish for young Saunders's mother, who was recovering from a serious illness. The young men were discharged.

No attention is paid in New Orleans to the new Sunday closing law, and no effort is made to enforce it. A law will not avail much unless there is public sentiment back of it. Sunday is the busiest day of the week there for the theaters, and for many of the stores, while cocking-mains and other such amusements are publicly advertised for that day.

IT is now definitly settled that Father McGlynn is suspended from his clerical functions. Whether or not he will go to Rome has not been made public. The best way for Brother McGlynn to put the matter at rest would be to send the pope his address, with an invitation to call the next time he comes to New York to see the city, and then await results.

THE following statement is by a Catholic bishop of France, and its accuracy is attested by a writer in a Protestant journal of this city: "We need not deceive ourselvs, gentlemen; the mass of our people is no longer Catholic except in name. The majority are pure Deists, if they are not avowed Materialists. The special doctrins of Catholicism are no longer held except by a continually decreasing number of the laity."

THE Philadelphia Inquirer says, sarcastically: "Among the demands of the striking street-car drivers in Brooklyn is a recognition of the dogma that 'if a man is compelled to work for a living he is nevertheless a man, and should be treated as such, and not as one of the brute creation.' These men are preposterous. Street-car horses never make more than two or three trips a day; they are well fed and comfortably housed, all at the company's expense, and we should like to hear of a street-car company that treats its men as well. Not want to be treated as brutes! We venture to assert that the company never had the remotest intention of treating them that way."

AT a meeting of the St. Louis Evangelical Alliance, a resolution was presented saying that since the recent resolution of the Alliance condemning the ballet had seemed to imply an approval of the opera, and thus tended to the disparagement of the character of the Christian ministry and Christianity itself, therefore the Alliance heartily disapproved of all theatrical plays and performances whatsoever as worldly and carnal divertisments, unbecoming the Christian character and conversation; that they disapprove of the opera, because the art of music was invariably more or less combined in it with carnal and worldly displays, and that they warned the members of their churches not to frequent the opera in any place, or any other theatrical display apt to make people worldly, carnal, sensual, and criminal.

THE trustees of the chief public museums of this city seem to be seriously considering the question of Sunday opening. Such a consideration can lead to but one result. This is a result for which those who favor a rational and humane observance of Sunday by those whose only day of leisure it is can afford to wait. Among the trustees of the Museum of Natural History, Mr. Morris K. Jesup seems to be the most strongly opposed to the Sunday opening. His wishes are entitled to special respect because the museum owes to him what those who are able to inspect it on week days know to be one of its chief attractions—the admirable collection of native woods. If he should be outvoted, it would be feasible to screen the collection from the sacrilegious gaze of Sunday visitors, or to put up a placard setting forth the wish of the giver that his gift should not be looked at by them. Such a request it is not lightly to be supposed that they would disregard.—Times.

THE New York excise commissioners hav decided not to license places of amusement in the vicinity of churches. They should hav added, especially Catholic churches, since the Catholic church runs New York. The decision was rendered in the case of Webster Hall near St. Ann's church. The proprietor is a Jew, and probably objected to buying his license of the priest. Hence the priest protested, and the license was refused.

A METHODIST clergyman of Chicago has prepared an Index Librorum Prohibitorium, which he submitted to a council composed of his fellow-ministers. The Index includes, among others, the works of Charles Dickens, François Voltaire, Ernest Rénan, Oliver Wendell Holmes, George Elliot, Matthew Arnold, and Theodore Parker. The writings of these authors hav, according to the reverend censor, been injurious to the minds of their readers, and it is likely that, if he possessed the power, he would hav them publicly burnt after the manner of the inquisition and of John Calvin. The Chicago Times remarks that "the author of the new Index is probably one of 'those well-intentioned persons,' of whom Dickens spoke, 'who do not perceive the difference between religion and the cant of religion, piety and the pretense of piety, a humble reverence for the great truths of scripture and an audacious and offensiv obtrusion of its letter and not its spirit in the commonest dissensions and meanest affairs of life.'"

The New God.*

Again, the God of the future must be a limited God. An unlimited God is no God at all. The moment anything becomes unlimited it ceases to be an object of thought, and becomes as nothing. Practically, it is nothing. We cannot think infinite space or infinite time—and there is no such thing for us. Real space and real time, that which we can picture, conceive, imagine; that which is related; that which contains things, events, persons, powers, are finite, are bounded, are limited. We can think nothing else. So with God. If we are to hav a real God, he must be subject to limitations. He must be hedged in, or we cannot picture him—there is no thought of him. An infinite God is an infinite nonentity—a mental negation. He is of no use. Nothing is just as good as the infinite. Neither is definable, and so neither is serviceable. The finite is the practical. Mankind has never been satisfied with a limitless God. The doctrine of the trinity is an attempt to break up the barren conception of infinite being—to give some outline and color, some relation, some companionship, to God. The trinity was an endeavor after a conceivable God, after limitation, and comprehension, and imagination. All the glorious picturesque deities have been limited finite deities. There is no poetry in the infinite. You cannot put it into a single dramatic situation. It has no incidents. To give a chance for poetry, passion, pathos, sublimity, there must be three at least, and not one. Man is compelled to believe in a triune—that is, a divided, limited, bounded, related God—in order to believe in any God at all. Such is the assertion of orthodoxy itself. There must be a trinity, it affirms, in order to have a God that can by any possibility be recognizable by the human mind. Every religion must have more gods than one, or it would die of starvation. It would have no spiritual or intellectual nutriment. Art must have a thousand gods. As Goethe says, polytheism is necessary to art. It must have gods many and finite. The gods of Greece—they are the gods that make art, poetry, romance; they are the gods that make music, that fill the heavens with color, that make all nature a storehouse of wondrous pictures and imageries; they are the gods that haunt hill, and dale, and piney grove, and sparkling fountain; they are the gods that we see flashing gloriously in the dim woods, or resplendent on the mountain heights; they are the gods that sit upon the clouds or build palaces in the evening sky; they are the gods that wheel the sun on its glowing round, or pour the glittering moonbeams; they are the gods that come to human sense, that radiate in the human mind, that thrill, enchant, till poesy becomes the voice of every bosom, and genius kindles the imagination of the rudest worshiper. Christian theology was no improvement upon the magnificent mythology of Greece.

When Pan bade farewell to this world and Christ appeared, poetry ceased to be for centuries, and art was entombed in a sepulcher more lasting than that of the son of Joseph. The soul of man wandered amid the barren speculations of the philosophy of the infinite, and there was no light and joy for the common way, only so far as Greek mythology remained in the face of Jesus, and the blessed halo of the Virgin Mary. In the new God we must have the splendor, the vividness, the distinctness, the imagery of the Greek mythology. We must have a God limited, comprehensible, understandable—a God of outline, of color, of relation—a God that is something, not nothing; that is physical, not metaphysical. We want a man-God, and not a shadow-God.

So, again, I say, the new God must be a thoroughly human God. He must be anthropomorphic. He must have body, parts, and passions. He must be like ourselves, for we make him out of ourselves. His substance is humanity and all the noblest qualities of our own being. His virtues are our virtues, his thoughts our thoughts, his feelings our feelings. He is our representative on the hights of life, woven from every fiber of natural existence. He is our image, thrilled with our life-blood, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. The gods of poetry, of art, are always human—intensely human. The divine is but the concentrated elixir of the human. All the gods are earth-born, and they mount the skies. They go from earth to heaven. This is the constant procedure. No God ever came from space any more than a tree or a flower. Every God smacks of the soil. He grows from it, and holds his title to divinity from the natural power that glows within him. Christianity was compelled to have its earth deity or it would have died on the dreary shores of speculation. It had to have its Jesus—the son of man—with the face of a man, the heart of a man, the brain of a man, who could eat, drink, sleep, walk, and talk like the rest of us. All the worship of Christianity has gone to Jesus or to Mary. The Father and the Holy Ghost have been constantly neglected. All warmth of affection, all glows of feeling, have been poured out upon the earth deities. They have had the poetry of the church. The glories of art have clustered around them. They are the fountains of perpetual interest. They are the sources of enthusiasm. Christ has always been the power of Christianity.

> In the cross of Christ I glory,
> Towering o'er the wrecks of time.

This is the song of religion. It could have no song, no rhythm, no movement, no dynamics, without this human picture—without this man like ourselves—made ideal and beautiful in suffering and glory. Every God has been a man-god, and must be. It is not the fault of religion—it is the eternal necessity of nature. Man cannot worship an abstraction; he can not bow down to the unknowable; not knowing, he does not care. Man will worship only what he sees and knows. He can worship nothing else, he can love nothing else, he can aspire to nothing else. Man cannot wish to be other than himself. This is impossible. He cannot think of anything greater than himself. His gods, therefore, are simply himself—ennobled and majestical, with ampler conditions—but still himself. In the bosom of every deity beats his burning heart; in the brain of Jove and Jehovah radiates his glittering mentality. We cannot violate this law in the making of our new God. He must be entirely human. We must make him in our own image, or we cannot pronounce him good. He must be our fellow-being; he must be made of our affections, of our sympathies, of our aspirations, of our thoughts, of our virtues. He must be the transcendent expression of simple human nature; he must be with man and of man; no less than, no more than, man; the choice extract of humanity; the intensification of our mortal being.

Moreover, the God of the future must be an imperfect God. A perfect God would be a perfect failure. Perfection is the beginning of decay. It is the end of progress. It is nothingness; for after perfection there is no more—no more life, no more growth, no more struggle, no more attainment. Perfection is death. A perfect God would be a dead God. He would do nothing; he would be nothing. Imperfection is the condition of life. It is the source of all wisdom, of all energy, of all labor. It is the creative power; it is the soul of evolution. With imperfection there is something to attain—there is a future, there is a best. With perfection there is no future, no best, no charm. Imperfection is the artist, the poet. It shapes and reshapes. It is never satisfied. It eternally goes on. It is forever new, forever bright. It is what makes folks interesting, and God among the rest. I don't like perfect men and women, if there are any. They are altogether too nice. They cannot keep you awake. They have no points. They are so smooth that there are no electric flashes. They never stir you. Perfection is the height of stupidity and dullness. We never want to reach it. It is like putting on grave-clothes. Imperfection is the salt of the earth. It keeps things fresh. Mistakes and failures are the occasions for growth and new power. To fall is to rise; to go wrong is to create a greater motive to go right the next time. We gain wisdom by being compelled to experiment. An infinitely perfect being could not be a wise being. He would have no power of choice. He would have to do right, whether or no—like a machine. All perfection must be mechanical perfection. There can be no intellectual or moral perfection. In the very nature of things it is impossible. Wisdom involves choice—decision. It means that one can go wrong, and does go wrong, and so finds the better choice, the nobler decision. This is the road of virtue. It is up and down, down and up; it is failure and gain; it is folly and then wisdom. The wisest man has some time been the biggest fool. If he had not been the biggest fool he never would have been the wisest man. That is the way he got his wisdom. He learned it by his folly. Our mistakes are our best teachers, our defeat is our discipline, our weakness is our strength. Pain is the mother of progress, ignorance compels information. We toil because we are dissatisfied; we push forward because we see the better; we seek the future because it is more brilliant than the past. Our errors are the spurs to activity, our sins are electric batteries that make us more splendid men and women—they give the sparkle and the vim. It is sin that makes the wine of virtue. Take away sin, and virtue would be like wax, something to be molded, not a fiery impulse. I do not want perfection. I want that which is always growing—growing better, wiser, nobler, truer—and this cannot be except by constant imperfection. Of course we don't want the same imperfection. Variety is the spice of imperfection, as of life itself. We must not stay where we are; we must change; we must pass from one imperfect state to another. To remain inactive is the infinite curse; to be to-morrow exactly what one is to-day is a damnable iteration. Better change for the worse than not change at all. Do something different. If you cannot get a new virtue, then get a new failing. You thus improve your possibilities, if not your real gain. Change is life; and life, in the end, is moral advancement.

The New God must be a growing God, a changing God, a God of life; not the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, but different, because he advances, because he reaches the new, the better, and the nobler. Only an imperfect God can be the living God—more beautiful to-day than yesterday, grander to-morrow than now; a constant attraction, because a constantly new quantity, widening and brightening with the fresh horizons of the world. The New God is not far off, but close by—just a little ahead of us—just a little better than we—"not too bright or good for human nature's daily food." As we advance, he advances; as we grow, he grows; as we attain wisdom, so does he; as we acquire virtue, so does he. He is simply a little farther along than ourselves, that is all; not enough to discourage, but encourage—just enough to keep our spirits up, so that we keep on trying. A perfect God would be of no avail, but an imperfect God, striving along that upward path that we ourselves attempt—a beautiful, glorious, entrancing picture of what we mean to be—our heart's sweet hope—that God, the deepest of ourselves, the highest of ourselves—ourselves in disappointments and in victories—this is the God to which we surrender ourselves with reckless joy. Through this God we triumph over fate; through this God we scorn death and disaster; through this God life acquires worth; through this God there is eternal progress.

Again: the New God is a result, and not a cause; the product of the universe, and not its maker; the createe, not the creator; the outcome of things, and not the beginning. The question of original cause must forever be abandoned. We cannot discuss it. A great first cause is not in the vocabulary of science. It is a shadow and a myth—a fleeting imagery. Travel far as we may, it is still unattained. We know nothing of the origin of what is. We simply know life itself. That is the fundamental term. Life is, and always was. We trace its path, but not its source. There is only evolution, process, motion, change. Nature is an eternal fact. That wall we cannot scale. What is on the other side no mind, however vast, can discover. We know not there is another side—that there is anything more than phenomena. Nature as a fact breaks in lines of law upon the brain of man. Law is our interpretation of nature—our way of accepting facts. It is our impression of things, and so our guide, and the best we have. But man is the law-maker, not nature. Nature gives facts, not law. Law is our intellectual method, the classification of our intelligence. Nature is fact, ever on the move, uncreated and indestructible. As law is the result of that fact in man's mind, so God is a similar result of the same fact in conjunction with humanity. There is no God to begin with, any more than there are fruit and flower—any more than there are sea and sky. These come, and so God comes. This is the only possible God there can be—a created God. In the long process of time, choice elements may prevail, and a superior and splendid power appear. God, if there were one, could not make a universe, but the universe might make a God. And such might be the New God—not the cause, but an effect; not antecedent, but consequence; not going before, but following after; not the root, but the blossom; not the prologue, but the epilogue to the immeasurable drama of the world, or rather an overture in the orchestration of manifold existence, not to be played until after the instruments are tuned. It has taken millions of years to tune the universe to the right pitch in order that a respectable deity might be introduced. The older the universe the nobler the Gods. As wine improves with age, so does the God-element in humanity. It works itself clear; the lees settle, and the diamond sparkle discloses the subtlest flavor of excellence.

Having our new God, with the characteristics already noted, the question arises where to locate him. Shall we find some beautiful star for his residence? Shall we build him a palace in the sky? All Gods hitherto have been objective and parts of the natural world, and when they have disappeared as entities and remained as ideas or principles, still they have been put in the outward universe. Go where we will, however, there is no throne of God. The telescope discovers no deities. The divinities vanish as the stars multiply. If the undevout astronomer is mad, so also is the theological astronomer. He needs no God. The dissolving nebulæ are the vanishing points of the miraculous. The glasses of the telescope, like a burning focus, destroy every vestige of creation, and discover only evolution. There is no dwelling place for deity in the outward world—not in evening's gold or morning's fire—not in star or sun, not in wind or wave, not in forest or hill, not in grotto or fountain's play. Man makes the bubble divinity. It floats awhile in the air. It catches the thousand colors of heaven—more beautiful than all gold and jewels; but it is only a bubble blown by man himself—his breath made it, and when Galileo's instrument swept the starry skies it smote that bubble and it can never flash again. The universe sparkles with divinity only in the effervescence of our own consciousness. Strive as we may, we find no God in nature; no fatherhood, no motherhood, no love, no mercy, no goodness, no justice. Matthew Arnold endeavors to save a resemblance of God in the phrase, "The power, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness." There is no such power. There is no righteousness in the universe outside of humanity—not a particle. Man is the only wise and good being that we know anything about. The stars are not righteous. They do not represent virtue. The sun is not good, nor the sea, nor the winds. Nature in her essence is absolutely indifferent to all morality. She cares not for beauty even. The beauty of nature is woven from our imagination. Take away our thought, our sense, and the magnificence of beauty disappears. Its home is within, not without. So with goodness; all goodness is human goodness, all virtue is human virtue, all wisdom is human wisdom, all righteousness is human righteousness. Matthew Arnold's phrase is only a remnant of savage faith. The pure intellect disdains it. The pure intellect knows that nature is neither right nor wrong, neither good nor bad, neither righteous nor unrighteous. Nature has neither heart nor brain. There is no intelligence in nature, as we understand intelligence; no thought, no purpose, no choice, no wisdom, no design, no progress, as we understand progress. Nature is no better to-day than she was yesterday, and no worse. Nature does not grow—I mean in substance. She simply changes her form, and for no reason that we can give—or nature either—and I suppose that is why we call her Dame Nature. She does not reason, she does not provide. She does nothing except simply be, and glance from mask to mask of eternal mystery. Ingersoll says that nature—simply nature—has no sense. Does it not seem so? She makes idiots; the blind, the lame, the halt. She makes disease catching instead of health. She makes millions of creatures to prey upon millions of other creatures. She makes death the most infinitely cruel and senseless thing that is possible to be. Nature is wasteful—a miser in regard to happiness, but a prodigal in regard to life. She wouldn't deviate a hair's breath to save twelve hundred millions of human beings.

We cannot trust nature; she must be constantly watched. We have to carry umbrellas to ward off her sun and rain, wear overcoats to shield our bodies from her storm and cold, and shoes to keep clear of her mud and thorns. Every stitch of clothing is an argument in favor of Atheism. It proves there is no God. The shirt that the theologian wears is a protest against his creed. If he thoroughly believed his theology, he would go naked and unshaved. A new suit of clothes is a fresh argument against deity. Every time we shave we cut the friendly acquaintance of nature. Every tailor, every mason, every barber, every shoemaker, is practically Atheistic. They flourish because they take the place of God, and do what he ought to do. Even the minister's gown and cardinal's hat are anti-theological, and flout the metaphysics of the sermon. Every drug we take, every dose of medicine, every doctor's case of instruments, every pharmacy, are demonstrations of nature's unrighteousness—they are means of warfare. We are always fighting nature. We must do it in order to live. On sea and land, on the farm, in the shop, in the laboratory, in the hospital, at breakfast, dinner, and supper, when we lie down at night, when we get up in the morning and wash our faces, when we build the fires, everywhere except at the church and altar, we are fighting nature, trying to get the better of her, to gain an advantage. At the church and altar there has been a kind of armed neutrality. Theology has been an attempt to reconcile man with nature—at the expense of man and for the glory of nature—in her rudest aspect, as witness Bishop Butler's "Analogy," the greatest of theological arguments, and which contains the substance of all theology. Butler's argument is this, that nature herself is orthodox. Therefore if we believe in the benevolence of nature, we must believe in the benevolence of the orthodox God. The only answer to Butler's Analogy is Atheism. The attempted reconcilation fails. Man will not agree with nature. He cannot without being a slave, a savage. Every stroke for civilization has been a battle with environments. The first plow wounded the heart of nature in man's behalf. The first boat was the signal of liberty from her land forces. The first sail was a flag of defiance to the winds of heaven; the first steamship put its mailed breast against her waves; the first telegraph conquered her lightnings; the first telephone gave man a chance to talk back, and say his say in spite of thunder; and the electric light is a proclamation that we can do without the sun and make our own day if need be. Nature is not divine. She gives no God, no righteousness—only eternal force, eternal fact. Nature does not even give law. Man gives law by the action of his own mind—no brain, no law. Man infuses into nature that order which to him is so admirable. So nature, bare, simple, outward nature, is no palace for the new God. He is in the realm of mind only, in the heart and hope of man. He is subjective, not objective, and becomes an objective power, law, righteousness, wisdom, providence, virtue only through the struggle of man. The God element is a human element. It is ideal, not real. It is a process, not a thing. It is not entity, but movement. It is essentially spirit, that is, motion. It is not existence per se, but a mental exhibition of it. It is a stream of tendency, the ideal, the choice moments of existence, the survival of the fittest in man's mental stages, the stored memory of the race of all that is good and beautiful, the magnificent power and presence accumulating through innumerable centuries; the splendor of heroism, the beauty of love, the grandeur of justice, the glory of mercy.

The poet has sung of this until his melody has recreated earth and heaven, and the sun has been made beneficent, and bursting with Apollo's music; and the moon is the lovely Diana, and the stars her glowing nymphs; and the forests, and the rivers, and the ocean caves, and the blue dome have radiated with effulgent forms. The painter has painted this, and the sculptor has carved it. It has rolled forth in mighty symphonies, amid whose jubilant notes joy wings its flight like a bird. In himself man has always found the glorious consolation; in himself, the sovereign majesty; in himself, the throne of the invisible; in himself, the luster of creation's dawn, and all the wonder that will be. There is no outward God. In ourselves we find the brightest and the best—in ourselves, not as individuals simply, but as one grand humanity. The sorrows of life, the pain, the disease, the death, the awful force of nature constantly thwarting, the vastness of space wherein thought sinks trembling, bind us together in a noble comradeship, such as no deity could do.

Because there is no God, therefore the strong shall aid the weak, therefore the skilful shall help the ignorant, therefore health shall administer to disease, therefore affection shall be more sweet. Atheism makes the sublimest moral motive. It is the nurse of the most splendid virtues. Because there is no power above us we are to be our own providence. We invent. We build. We reconstruct. We remould. We plant. We reap. On the vast fields of nature we combat with her thousand forces, and under the flag of our united humanity make our homes, amid the harvests that our hands have wrought.

Grander than all is our humanity, and the New God is not above humanity, but in and of it, the brilliance of its flowing life. In the making of the new divinity we reverse the plan of ages. The New God is subject, not sovereign; servant, not master; an instrumentality, not a king of heaven. He is for use, not for ornament. He is finite, not infinite; human, not superhuman; imperfect, not perfect—a struggling, growing, achieving God—a changing God. Man is the maker, and the power and authority of God are derived from man himself. So long as this God represents the ideal of humanity—the beautiful, the sublime, the progressive—so long as it grows better with experience and is thoroughly humanitarian, so long as it makes harmony, and not discord, unites and not disintegrates; so long as it is poetic, artistic, rhythmic, musical, evolutionary—so long as we make it and unmake it, get rid of it when we want to, and follow our own sweet will, so long as it and science will not quarrel, so long we will keep the new God; but he must be ever the New God. He must not grow old. He must shine with glorious youth. He must be ever active, ever burnished, ever at his best; and when he comes to be anything less, and grows dry, cold, unimaginative, and unromantic—when he becomes dogma—then put him on the shelf. It may be best for the present to preserve and fructify the God-element, as the art and literary element of human life, as the shimmer of romance and the glitter of sentiment; but the highest excellence of humanity is when there are no Gods, neither new nor old, when man is all in all, cultivated, disciplined, lofty, the master of himself, the champion of his natural rights, and the lord of his own heart.

I find thee not, designer of the skies—
Shaper of worlds—the mind that planned the scheme
By which the universe is smoothly run—
The wisdom that from nothing made the whole
And crowned the blank of space with perfect stars;
Though search I everywhere from point to point,
From sparkling sun to sun, from void to zone
Packed with the glittering dust of million spheres
I spy no throne for thee—no palace bright—
No dazzling heaven—no holy dwelling-place—
Whence thy great mandates drive the wheels of time;
I see no angels hovering round thy car;
No faintest motion of that car I catch
Making new music in the fields of space;
I only find the sweep of mighty LAW,
Unending, unbeginning, needing thee
No more than tossing billow needs the leaf
That drops upon its bounding bosom swift.
Outside of law thou art not, and in law
What more is working than pure life itself?
The atoms are eternal, uncreate;
They speed forever on their circling way,
Make and unmake the forms that flash and fade,
Now congregate in splendor like the suns,
Then separate in fierce, diffusive fire,
And with new motion whirl new heavens again.
The world itself is infinite—in the past
And in the future meets no shining bound,
And throughout space no wall to hedge it in.

It needs no deity; itself so strong—
So beautiful—so orderly—so sure—
No touch of thine is traced along its course.
E'en if thou wert, thou wert a useless thing—
A hanger-on to law, a shadow vast,
Out of whose empty breast no force is felt.

But as I look within my soul's wide realm,
Its thoughts, emotions, feelings, vague and dim,
There is a ray ineffable—a flame
Tender and mighty—a glory marvelous—
A mystic and unfathomable light—
The rich effulgence of a stainless fire
Burning upon our being's utmost heights—
And to this perfectness of Nature's zest—
The blaze of virtue—excellence of self—
The grandeur of the ever-beaming truth
That bursts athwart the dome of inward life—
To this I give the gracious name of God—
This is the deity alone I find,
To which I bow with utter reverence.

I scorn the outward deity of men,
The sovereign of the skies—the image cold
Of a dull terror and barbaric thought;
But to the infinite sublime within—
The deity that honest manhood makes—
To this I yield with ready heart and hand.

Wanted, a Better Religion.

A correspondent of the New York Evening Post says:

I was so impressed with the story of the deserted churches and decaying piety which Dr. Prime and your correspondent saw in their visits to a few special localities in New England, that I determined to examin the same proportional extent of locality in this city, to see if a similar state of things did not exist here. The result is that I find the condition of social and religious life in certain localities in this city is even worse than that which those gentlemen say exists in localities of corresponding extent in New England.

I hav lived all my life in New York, and by ancestry and choice I am a Presbyterian, and my children adhere to the same faith. I think I know of every Presbyterian church which has ever existed, or which now exists, in this city. I am not yet fifty, yet I can remember when my parents attended Dr. Phillips's church in Wall street, and when I attended Sunday-school at the Brick church in Park Row, and Sunday-school anniversaries at the Tabernacle in Broadway. About that time there were more than twenty Presbyterian churches in the locality bounded by the Battery, Bleecker street, and the North and East Rivers. In fact, there was a church in each of the following streets: Broad, Wall, Nassau, John, Fulton, Dey, Murray, Chambers, Duane, Park Row, Roosevelt, Cherry, Catherine, Market, Rutgers, Allen, Rivington, Canal, Hudson, Houston, Spring, besides three in Broadway. Now there are but two Presbyterian churches in that entire locality, and take away Trinity and St. Paul's and two Methodist churches, there is not a Protestant church left. Theaters, tenement-houses, drinking-saloons, etc., etc., stand in their places. Is this conclusiv evidence that "the old faith" is dying out? I can remember when the great portion of the population in that section was church-going, educated, and refined. Now few reside there, except those who swear, drink, quarrel, and gamble. Is this unquestioned evidence of the degeneracy of the children of church-going people in this city?

Chicago is nearly as bad.

The current issuse of the Knights of Labor, a Chicago journal, contains an editorial entitled "A Plea for the Children," addressed "To the Ministers of Chicago." It urges ministers to "get less material for sermons out of dusty books, and more out of dusty factories and musty teuement houses." It says that children brought up in unwholesome quarters hav before them an almost certain future of ignorance, shiftlessness, and immorality. It charges that "this Christian civilization about which ministers speak so much seems bent only upon grinding young lives into coin." In Chicago there are 3,750 children under fifteen years of age, and many of them under twelve years of age, working all day in the mills, foundries, and factories. "Over one thousand of these are girls, who, besides earning twenty-five cents a day, are learning something by the contact with machinery and men." Between 1870 and 1880 the number of adult males employed in the United States increased twenty-five per cent; the number of children, fifty-nine per cent. In the tobacco industry seventeen per cent of the employees are children. In commenting, the Knights of Labor says: "Are not these facts ominous, and their discussion more important than infant baptism? . . . Will the ministers of Chicago lock up their study rooms long enough to see what is going on in our city? . . . Ask the sales-girls how much they are fined for laughing? . . . Go to Minonk, where girls working in the tile and brick factories, wheeling bricks in the broiling sun, earn the bread their fathers' wages taken out of a truck store will not buy, . . . then come home and giv us a sermon on the beauties of Christian civilization." The dead earnestness of this plea and the accuracy of its statistics make it worthy of attention. The employment of children in factories has a tendency to lower wages until this employment becomes a necessity. In addition to this it injures the child in mind, in body, and character.

To us it does seem as though that kind of so-called Christianity was dying out. Forms, ceremonies, beliefs, creeds, and shams that make one no better are worse than useless—they hinder Christianity which is love to God and man. Church machinery is usually very far from religion, very expensiv, and costs more than it is worth. G. F. LEWIS.

To the Subscribers to the American Secular Union Fund.

I conceive it my duty, from time to time, to make acknowledgment to the supporters of said fund, of all moneys received and how disbursed. The patrons of the fund will see the propriety of occasional statements from the treasurer. It givs an opportunity for correcting errors, and verifying their donations.

I am not responsible for moneys others receive and expend for the American Secular Union, and shall not recognize as these funds moneys so received and expended. I call the attention of the subscribers to this fund to the following, from the Constitution of the American Secular Union:

SECRETARIES.—Article VIII. The Secretary's duty shall be to keep the records, complete lists of members and other papers of the League, and also of the Board of Directors; to report promptly to the Board of Directors all facts communicated to him by the secretaries of local auxiliary Leagues, and to prepare a careful condensation of the same for the Annual Congress; and to conduct such a correspondence as usually pertains to his office. It shall be the duty of the Assistant Secretary to assist in this work under the Secretary's direction.

TREASURER.—Article IX. The Treasurer, after giving security satisfactory to the Board of Directors, shall receive and hold all funds of the Leagues subject to orders duly drawn by the Secretary and countersigned by the President. He shall report the state of the finances of the League at every Annual Congress, and oftener if required by the Board of Directors or Finance Committee; and upon the election of a successor he shall deliver to him all the property of the League that he may hold.

Subscribers wishing their money applied to especial purposes—such as the free distribution of tracts, pamphlets, etc., legislation for advancing the "Nine Demands," aiding individual lecturers in the field, or any other legitimate purpose in the province of the American Secular Union—should clearly state to the Treasurer when remitting how they want their money used. On this point I quote from the Constitution, Article II., Sec. 5 and 6:

5. To promote, by all peaceable and orderly means, propagandism of the great principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity; more particularly to establish a Liberal Lecture Bureau for the mutual benefit of hearers and lecturers, by which the formation of local Liberal societies may be facilitated and stimulated, and by which Liberal lecturers of sufficient ability and unblemished moral character, without the least discrimination on account of their religious opinions, may be encouraged, furnished with employment, and helped to devote themselvs to the Liberal cause.

6. In all other practical and proper ways to promote the emancipation of the state from the control of the church, and to foster the development of that natural intelligence and morality which constitute the necessary and all-sufficient basis of secular government.

The following is a statement of the financial condition of the Union up to December 31, 1886.

The applications for his services in the field received by the secretary show the great interest that is felt in the work of the Union. From all parts of the country there is a generous response, and, without doubt, during the coming year the American Secular Union will be well sustained. The contributions, so far, manifest the excellent spirit of its supporters. Courtlandt Palmer subscribes $200; Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., $100; the Chicago Secular Union, $50, and others, as already noted, together with what has before been paid into the treasury, according to the report of the treasurer, published in this issue. Reports will be made monthly, and the progress of the work made known. The secretary welcomes all criticisms, and will profit by them in the best manner; but when it comes to fighting, he will reserve all his fire for the enemy. He has no blows to strike against any Liberal. He leaves his work to be judged by the good sense of the friends of the cause all over the country. He has only the best of wishes for those who differ from him. So far as they are in favor of Freedom he will coöperate in every possible way. But he will enter into no contest with Liberals whatsoever. He has neither time nor inclination. He will answer all attacks simply by doing the best he can. When he is convinced that any mistakes are made, he will proceed to do better. We need all our force for the common enemy—for opposition to the tyranny and superstition in the world to-day.

The American Secular Union no doubt will hav a prosperous year, and 1887 will not go by without seeing some advance for Liberty. The Board of Apportionment of New York city hav voted the sum of $10,000 for the opening of the museums on Sunday. This is the direct result of the work of the Union; of the notable petition signed by the citizens of New York last year, under the management of our national organization. There is no failure for us. But because our work is in the advance, we must use small means; but with small means we can accomplish large results. Where the Christian church has its thousand of dollars, we only hav one or two; but what we do hav shall count for all that it is worth. In the spirit, therefore, of humanity looking forward, we hope that all friends will aid in the advance work of the coming year, and generously sustain the national organization. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Chance for Practical Work.

Under certain Catholic laws of 1864, amended in 1881, '82, '86, and applicable to certain judicial districts of this state, committing magistrates could send children under five and not over sixteen years to institutions of the same religious faith as parents or guardians, the maintenance to be a county charge. For two years persistent and strenuous efforts hav been put forth to hav the Board of Supervisors of this county pay for about fifteen children committed to the Catholic Protectory at Buffalo and Home for Juvenil Delinquents at Rochester, N. Y. The board hav persistently refused to pay. On the final adjournment a preamble and resolution were offered by one of the members, calling upon our representativs in Assembly and Senate to use all honorable means to hav said laws repealed, and during debate and before adoption I secured an amendment applying to all religious laws, regardless of sect or denomination, whereupon the preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted. The people of this county are fully aroused. Many prominent lawyers came before the board, and addressed them on the law, stating the aims and objects of the Catholic church, charging them with hostility to our institutions, and calling upon the people for vigilance and a strict enforcement of the law, which, being bad, would cause an early repeal of same. Here is a chance for Secular work, and whoever in this state can use any influence with assemblymen or senators, should at once commence work and assist our Cayuga county representativs in repealing all obnoxious sectarian laws. Sound the alarm along the line through your paper; rouse up New York city influence; bring to bear the strength of the State Association and Secular Union! People are reading, and watching, and awakening from their Rip Van Winkle sleep; and here is a glorious opportunity, and proper efforts may secure from this legislature and the Constitutional convention our stolen rights. EDWARD ROSS.

"Good Advice."

"My son," says Robert J. Burdette, in the Brooklyn Eagle, "I observe that you are pleased to be a little bit sarcastic on the subject of the 'modern evangelist.' Now, do let the evangelist hav his way, as well as the 'reformers.' Let him go where the crowd is. He won't hurt the crowd. He doesn't teach the multitude to do anything wrong. Herr Most didn't get into jail for listening to Sam Jones. The Chicago Anarchists were not the outgrowth of a revival meeting. No Presbyterian elder, no Methodist class-leader, no Baptist deacon, has been indicted for throwing bombs at the police. There may hav been an Infidel or two, a Freethinker, may be; an Atheist, perhaps, mixed up in that crowd of Anarchists; I do not positivly know, but there may hav been; you can easily ascertain. But I do know that the deacon and the elder weren't there. None of Sam Jones's converts were there. The evangelist may hav some odd, rough, funny ways of teaching, but he doesn't teach evil."

What is the sophism of Bob's advice? I conceive it is this: Anachronism in the comparison of the evangelists and Anarchists. He takes the present evangelists, who hav got their boodle, instead of the by-gone evangelists who were fighting and striving to obtain their boodle for themselvs and successors. Cromwell was an Anarchist as regards royalty. Luther was an Anarchist as regards the papacy. George Washington was an Anarchist as regards British rule; so are the Fenians. Jeff Davis was an Anarchist to the Union. Jesus Christ was an out-and-out Anarchist; that is, if we are to take for granted that there existed such a person as is portrayed by the ecclesia and its books. All these Anarchists, the moment they gain their ends, hav their own plans ready to execute, and they institute a régime—a government which takes the place of the defunct or minority one. Theirs is no more Anarchy, and their future care is to keep their guns leveled and ready to shoot down any new-fangled Anarchism. Maybe Bob is correct in saying that the preacher and the deacon were not in the ranks of the Chicago Anarchists, for what would they want there? Yet I do not know. I would sooner suppose they were too busy guarding their already gotten boodles to interest themselvs in such a thing as current Anarchism. But their forerunners and predecessors, the founders of their systems, were Anarchists.

Now as to the bomb. My impression when I first heard of it was that it was brought in and thrown by those who wanted to implicate the Anarchists.

Random Remarks.

I hav observed there is a call for an album containing the cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would be one of the best things to lay on the table for visitors to look at. It would sell too. I hav bought a large dollar scrap-book to paste them on, but it is quite a cumbersome and troublesome affair.

Considerable has been said and written by the readers and correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER on Freemasonary. I know something about this matter that, if presented, would shed light on many important points connected with it, and that without doing violence to the Masonic cause. It is a fact that only a very small percentage of even Masons themselvs understand the system which they hav undertaken to honor. The question of the presence of the Bible is one of the points least understood. Masonry itself is pagan. It is not even Jewish. This question does not touch the "mysteries," so called. yet it is a deep mystery, unfathomable to ninety-nine out of one hundred of even the thirty-three degree Masons. It comes within the scope of the scholar and antiquarian, and such alone can solve it. Let me invite the Masonic correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER to try their hands on this question. The published authorized hand-books of Masonry tell the wide world that on their altar is placed the holy Bible, and that without it there is no Masonry. The "Landmarks" say the same thing, in substance, and add that Atheists are not allowed to be connected with Masonry. How came the Bible to occupy this position? And when? What was there before? i. e., on the altar and on the spot now occupied by the Bible? This is the grand question. Masons tell us without blushing that Masonry is older than Solomon of Palestine, and that it refers back to Egypt—that there it had its origin, where it built pyramids and other lasting monuments. May we not ask what was that which stood on its altar occupying the place where the Bible now has the honor to rest? Masons also allow that in those days Masonry was better than it is now. Should not we then try and find out that ancient relic and restore it on the altar as the legitimate occupant, and eject the profane Jewish-Christian Bible? Then, again, we are informed every day that Turks, Hindoos, Africans (heathen), Chinamen, Japs, etc., Brahmans, as well as Buddhists, are to be found not only to hold membership, but to possess lodges. What about the Bible in this case? A Turk would see us all damned and helled before he would admit a Christian Bible on the altar of his Masonic lodge. Then does he put the Koran thereon? If he does, I do not see that his Koran would answer at all to the Masonic Holy Bible of the United States Masons. That would cut all Masonry in two, square through the vitals. Then would a Brahman or a Buddhist admit a Bible, whether in part or with its usual Christian supplement, to ornament his Masonic lodge? I rather think not; and more, even the sight of such a book would drive him to find purification for his person. Then what about a Chinaman and the Japanese, who hav no reverence whatever for this Bible? There is a terrible inconsistency here somewhere. Who can explain it? May I ask some Mason, who is acquainted with the Grand Orient of France, what does that body use on its altar in place of the Bible? I do not happen to know, and it is a question of interest to us all.

Anti-masonic writers place Masonry among the pretentious and bogus organizations. I think I hav good grounds for believing that their representation is very false. There is a sure link here which connects with the heathen religion of Greece and Asia Minor. Nay, there are several or many links. The heathen system is here without a doubt, perpetuated under difficulties. Masons of high degree do not deny the fact, even when conversing with the profane. Then what about Solomon, Hiram, the Tyrian king, and the two Johns of Jerusalem? What are these characters? The remote parent of Freemasonry, which was neither Jewish nor Christian, was infinitly purer and worthier than either Judaism or Christianity. The Jewish God is the devil borrowed from the regions of northern India, and reconstructed into number one God, but without stripping off his diabolic and cruel characteristics. The Christian God is the same. He is identical also with Typhon of Egypt. The Masonic god, sometimes entitled the "Great Architect of the Universe," is not by any means identical with the Jewish God or with the Christian God. SOL-AMMON.

The Primitiv Church at Rome.

History says that when Peter and Paul came to Rome in the year 60, they found a Christian church established there (Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER).

The "Man of Sin" is sorry to hav to contradict the above statement in toto. The book of Acts, which is the only history we hav (if, indeed, it may be called history) of the incipient church at Rome, tells us in substance this:

Paul landed at Putioli (i. e., Pontioli, formerly Dicearchia), and traveled by land to Rome, a distance of about a hundred and fifty miles. A few brethren, hearing of his approach, went out, and met him at Appii Forum, forty-three miles from the city. When he arrived at Rome, the centurion delivered him to the captain of the guard, who allowed him to reside where he pleased, attended by a soldier. After three days Paul called together the principal Jews and told them the cause of his being brought there as a prisoner. He alleged that he had been unjustly accused by the Jews, and had appealed to Cæsar. He said he had nothing of which to accuse the people of his nation, and that it was on account of the hope of Israel that he was bound with this chain. To this the Jews replied:

We hav received no epistle from Judea against thee, and none of the brethren who hav come from Jerusalem hav told us any evil thing of thee. But we are desirous to hear from thee what thou thinkest, for this doctrin, we know, is not received by anyone (Acts xxviii, 21, 22).

This is the Syriac version, which is doubtless more correct than the Greek, for Paul spoke the Syriac language, and could not hav addressed his Jewish brethren in Greek. The Greek translator, or later scribe, took the liberty of amending the last sentence thus: "For as concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against." He doubtless saw that to admit that Paul's doctrin was not received by anyone (i.e., scarcely anyone) in the great city of Rome, would be a bar to the claim set up as early as the time of Irenæus (A.D 190) that Simon Kepha, alias St. Peter, was bishop of Rome from the early part of the reign of Claudius to the close of the reign of Nero (i.e., from A.D. 42 or 44 to 66 or 68).

And they appointed a day, and many assembled and came to him at his lodgings (xxviii, 23).

Where, oh, where, was the church of Rome when the great apostle to the gentiles found no house of worship open for him in that great city, but had to proclaim the gospel to a handful of Jews at his own lodgings under the guard of a soldier?

And now as to the time of Paul's arrival at Rome, Canon Farrar, in his elaborate "Life of St. Paul," has compiled a table of dates of the apostle's life from twenty-six leading authorities, and to these we hav added nine more, including Dr. Davidson, Rabbi Wise, Smith's Bible Dictionary, and McClintock & Strong's Religious Cyclopedia. The result is curious. Three of the authorities decline to guess; thirteen guess, A.D. 61; five, A.D. 62; five, A.D. 63; two, A.D. 60; two, A.D. 58; two, A.D. 56; one, A.D. 57; one, A.D. 59; and one (Wise), A.D. 65.

The reason of this bewilderment is that Paul had been dead sixty or seventy years before Nero came to the throne. Paul doubtless went to Rome in his old age and died there. But there is no evidence at all that Simon Kepha (falsely called Peter) was ever there. He probably died at Babylon some twenty years before Paul went to Rome.

The historical characters mentioned in the book of Acts, and known to hav lived in the first half of the first century, are: Judas of Galilee; Annas, Caiaphas, and Ananias, high priests; Gamaliel, lawyer; Theudas, rebel; Herod Agrippa I.; Herod Agrippa II.; Claudius Cæsar, emperor; Pilate, Felix, and Festus, governors of Judea; Drusilla and Bernice, sisters of Agrippa II.

There is not a scintilla of historical evidence to connect a single one of these persons with Paul or with any apostle or contemporary disciple of Jesus, the adored messiah, much less with Jesus himself. But on the other hand we claim to hav discovered with more or less certainty in the works of Josephus traces of the following persons named in the book of Acts, all of whom lived and most of whom died before the Christian era:

Paul (Pollio the Pharisee); Manaen of Acts xiii, 1, Vulgate Manahen (Manahem the Essene); Stephen (Onias, the martyr, B.C. 66); Herod (the Great), friend of Pollio and Manahem; Bernice, his niece; Agrippa (M. V.), chief minister of Augustus Cæsar; Gamaliel (Hillel?), preceptor of Paul; Sopater or Sosipater, embassador of high priest Hyrcanus; Silas (Silvanus), pretor of Ephesus; Tyrannus of Ephesus; Secundus of Thessalonica (Jucundus?); Tertullus the orator (Nicolaus of Damascus); Augustus Cæsar, Roman emperor, B.C. 31 to A.D. 14.

Who but the first emperor was ever designated as Angustus Cæsar? See Acts xxv, 21, 25, 26, and xxvii, 1. Compare Greek and Syriac.

There are also two probable identifications of persons named in the fourth gospel, to wit: Malchus (Malichus), an attaché of the high priest Hyrcanus, B.C. 79–40; and Nicodemus, a minister of King Aristobulus, B.C. 64.

The nucleus of all the gospel stories antedates the Christian era. But the text has been corrupted and enlarged so as to describe a mythical Jesus crucified under Pontius Pilate. ANTICHRIST.

[We hav it upon the authority of Philip Schaff, Ph. D., S.T.D., LL.D., Baldwin Professor of Sacred Literature, Union Theological Seminary, New York, that "the earliest record of a Christian church in Rome we hav in Paul's Epistle to the Romans (A.D. 58). Though not founded by Peter or Paul, who came to Rome in the year 60, it may possibly be traced to those 'strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes,' who witnessed the Pentecostal miracle." Whether or not history agrees with our statement must be settled by deciding whether or not Professor Schaff is reliable. The early history of the church is involved in such doubt and obscurity that it is at best but guesswork on the part of honest historians. By Romans it is learned that Paul had religious brethren in Rome, but probably they had not yet gone into the "dome business." It is a matter of inconsiderable consequence, as a church in Rome A.D. 60 would no more prove the truth of Christianity than would a church in New York in A.D. 1887.—ED. T. S.]

Missionaries in China.

From Outing.

CHEE FOO, March 31st.—At anchor in this beautiful harbor of the province in which Confucius was born just 2,427 years ago. But a famous Protestant mission at this place interested me on this occasion more than anything relating to the venerable sage. Some time ago, so the story runs, the head of this mission wrote home that he had purchased bricks, and had with them built a chapel in which his nativ converts could hold service. In a postscript to his letter it was stated that "with the few remaining" bricks a humble abode had been erected for himself. Those that I met made a joke of this by informing me that the house was twice as large and as costly as the chapel. I determined to investigate, and so, calling a boat, rowed ashore and started up a long hill to the mission in regard to which this unkind story was told.

Chee-Foo is quite a summer resort for the European residents of Shanghai, and the men-of-war are apt to make a pleasure station of it. There is a small colony of merchants in the town, and between its prominence as a health resort and a trading station, about as agreeable an exile as can be imagined. I found the chapel, at last, on a hill commanding an extensiv and beautiful view of the water. The only visible furniture in this house of worship was a row of wooden benches. I commenced inspecting the premises from the outside when my attention was arrested by a lady who could be none but a missionary. You can never mistake them. I introduced myself as a stranger desirous of seeing her famous mission, whereupon she invited me in, gave me tea and cake, and an instructiv talk on her missionary life. The house she lived in was certainly more spacious and comfortable than that of many parsonages I know. Such luxuries as glass window-panes, stoves, beds, etc., she had. Books and periodicals surrounded her. I looked upon her home as a palace, after what I had experienced of Chinese living, and even the homes of the Jesuits in Pekin.

She told me that she had lived here many years, and when I expressed my wonder at her fortitude, she admitted that it was a hard life, but that she was sustained by the grace of God.

Her salary is about $1,000, which enables her out here to liv on a scale that would be impossible at home under $10,000. She has an excellent cook at $6 a month. By the way, she pays her teachers, nativ converts, the same wages as her cook.

She told me she had fifteen pupils. These she calls "converts." She clothes and feeds them, and the cost of doing this for a year is $400 for the whole lot. All her work about the house and garden is done by converts on a sort of Christian coöperativ plan. She employs none that do not become converts. I asked her whether she had ever known of a Chinaman who had been converted strictly through his spiritual nature. She regretted that she did not recall an instance.

It is necessary to board and clothe your converts if you want them to stay converted out here, missionary reports notwithstanding.

However, my missionary friend wished me to bear in mind that she never resorted to paying Chinamen in cash for becoming converts, as, she said, "many missionaries do out here."

I came away from this mission somewhat depressed in mind regarding our workers in the Lord's Chinese vinyard. Once at school I put a whole week's pocket-money into the church plate after a sermon on foreign missions. The pastor had drawn a touching picture of the sufferings endured among the heathen for the spread of the truth. I was told that millions of benighted souls were yearning for the "light," and that we had but to raise the money and ship off a missionary in order to draw into the Christian fold thousands of lost heathens who spend their lives in sunning themselvs under cocoanut-trees, and worshiping sticks and stones. I was distinctly given to understand that the nativs lined the shore of every heathen country, and that the Christian emissary had but to address them in order to win their hearts to himself, and their souls to Christ. The faith in foreign missions I had once entertained was certainly not strengthened by this day's experience. This woman evidently supposed that she was about her master's work. She undoubtedly believed that she was doing good. But for the life of me I could not but think that in this delusion she was as much of a heathen as the benighted creatures around her.*

* It is not unlikely that one reason why our missionarics make so little headway among the followers of Confucius is that the best of them must hav difficulty in following the elevated precepts of that illustrious philosopher. For instance, when asked what he considered the most valuable of precepts, he answered: "Do not unto others what you would not hav them do to you."

Lectures and Meetings.

CAPT. R. C. ADAMS, of Montreal, is delivering before the Freethought society of that city a course of lectures on "Business Morality." The lectures are reported every Monday by the Montreal Gazette. They are of a very able and interesting character. Captain Adams is the author of the work, "Travels in Faith," and is among the ablest and most activ of the Canadian Secularists.

FROM the beginning of his fall campaign to the last of December, J. E. Remsburg delivered one hundred and forty-six lectures. His appointments for January are as follows:

|---|---|
| Waterloo, Ind | Sat., Sun., 1, 2 |
| Montpelier, O | Mon., Tues., Wed., 3, 4, 5 |
| Adrian, Mich | Thurs. 6 |
| Bowling Green, O | Fri. 7 |
| Ai, O | Sat. 8 |
| Metamora, O | Sun. (forenoon) 9 |
| Berkey, O | Sun. (afternoon) 9 |
| Sylvania, O | Sun. (night) 9 |
| Laingsburg, Mich | Mon., Tues., 10, 11 |
| St. Johns, Mich | Wed. 12 |

| Scotts, Mich | Mon. 17 |
| Kalamazoo, Mich | Tues. 18 |
| Belding, Mich | Wed. 19 |
| Charlotte, Mich | Thurs. 20 |

His work during the remainder of the winter will be confined to Missouri and Illinois.

Does Socialism Mean Faith?

It is the practice of most denominational, and many secular journals, to identify Socialism with Anarchy, and then to represent all Socialists as "Infidels." In view of this fact, the following paragraph with which Laurence Gronlund, an able Socialistic author, closes a letter in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, has a timely interest: "I can only add that there are numerous circles of Christian Socialists, with two excellently written organs, just as determined in their Socialism as in their Christianity; that in all the British universities classes are formed for the study of Socialism, and that the present writer has been listened to and applauded by hundreds of students of the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, with professors in the chair; that a prominent minister of the Established church of Scotland declared to me that he only waited for disestablishment to become a Socialist lecturer, and that the English trades-unions, in congress assembled, hav found it prudent to affirm that they were 'not unfriendly to Socialism.' Great Britain will be the first country to realize Socialism, believe me, and let all men of good will rejoice, for Socialism does not mean a leveling down, but a leveling up; not disorder, but order; not denial, but faith." —Exchange.

THE Rev. Charles F. Deems, pastor of the church of the Strangers, in this city, received the following letter from the superintendent of a Sunday-school:

"My zeal in the matter of building the church has been so overpowering that I hav even been tempted in the spirit of humble trust, and much prayer, to that which is (considered) wrong—that I might thereby do good, to wit: I took $500 and consecrated it to the Lord, and asked him to direct the wheels of fortune, as might be for the best in its investment in the Louisiana State Lottery. I asked that if it could be consistent with God's will I might draw enough to build the church. I lost the $500, and believe that the Lord so directed."

Mr. Deems thinks that the superintendent might hav as righteously planned to rob a bank and asked God to pardon the burglary.

The Catholic Church and the Laity.

Catholicism makes a broad distinction between the church and the laity. The church is one thing, the laity another. The first is divine, the second human. The one arrogates to itself supreme power and dominion, and irons the other with a despotism that bids it hear, tremble, and obey. Guistiniani, D.D., an ex-Catholic priest, born, educated, and ordained in Rome, but in 1840 a Lutheran missionary in this city, in a work entitled, "Rome as It Is," observes, "In that church [the papal] the members and professors do not constitute the church, but the bishops and councils, with the infallible pope at the head, constitute the visible and invisible church." The church is all; the laity nothing. The laity are obliged, under pain of excommunication and anathema, to surrender their natural rights of conscience, reason, opinion, private judgment, and interpretation. They are debarred from any voice in Catholic synods and councils, and from any participation in the management of the spiritual, temporal, or financial affairs of the church. They are kindly relieved of all concern about their souls and conduct, and hav nothing to do but reverently accept and implicitly obey the arbitrary mandates of the church, observe its rites, contribute to its support, and trust their eternal welfare to its custody.

Such being the despotism of the church, and the servitude of the laity, the latter cannot be held responsible for the injustice, absurdity, and barbarism which so much degrades the canons, bulls, letters, and proceedings of the former. Instead of being answerable for the faults of matters in which their participation is inhibited, they are entitled to the sympathy and charitable consideration of the more fortunate heretics.

They hav, it is true, sanctioned by acquiescence the catholicity of the inviduous election; but it is also true that they hav often murmured against the corruptions and inconsistencies of the church, and not unfrequently remonstrated against them, and sometimes opposed them by open hostility. Guistiniani, from personal observation, declared: "The people of Rome are not as stupid as the priests would wish. The secret police of the establishment, the paid spies of the confessional, and the multitude of gen's arms may terrify them, but they cannot chain their mind or fetter their intellect" (Rome as It Is, p. 88). The doctor speaks also of the scoffs, jeers, and derisiv laughter with which the men and women of Rome assail priests and monks on occasions of public excitement. His descriptions are not overdrawn. Archbishop Spaulding has more than corroborated them in a sermon which he preached in the cathedral of Baltimore after his return from the late ecumenical council held at Rome. The Baltimore Sun reports him as saying: "There hav been 288 incumbents of the papal office since St. Peter, of whom 69 hav laid down their lives. Afterward, when the eras of fire and bloody persecution had ceased, 45 were driven from their places. The forty-sixth is now imprisoned by men who call themselvs Catholics, under pretext that they want him to be a spiritual prince, and to be relieved from the cares of temporal government. An army of six hundred troops and camp followers invaded the papal territory, committing every species of villainy. Four priests were stabbed in one day and night. One bishop was almost murdered. He had seen that spirit of hatred to the church throughout the south of France and Italy. When in Marseilles, while riding in a carriage in company with two abbots, the soldiers hooted at the abbots, so that they were obliged to leave the carriage."

In the Courier des Etats Unis, Nov. 13, 1886, p. 5, we find an item which we translate as follows: "Seven thousand persons participated in a demonstration which took place to-day [Nov. 7th] at Mentana, in Italy, in commemoration of the battle of 1867. Many speeches were pronounced. The orators denounced the temporal power of the pope and the pretensions of the clergy."

A similar spirit prevails in all Catholic countries. Sometimes it is expressed in raillery and pasquenades, sometimes in parochial or diocesan riots, sometimes in combats within consecrated walls, and sometimes in the open collision of arms. How often in the cause of church reform hav Catholic princes and subjects armed themselvs against the pope, invaded his territory, tried him before councils, condemned, incarcerated, and expelled him from his throne! Into what disastrous schisms has the antagonism between the church and the laity rent the Catholic communion! How often has it cost the church the membership of its brightest luminaries! And how often has the vicar of Christ fled for personal safety to Anagna, Perugia, Viterbo, and other cities, from the enraged laity of St. Peter's patrimony! Hume, in his "History of England," vol. i, p. 419, says: "Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk into profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct, the pope was so little revered at Rome that his inveterate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controled the government of that city, and the embassadors from a distant extremity of Europe who carried to him the humble, or rather abject, submission of the greatest potentate of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him and throw themselvs at his feet." Gibbon, in his "Decline," vol. vi, ch. lxix, p. 427, speaking of the tumultuous laity of the holy see, says: "On Holy Thursday, while Pascal [pope] officiated before the altar, he was interrupted by the clamors of the multitude, who imperiously demanded the confirmation of a favorit magistrate; his silence exasperated their fury; his pious refusal to mingle the affairs of earth and heaven was encountered with oaths and menaces that he should be the cause and the witness of the public men."

During the festival of Easter, while the bishops and the clergy, barefoot and in procession, visited the tombs of the martyrs, they were twice assailed, at the bridge of St. Angelo and before the capital, with volleys of stones and darts. In the riot that ensued the houses of Pascal's friends were destroyed and he himself barely escaped with his life. In alluding to the scenes that followed the election of Pope Gelasius II., Gibbon writes: "Cencio Frangipani, a potent and factious baron, burst into the assembly furious and in arms; the cardinals were stripped, beaten, and trodden under foot; and he seized without pity or respect the vicar of Christ by the throat. Gelasius was dragged by the hair along the ground, buffeted with blows, and bound by an iron chain in the house of his tyrant." Glancing at the popular tumults which agitated the reign of Pascal II., the distinguished historian relates that, "in a civil commotion, several of his [Pascal's] priests were made prisoners; and the inhuman Romans, reserving one as a guide for his brethren, put out the eyes of the others, crowned them with ludicrous miters, mounted them on asses, with their faces toward the tail, and extorted an oath that in this wretched condition they should offer themselvs as a lesson to the head of the church." Such brutality, though paralleled by papal atrocities, cannot be mentioned without disapprobation, nor can the sanctity or importance of any cause atone for the guilt of their perpetration.

From the above statement we infer that the Catholic laity are not responsible for the ignominious character and conduct of the papal church, and though their practical acquiescence may expose them to the reproach, yet they hav vindicated their immunity from such a charge by many strenuous efforts to reform the church in its body and head, and that they still lie at its foundations as a sleeping volcano, giving fitful evidence of smothered disaffection, and destined in the future to repeat the convulsions of the past.

Life.

From the New York Mirror.

Born of love and hope, of ecstasy and pain, of agony and fear, of tears and joy—dowered with the wealth of two united hearts—held in happy arms, with lips upon life's drifted font, blue-veined and fair, where perfect peace finds perfect form—rocked by willing feet and wooed to shadowy shores of sleep by siren mother singing soft and low—looking with wonder's wide and startled eyes at common things of life and day—taught by want and wish and contact with the things that touch the dimpled flesh of babes—lured by light and flame and charmed by color's wondrous robes—learning the use of hands and feet, and by the love of mimicry beguiled to utter speech—releasing prisoned thoughts from crabbed and curious marks on soiled and tattered leaves—puzzling the brain with crooked numbers and their changing, tangled worth—and so through years of alternating day and night, until the captive grows familiar with the chains and walls and limitations of a life.

And time runs on in sun and shade, until the one of all the world is wooed and won, and all the lore of love is taught and learned again. Again a home is built with the fair chamber wherein faint dreams, like cool and shadowy vales, divide the billowed hours of love. Again the miracle of birth—the pain and joy, the kiss of welcome and the cradle-song, drowning the drowsy prattle of a babe.

And then the sense of obligation and of wrong—pity for those who toil and weep—tears for the imprisoned and despised—love for the generous dead, and in the heart the rapture of a high resolve.

And then ambition, with its lust of pelf and place and power, longing to put upon its breast distinction's worthless badge. Then keener thoughts of men, and eyes that see behind the smiling mask of craft—flattered no more by the obsequious cringe of gain and greed—knowing the uselessness of hoarded gold—of honor bought from those who charge the usury of self-respect—of power that only bends a coward's knees and forces from the lips of fear the lies of praise. Knowing at last the unstudied gesture of esteem, the reverent eyes made rich with honest thought, and holding high above all other things—high as hope's great throbbing star above the darkness of the dead—the love of wife and child and friend.

Then locks of gray, and growing love of other days and half-remembered things—then holding withered hands of those who first held his, while over dim and loving eyes death softly presses down the lids of rest.

And so, locking in marriage vows his children's hands and crossing others on the breasts of peace, with daughters' babes upon his knees, the white hair mingling with the gold, he journeys on from day to day to that horizon where the dusk is waiting for the night—sitting by the holy hearth of home, as the last embers change from red to gray, he falls asleep within the arms of her he worshiped and adored, feeling upon his pallid lips love's last and holiest kiss.

Civil Service and Catholic Schools.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 13th appeared an extract from one of your exchanges stating that at a recent examination before the civil service commission, three of the applicants failed to pass for want of a proper understanding of the methods of doing business, all three being Catholics, educated at Catholic schools. That was no surprise to me. I hav observed similar failures going on around me for twenty years past. And I hav known men like Mr. McCullough who, when they discovered the cause of their inefficiency, determined to boycott the Catholic schools, and giv their children the benefit of a secular education. If items of that kind are looked for and published as often as they occur, this civil service business will do more good for the country than its originators had any idea of. When those competitiv examinations shall hav proved beyond a doubt that those religious schools are in fact nothing better than laboratories for the manufacture of imbecility, their occupation will soon be gone, and a vast amount of poverty and ignorance will disappear along with them.

Heretofore a young man having graduated at one of those institutions was compelled to spend a term or two at some school or college where practical methods were taught and illustrated before he could obtain employment in any lucrativ position. If this new-fangled arrangement compels him to undergo a public examination before he can draw salary from the government, he has nothing to fall back on but preaching or pedling.

I am going to be a civil service reformer from this time forward, and the man that means to enforce it shall get my vote.

At the city of Utica a short time ago, I called at the house of a widow, whose husband was one of my schoolmates. I soon got on friendly terms with the youngest son, a lad of twelve or thirteen years. I got him to show me his school-books and tell me how far he had progressed in his studies. I was surprised to see that the books were the same as are used generally in the common schools, whereas I thought the boy was attending one of the Catholic institutions, with which the city is too well supplied. An older brother explained to me that it was by his direction that the boy was sent to the district school, because he had found by experience that it was a better place to learn than at the Catholic schools.

He went on to tell how too much time was spent at the "Brothers' School" in studying the history and mystery of religion, and but little attention paid to the affairs of this world. That had been my own experience exactly, and the experience of every one whom I had consulted upon the subject. This young man got his eyes opened earlier in life than we of the preceding generation—as, indeed, he had better opportunities for doing.

His father and I got what little education we had in a school so intensely Catholic that the teacher (Bartholomew Lynch) one afternoon, just before prayers, caused his own son to be mounted upon the back of one of the largest scholars, his pants stripped down, and a birch-rod laid on to his bare haunches in punishment for taking the name of the Lord in vain.

This method of inculcating the fear of God (which Solomon tells us is the beginning of wisdom) into the minds of young Catholics was technically called "hoisting," and only very few youngsters who went to school to learn wisdom were fortunate enough to escape it. Indeed, the efficiency of a teacher was rated according to the number of hoistings he executed in the course of a term. I was hoisted before reaching the end of my ninth year for disobeying an order I had never heard. I stopped on the way home from school to eat some blackberries that grew alongside of the road, not knowing at the time that I was eating forbidden fruit. The punishment had its natural effect. I hated the tell-tale that informed on me, and afterwards I took care to eat my blackberries on the sly. I soon learned that my schoolmates had a code of morals among themselves quite different from that which we learned in the catechism. Being punished indiscriminately for almost everything we did, and for things we never thought of doing, we were forced to the conclusion that whatever act of pleasure or mischief we could do without being caught at it was right, and the rest was all wrong. I hav known many pious men and women since that time whose moral code was much the same. These things happened on the other side of the Atlantic, in the "Island of Saints." Mr. Lynch's penitentiary, above referred to, was located here in Oneida county, which goes to show that the "holy Catholic church is alway the same, in every age and country," wherever she dares to exercise her authority. Doubtless some of your young readers will be surprised to hear that such savagery was practiced so late as the middle of this nineteenth century. But if you writers and publishers did your whole duty to the rising generation, these things would be better known than they are. I get out of patience with men who are continually writing about the "dark ages" and locating them three or four hundred years back, when, in fact, the darkness is so thick even now that only few persons are able to see that those religious schools are instituted and kept going for the purpose of shutting out the light.

The founders and managers of those schools hav perception enough to know that without their aid it would be impossible to make people believe that the first of all virtues is "obedience to lawful superiors," and that disobedience is the blackest of all earthly crimes; that poverty, humiliation, and suffering constitute the true basis of happiness, both for time and eternity. No full-grown man, either savage or civilized, was ever made to believe such stuff as this. In order to propagate the idea at all, it must be planted in the soft and simple mind of childhood; nursed, cultivated, and made to grow along with its seed bed.

Another monstrous fallacy must be planted at the same time to grow along with it, as it were, to prove one absurdity by another. They hav told us of a God, a ghost, or some kind of a supernatural being, who "created man in his own image and likeness," and soon after he got sorry he did it. Since then he has been doing his best to destroy his own creatures; cursing, drowning, crucifying, and damning them. They tell us that a man having all this hammered into him when he is a child, and retaining it up to his dying day, has a chance to escape damnation; but the opinion is gaining ground every day that a man who fails to get rid of most all of it before reaching the period of middle life deserves to be damned.

JEREMIAH O'BRIEN.

An Orthodox Fraud.—III.

We all know the Bible, our "holy book," is the source from whence we draw our inspiration, our ideas, sentiments, and beliefs which constitute our religion.

The language, words, style, phraseology, and the personifications, with the agencies and functions which they perform, are all quoted, copied, and reverenced as the means through which, by divine appointment, we are to be enlightened in regard to the mysteries of life and its duties, the methods of salvation, and our future destiny.

Without this holy book and its inspired teachings, we are told, we could be nothing but pagans, ignorant of God, without a knowledge of the means of being saved; we would liv and die savages, unredeemed from sin, and we must be eternally lost.

The church, being impressed with the inestimable value of this precious book, knew the eternal consequences for evil that would grow out of any imperfections, or misunderstandings of its contents; and in order to see if there were any obstacles in it that should be removed, which were making it repulsiv or objectionable to any class of readers or thinkers, it set apart the revising committee, thus making assurance doubly sure that it was doing its whole share in inciting sinners to repentance by making the means of salvation, if possible, more easy, sure, intelligent, and attractiv.

This committee tells us in part what gross mistakes, misleading errors, and false representations it found. It reveals to us that we hav been deceived, that the whole superstructure of our faith is on a false foundation, or rather without any foundation; that the personalities which hav been represented as appointed and instituted by divine authority as the agencies through which only we can be saved, are but myths of copyists and translators, and are not found in the earlier manuscripts of which our Bible purports to be a copy. In these more ancient Greek manuscripts there was no personal God in the sense our scriptures present it, to be offended, to be disappointed and thwarted, by the wicked machinations of men. Nor did he doom the whole human family to destruction, then afterward relent, nor send any personality into the world in the name of an only begotten son, a Christ, a Lord, a Savior, a Redeemer, a Holy Spirit, or Holy Ghost, or Comforter, through whose sacrifice, intercession, atonement, or agency, the world might not perish, but hav eternal life.

Our Bible represents that Palestine was the locality of this plot—that it was all devised and executed there. But the revisers tell us that in the copies of the New Testament supposed to belong to about the fifth century, and in the original Greek, the words which our English translators hav converted into names were simply substantivs or common nouns, expressing abstract ideas of good and evil, right and wrong; terms denoting the moral virtues and their antitheses. They went back in their researches with the view and for the purpose of finding as much of the original truth as possible, made this discovery, and tell us so.

They claim to hav been much more critical, careful, and thorough in their researches than King James's committee, who furnished us our authorized copy, our Protestant standard for over two hundred and fifty years.

If, as the revisers tell us, there were no such personages as Christ, or Lord, or Savior—then consequently no son of God—referred to in the earlier Greek scriptures, which giv us the first ideas we hav of what occurred in Judea over eighteen hundred years ago, then he or they could never hav lived or died there. If they were never there, then they had nothing to do with our sins or our salvation. None of this fabrication originated in Palestine. It was a scheme got up, and was many years in maturing, not in Greece alone, but in western Europe. To Augustine may be ascribed the credit, or the infamy, more than to any other one man, of establishing the doctrins and formulating the faith of modern orthodoxy. The Galilean teacher and his disciples had nothing to do with it. It was not born till centuries after their time.

The learned African pagan, Augustine, who lived a dissolute life till the age of thirty-two, when he went to Italy and joined the church (386 A.D.), enlisted his genius and imagination in the work of completing this orthodox scheme of salvation. It had lacked exactness and coherence in some points, and did not entirely commend itself to the skeptical pagan mind. But St. Augustine wrote his "De Peccato Originali" ("Original Sin"), his "De Gratia Christi" ("The Grace of Christ"), and his "De Civitate Dei" ("The City of God") "to subvert the foundations of paganism and establish those of Christianity." "Of all the fathers of the Latin church," says Villemain, "St. Augustine manifested the most imagination in theology." His subtle and vigorous mind has often displayed, on mystical problems, an amount of sagacity which would hav sufficed for the most sublime conceptions."

The Greek scholars or writers who compiled and put on separate parchments the gospels, acts, and epistles of the New Testament, St. Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople at the close of the fourth century, says, were unknown, as "none of the apostles affixed their signatures to the gospels now bearing their names." That was the work of the church long afterward, and we hav simply the church's word that they are genuin. "The first collection of these Greek manuscripts," Tertullian, another saint of the early part of the third century, says, "was made by Marcion, the heretic, a Greek scholar, about the year 145 A.D. It consisted of one gospel and ten of Paul's epistles, and they were not then considered the word of God." Bishop Irenæus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius charged Marcion with mutilating these first copies. This mutilating was a common practice with copyists, in those days. Everyone took the liberty of changing the text to make it support his own mythological or metaphysical opinions. The testimony of scholars, including the late revisers, is that the oldest manuscripts now extant are the most rational and sensible; and we hav every reason to believe that the original gospels were still more pure and practical in their ethical common-sense lessons. The many forgeries and doctrinal changes introduced by each of the copyists, to propagate his own faith, making such a diversity and conflict in the teachings of the text of the different copies, led to the exciting controversies as to what was the correct religious belief, whence originated the great Arian revolt; and it led to the fifty councils that were held in the fourth century to settle the faith.

We can imagin how easy it would be for a credulous, ignorant, idolatrous people, of whom not one in ten thousand could read—overrun and conquered by the Roman armies, with their idols and divinities captured and confiscated—to accept the laws and the religion of their conquerors after the first generation had passed away and the missionaries of the church had introduced to them the doctrins and dogmas, the personifications and miracles, and all the vulgar pagan and idolatrous ideas they had woven into the scriptures for the sole purpose of adapting them to the mental and moral condition of the barbarian hordes whom they wished to enlist in the church of what they still called, with all its corruption, the Christian religion.

It was after the Bible had been taken into Western Europe that these words had become names to represent personalities or mythic divinities. The contest for changing them began around the Mediterranean, in Greece, Africa, and Italy. Centuries were largely spent in bloody wars among the early Christians to decide and settle among disputants the exact definitions and status of these terms, and as to precisely what they should represent. During this time copyists were changing the text and adapting it to the various beliefs.

It was in this way many of the one hundred and fifty thousand different readings became established. The pagans of Western Europe found but little difficulty in adopting the phraseology of the text to their prevailing idolatrous conceptions and predilections. The revisers could trace all this course of history, and thus account for the corruptions and departures from the older Greek copies. They own to having discovered these many errors and misrepresentations. They know the scriptures are not literally true, and are falsely taught.

While in their revision they made many minor verbal and grammatical changes, which only tend to make the false teachings more plain, easy, and certain, they hav done comparativly nothing to correct the gross, serious, and important errors by which all Christendom has been led and is held in superstition. They were frank enough in the fraud to say they would not, and did not, mean to corrupt them. In regard to the verbal changes they made, they say, in their "Companion," that "these improvements occur on every page, and almost in every verse, but the majority of readers and hearers will scarcely observe them, and few of them alter the sense very materially." "They do not change a single article of faith, nor a single precept of duty." "In this vast mass of improvements we may well say in ninety-nine out of every hundred changes the two committees are agreed."

Knowing as they did the gross fraud perpetrated upon us in our English translation by converting these simple Greek words into names, that we should believe that they represented personalities whom we must admit existed or now exist, for the purpose of saving our souls and securing our final abode in heaven, they hav practically done nothing to undeceive us by making a proper correction of the text. The cool, complacent piety they virtually assume, and the assurance they parade as a virtue on their part in not doing it, indicate a state of mind difficult for honest men to understand. They tell us we hav been misled, and then claim it is a virtue that they did not intend to undeceive us; rather that their task was to make the text less doubtful and more explicit in enforcing on us the deception. Their design seems to hav been more to fix and fasten the fraud upon us than to make it more easy for us to understand it and to cast it off. They hav done their task and shown us how they hav done it, in which we see their design. In a quiet exultation over their success, they say through the "Companion:"

> It is a matter of wonder and congratulation that two committees, divided by the ocean, and representiug two independent and high-minded nations, sensitiv of their honor, should, after several years of unbroken and conscientious labor, hav arrived at such a substantial harmony in the translation of their most sacred book, which is recognized by both as their infallible guide in all matters of Christian faith and duty. And herein is the finger of providence, and the best guarantee of success.

To arrive at this "substantial harmony," the American committee had to yield its preferences to the English.

> The American renderings [they say], if judged by the Greek text, may be traced chiefly to greater fidelity and consistency.

The English favored being "faithful to the idiom and vocabulary of the 'Authorized Version,' because it is incorporated into their liturgical and devotional literature, and that the Book of Common Prayer is a greater power in England than in the United States."

In thus compromising for the sake of harmony, the more liberal and rational of both committees had to surrender their convictions and preferences to the conservatism, the prejudices, and traditional rigidity of those who attached more importance to faith in the authorized text than in fidelity to the truth. This disagreement was all anticipated and provided for in the rules adopted to control the decisions. The parties went into the revision tied and pledged to submit to the result, be it what it might. It shows a uniform disposition to surrender to superstition, and to unite in perpetrating on the credulous what they all virtually discovered to be a popular, pious fraud; and then say: "The Anglo-American Revision is the noblest monument of Christian union and coöperation in this nineteenth century."

Philadelphia, Jan., 1887.

"NEVER deny the babies their Christmas," says Marion Harland. "Let them believe in Santa Claus, or St. Nicholas, or Kris Kringle, or whatever name the jolly Dutch saint bears in your region." This has our hearty indorsement, but the case is different when a similar appeal is made in behalf of full-grown men and women who build steeples and erect altars to deities and saints more fanciful and impossible than even this good-natured god of the babies. This particular delusion of childhood does no harm; the similar delusion of manhood is fraught with the greatest mischief to the human race.—Winsted Press.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

The Museums in the Park.

The Board of Estimate and Apportionment of this city is entitled to much credit for the persistency with which it labors to unlock the doors of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History on Sundays. The habit of the Board has been to giv the two museums $15,000 each per annum. Last year, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will recollect, the gift was accompanied by the request for Sunday opening. Mr. Morris K. Jesup appeared before the Board and argued that the museums could not be opened. The American Secular Union thought differently, and took the matter up, and obtained the indorsement of the Central Labor Union, an organization representing some hundred thousand laborers, besides the signatures of some ten thousand citizens of the city, judges, city officials, and merchants of high repute. These were presented to the trustees of the museums, together with an argument in favor of Sunday opening. The most that the trustees would do in the matter was to appoint a conference committee, which committee has had the petitions under consideration ever since, but refused to report thereon. Mr. Jesup's reasons for closing the museums are purely religious, as every one knows; but, with the hypocrisy natural to church people, he stated that funds were lacking to hire employees for Sundays. A bill was introduced at Albany, and passed the lower branch of the legislature by a large majority, giving the museums several thousands of dollars additional on condition that they were accessible to visitors to the park on Sunday. Mr. Jesup defeated this bill in the Senate, and the moyement came to an end, as nothing could induce the conference committee to act.

Last month the same Board of Estimate and Apportionment sat again to parcel out the city's cash. When it came to the museums, the Board again preferred their request for Sunday opening, and accompanied it with the offer of $5,000 to each museum to pay the extra cost. The museum trustees are now in a quandary. They want that money, but they do not want to open the museums. They know the public is with the Board, for the agitation by the American Secular Union last year plainly brought this out, but the trustees are mostly pious, and desire to "preserve the purity of the Sabbath." But they do not desire to flatly refuse upon religious grounds, for such reasons are not popular in a great city like New York, where even one portion of the religious people are not Sunday-keepers. They are, therefore, busily inventing excuses. Mr. Jesup says the $10,000 is not enough; also that those who hav donated treasures of art to the museums hav done so on condition that the treasures shall not be looked at on Sunday; the treasurer of the Metropolitan Museum says he is afraid the crowd on Sundays would be so great as to injure the exhibits; while the president of the museum is to ill to talk about it. Altogether, the trustees are in a muddle.

Meanwhile, the Board of Estimate and Apportionment keeps the bait of $10,000 before them; they hav the petition representing the wishes of over a hundred thousand of the citizens of the city; they hav a lively recollection of last winter's agitation of the subject, and they hav the unanswerable argument of the secretary of the American Secular Union on file. The best thing they can do is to gracefully yield to the popular demand, and open the doors, that the people may see the treasures their absurdly applied piety has so long concealed, and which are in large part paid for by the self-same public that has so long bumped its nose against their locked doors.

The Religion of a Rationalist.

An article with this title is in the last Forum, by the Rev. M. J. Savage, who claims to be a Rationalist, and he not only declares what a Rationalist may believe, but what he must believe. This is just like a clergymen. Now, it will be admitted that a Rationalist, with a certain kind of temperament, will believe exactly as Mr. Savage does. He may do this honestly; but that he or any Rationalist must believe this is a most preposterous assertion. All those beliefs that Mr. Savage mentions are not capable of scientific evidence. They are simply beliefs of the emotions, and not of the intellect. They are the outcome of feeling, and not knowledge. Every man has a creed, says Mr. Savage. This is true. Every man has a belief. But what is belief? It is not knowledge. When knowledge comes, belief ceases. Belief is of the heart. What is a rational belief? It is not necessarily that which results from the use of the reason, but it is simply that heart-feeling which is not contrary to reason, and therefore reason allows it to be. But reason does not justify the belief, much less does it make the belief imperativ.

Of the beliefs which Mr. Savage mentions, not one is the result of science. All that science declares is that these beliefs held in a certain way, carefully defined, are not unreasonable. If Mr. Savage had "walked humbly with his God," we would not criticise; but when he insists that we must believe these things, we object. They are matters, not of reason, but of choice and taste, like beefsteak and plum-pudding. The Theist believes in God because he likes it. The Churchman believes in the church because he likes it. Religion is like oysters—people take it as it suits them. Mr. Savage might as well insist that all must be fond of oysters as that all must hav a "religious belief."

Mr. Savage givs a big definition to religion. He is like the boy who set the old hen. His father asked him how many eggs he put under the hen. "One hundred and twenty," replied the youth. "Why so many?" said the father. "I wanted to giv the old hen a chance to spread herself," answered the boy. Mr. Savage is bound to giv religion a chance to spread itself. He has put everything under it he can. Even the Atheist has a snug, warm place. Mr. Savage in substance says that religion is simply man's thought of the universe. Such a definition includes for religious belief every intelligent animal—the horse, the dog, the ant, the caterpillar, and the flea. Do not all these hav a "thought of the universe" and their relation to it and the power not themselvs? Hence they are religious; only they do not build churches and hire ministers. Sensible fleas, sensible horses and dogs! You hav the religion that man has, according to Mr. Savage, but you make a better use of your material. It does not cost you so much as it does man!

It always has seemed to our mind that religion was a feeling based upon a certain kind of thought; not merely upon thought per se—upon the thought that the powers that be are good, beneficent, worshipful, admirable, and intelligent. When one thinks thus, he is religious; if he does not think thus, he is not religious. He may be moral, but he is not religious. Now, science does not necessarily giv any such thought of the universe as religion demands. It reveals as much badness as goodness, and so implies that the powers that be hav nothing worthy of our adoration. We hav to build more factories than churches in order to fight these powers. Mr. Savage says, "Man is love, pity, tenderness, self-sacrifice, devotion, worship, aspiration." Whence came these? Mr. Savage implies they must come from a God, and therefore God exists. But man is also lust, selfishness, bigotry, murder, lying, theft, meanness, etc. Whence came these? By the same reasoning, from the devil. We can therefore prove as big a devil as Mr. Savage can a God.

Mind, however, is a process, not a thing, and its antecedent is not necessarily similar, any more than water or fire are like their antecedents. Mind is the result of conditions, like heat. Because certain conditions of matter produce hydrogen, therefore hydrogen is the original cause of all things, is just as rational a statement as to assert that mind is the original cause. Mind is only a result, and has never been demonstrated to be anything else.

Mr. Savage is too dogmatic, too imperious, and he cannot be allowed to stand as a representativ of Rationalism. If he had come before the bar of science and graciously asked permission to hold these beliefs; if he had said, These beliefs, as I hold them and define them, are not unreasonable, they are not against science, they are nice, comfortable, happy, and, to me, noble and consoling beliefs, and though I do not know they are true, but I hope they are—if Mr. Savage had come in this way, no doubt science would smilingly consent to his having these intellectual and emotional luxuries so long as he held them in the spirit of humility which becometh him who knoweth not; but when Mr. Savage flourishes his clergyman's baton, and orders science, on pain of excommunication, to affirm these beliefs, as necessarily rationalistic beliefs, then science will meet the issue and will proclaim itself a most glorious rebel. It will resent the imposition on its limbs of these manacles of "necessary beliefs." We grant that Mr. Savage is a Rationalist. We grant that some of his beliefs are not irrational; but when he asserts that his belief is, or must be, the belief of all Rationalists, then his assertion is irrational, for there are thinkers deep and broad as Mr. Savage—giant thinkers—who do not, and will not, accept a single one of his "rational beliefs," but oppose them all as childish beliefs. They are rational only in the sense that a child's belief in the ability of its father to carry it over a roaring stream is rational. It may be true. The feat is not an utter impossibility. These beliefs are not shut out entirely from human acceptance. This is all the rationalism that Mr. Savage can claim for any of his beliefs. He is not obliged to giv them up. He can hold them without being laughed at. That is all that the "Religion of a Rationalist" amounts to. It is a pleasant dream and possibility against which human reason pronounces no decisiv mandate. But to announce that the human reason has peremptorily declared in favor of these beliefs, so that every Rationalist must hold them, is simply an untruth, and is the proclamation of a priest, and not a thinker.

Jesus and His Family.

In his sermon on the Sunday after Christmas, Henry Ward Beecher said of Jesus and his family:

"The mother and brother of Christ did not believe him to be what he declared himself to be. Between this Mary, celebrated in the magnificats for two thousand years, and the real Mary there is a wide difference. That she had the slightest spiritual perceptions or insight there is no proof, and she and her other sons though Jesus was 'cracked.' They saw not what he did; they could not enter his sphere. When he was grand and great they said that he was crazy, and begged him not to tramp around and exhibit himself to the common multitude. They wanted him to stay at home and be a good citizen."

A daily journal of this city censures Mr. Beecher severely for these "flippant and slangy" words. "From a Christian pulpit," says the Sun, "he ridicules Christian theology, and handles what it regards as its holiest mysteries with the carelessness of contempt. He is worse than the Infidel, though he presumes to speak as an expounder and defender of the gospel. He does not even think it worth his while to giv more than slap-dash conclusions as to the character of Christ and the holy family."

If the journal rebuking Mr. Beecher were a Christian journal, we should allow this flagellation to be just. To Christian journals truth is of less importance than theology. A secular paper, however, should first hav compared Mr. Beecher's words with the record of Christ and his family, and found whether they are just or unjust. Mr. Beecher should not be condemned for speaking the truth.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

The Heretic Priest.

The following conversation between a Sun reporter and Monsignor Preston, vicar-general, is an authoritativ statement, so far as it goes, of the attitude of the Catholic church toward Edward McGlynn, pastor of St. Stephen's church, and land reformer of the Henry George school. Monsignor Preston said:

"Dr. McGlynn has been suspended from performing any of the functions of a priest. He cannot officiate at mass, and he cannot preach. It has been asserted that Dr. McGlynn's political acts had less to do with his suspension than his refusal to build parochial schools, but they who say this speak without knowledge. It is not true. He has been suspended because he holds doctrins as to the ownership of land which are contrary to the teaching of the church, and also because he disdained to notice or obey the request of Archbishop Corrigan to cease meddling with politics in the way he did. We are all soldiers of one army, you know, and we must obey."

"To answer what charge has Dr. McGlynn been summoned to Rome?"

"He has not been summoned to Rome to be complimented," Monsignor Preston replied. "He has been summoned to be criticised. Further I may not say. This doctrin of denying man's right to property in land is preposterous. The world will never permit it to prevail. The church will, in my opinion, never allow it to be held within her borders. It is contrary to the pope's encyclical, as the archbishop showed in his letter."

"How can Dr. McGlynn be restored to his pastorate?"

"By recanting his land theories."

"By no other way?"

"By no other way."

"Is there a possibility of the archbishop and Dr. McGlynn coming to an agreement in the matter, and thus ending the trouble?"

"Their agreement or disagreement amounts to nothing in this matter until Dr. McGlynn recants."

"What if Dr. McGlynn should refuse to go to Rome? Would he by that act put himself outside of the church?"

"By no means. He would remain a priest, but a priest without a charge. To the charges already preferred against him would be added the charge of contumacy, a very serious matter, one possibly resulting in the severing of the connection between church and priest."

Whether Dr. McGlynn will get upon the stool of repentance or not, no one at present knows. Intimations are not wanting from some of his political friends that he will not.

It is the well-known policy of the church to allow none of its preachers to harbor any ideas but its own. Dr. McGlynn is not the first man asked to recant, but he is fortunate in living in this century when he cannot be put upon the rack or wheel to force his retraction. There is an inquisition still at Rome, but it is not the institution of Seville, and its power over the bodies of its heretical priests is limited. Dr. McGlynn can return to America after his interview with the authorities at the Vatican.

Unconsciously, in this interview, Monsignor Preston has revealed a policy of the church hitherto denied. Dr. McGlynn, he said, has been suspended because he "meddled with politics in the way he did." A few weeks ago, the World, of this city, reported that "few men did more than Dr. McGlynn to secure the nomination of Governor Cleveland for president by the timely and effectiv assurance which he gave at the final moment that the voters whose interests he had at heart would support that nomination." But Dr. McGlynn was not then suspended, refused the power to officiate at mass, nor prohibited from preaching. The manner of his political meddling then was not offensiv to his superiors.

Whether the world or the Roman Catholic church will permit the idea to grow that land should be free is not, we think, a matter for Monsignor Preston to airily settle off-hand. The church may excommunicate all Catholics who hold such sentiments, and thus keep the Catholic fold clear of the heresy, but the world has an obstinate way of thinking for itself, and any idea that is prohibited seems to spread the faster because of the prohibition. Numerous instances of this kind might be cited, were their recital not calculated to injure the feelings of the Romish authorities. Dr. McGlynn himself recalled one such to the recollection of Archbishop Corrigan during the campaign.

Whatever the outcome may be of this disagreement between a Catholic "soldier" and his officers, it will hav served to show that the Romish church is still the same dungeon for the brain that she has been through all the centuries. Within her borders thought is a prisoner, and every tongue a convict locked in its narrow cell. Before freedom can come, the Roman Catholic church must go.

The Umatilla Reservation School.

The fight over the Indian agency school on the Umatilla reservation in Oregon is one of the evil results of parceling out the education of the Indians to the different religious sects. Pursuant to that policy, this school fell to the lot of the Roman Catholics, and they established a so-called school conducted by so-called Sisters of Mercy. The excommunicated Agent Coffey was given charge of the agency by the government at Washington, but though a good Catholic, his appointment was distasteful to Archbishop Gross, and a warfare between the agent and the church has since been waged.

The archbishop accuses Agent Coffey of dismissing two of the "sisters" from the school to make room for two teachers of his own selection, and of a general desire to make the school undenominational. This latter constitutes the most serious offense in the eyes of the archbishop, and the sisters were directed to resign. Then Agent Coffey and the Indian commissioners took hold and placed other teachers in charge of the school. Of this action the archbishop writes indignantly:

"Had even all of the sisters resigned, did that giv the commissioners and Coffey the authority to change a school given us Catholics by the government, into an undenominational one? But the commissioners hav not even that poor excuse, for of their own authority they, without consulting the Catholic authorities, turn out the priest, the principal, and two of the sisters. In the same arbitrary manner they took from us Catholics a school given us by the government, and turned it into an undenominational one. Who gave Coffey and the commissioners such powers? Without a word to the Catholic authorities, a Catholic school given us by the United States government has turned into an undenominational one—that is, a school where no religion whatever, whether Catholic or Protestant, can be taught to our poor Indians."

The other side of the case is given the public through the columns of the Oregonian by Col. Wm. Parsons, special United States Indian agent, who investigated Coffey's charges against the sisters and priests, and because of which Commissioner Pearson removed them. The most flagrant of the sisters' offenses was maintaining two schools with a force of teachers sufficient for only one. They drew pay from the government for conducting the Umatilla reservation school, but devoted most of their time to a school at Pendleton. The money which supported the Umatilla school was raised by the sale of a square mile of land belonging to all the Indians, regardless of sectarianism, upon which the town of Pendleton now stands; and they complained that it was not right that this money should be used to support a sectarian school. Only a small proportion of the Indians on the reservation were Catholics, the remainder being either Protestants or not members of any church; consequently a large proportion of the children who ought to hav been in school did not go at all so long as the sisters had charge of the only school on the reservation. When the two sisters were removed, and the others deserted, and the school was made unsectarian, the attendance of the Indian children more than doubled. The school is also much better conducted, the scholars advance more rapidly in their studies, the buildings are better kept, and the sanitary condition of the school is much improved.

Of course the Catholic church authorities are angry at having the school taken from them, but it is vastly better for the school itself. Under the present management the children will possibly learn sufficient to make them good citizens. Under Catholic management they would learn only sufficient to make them good Catholics. And there exists a wide chasm between a good citizen and a good Catholic. The government should recall its Indian gifts to the churches, and itself maintain thoroughly secular schools. In no other way, it seems, can the peace be preserved and the education of the Indians satisfactorily accomplished.

Editorial Notes.

DEAN GRAY, of Harvard, told the Fifth avenue worshipers last Sunday "how to approach God." This, we imagin, should read like the old recipe of "how to cook a hare? First catch your hare."

THE court which will try C. B. Reynolds for blasphemy convenes at Morristown on the 18th inst. Mr. Reynolds's case is set down as the first to be heard. Let us hope that it will be the last of the kind that will ever be heard in the world.

ABOUT every paper in the country has this week an obituary of 1886 and a prophecy for 1887. It occurs to us that most folks know what happened last year, and that no one knows what will happen this year. Therefore the utility of the articles is very doubtful.

THE Russell Manufacturing Co., of Middletown, Conn., made the Methodist church fair a donation of a sample case of suspenders to be sold for the benefit of the Lord, and on the same day reduced the wages in one department of their work five per cent. Their employees hope no more church fairs will be held.

A MORE or less sensible guess as to what will happen in the next world to Christians and heathens was made last Sunday by Rev. Dr. Kimber, of Augustine's chapel, in this city. "I believe," he said, "that a good, conscientious heathen, who acts according to his lights, will stand a much better chance in the next world than those Christians who belie their creed by their unrighteous lives. In fact, I think the lot of the latter will be infinitly worse than that of the heathen." If there is a "next world," we think the Rev. Dr. Kimber is right.

THE Andover heresy trials are still going on, and the professors who hold and teach "the larger hope"—i. e., that dead people may be given a chance to repent and be saved—hav had a hearing. The discussion has involved the waste of a large amount of breath, and that is about all. The scriptures may, or may not, teach future probation, and the Andover creed may, or may not, teach the same doctrin. The facts in the matter are not altered in the slightest degree by either; and what the facts are nobody knows or can know. All discussion of the subject, therefore, is, in the language of Ecclesiastes, "vanity and a striving after wind."

IT is a very short peg indeed upon which the Roman Catholics authorities cannot hang a plea for special generosity in giving by their followers. This year is the jubilee year of the pope's ordination as a priest, and the archbishop of Paris has set the example for other archbishops by commanding that all the faithful shall pray for the pope, shall make heavy donations to the Peter's pence fund, shall giv him chalices and other gold and silver sacramental objects, and, as the special homage of Paris, a tiara is to be subscribed for, the jewels of which, the archbishop suggests, shall be those now only "ministering to vanity." This suggestion means that the women are to be asked to giv up their jewel ornaments to make a hat for the pope.

IN a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we noted that Lillian Harman's sentence having expired, she was released. We gave the notice on the authority of Lucifer. But when Mr. Harman went to Oskaloosa to pay his daughter's half of the costs, and take her back to Valley Falls, she absolutely refused to hav the costs paid, claiming that she had wronged no one, and could not acknowledge the justice of the sentence to pay costs. Therefore she is still in custody, along with her husband, and the state officers say she will be held until the costs are paid. Mr. Walker also announces that he will not pay costs when his sentence expires, and unless the supreme court reverses the decision of the court which convicted them, their sojourn in jail is likely to be long.

POLITICAL success does not always bring happiness. Abram S. Hewitt got about thirty thousand more votes than any other candidate for mayor of New York, and was elected. He is a man of nervous temperament, and is troubled with insomnia, which the excitement of the campaign aggravated so that he did not get much sleep until after the election. Last Saturday Mr. Hewitt went down to the City Hall and took the oath of office, and, while standing in a draught receiving the congratulations of his friends, he took cold and is laid up with rheumatism. His message had to be sent to the board of aldermen by a messenger, and another man is acting mayor. Meanwhile the defeated candidate, Mr. Roosevelt, went away to Europe and married a nice girl; Henry George is about to enter upon an editorial career at the helm of the Standard, and Mr. Wardwell is doubtless comfortably fixed somewhere near the fire. Not one of them, probably, would exchange places with Mayor Hewitt, and take his insomnia and rheumatism. It is better to be healthy than to be mayor, even of "the great metropolitan city of New York."

Letters from Friends.

TORONTO, ONT., CANADA, Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I forward $5, for which you will please giv me credit on my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1887, and let $1 be applied for the defense of Mr. Reynolds. The rest of the money is for pamphlets as per list inclosed. Continue the pictures; the balloon was first-rate.

JAMES BODY.

PERRIS, CAL., Dec. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1886-87. Accept many thanks for continuing to send the paper. If I tell you I cut wood and drew it twenty miles to get the $5.00 sent, you will understand how much I think of the dear, grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

Hoping not to be in arrears again, I remain,

Yours for the truth, H. L. WRIGHT.

WILSON, ILL., Dec. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your subscriber, Eli Erickson, of Wilson, Ill., emigrated from here some time ago, and I bought the unexpired time of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As that time is now expired, I remit a year's subscription, and also one new subscriber. We are both activ workers in the cause. Campus contains a Catholic and a Methodist church. Your paper, with its cartoons, keeps them red-hot. They had rather see the devil come there than THE TRUTH SEEKER.

E. T. POTTER.

TOPEKA, KAN., Dec. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $8.50, for four subscriptions to the grand old journal of liberty. We hav commenced work here, and will organize a union soon. I think we can muster up close to one hundred faithful soldiers to the cause of humanity and reality. We hav been receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER through the news stands. I think by spring we can raise the subscriptions to twenty-five, as we intend to work faithfully. C. H. ST. CLAIR.

FORKS CREEK, COL., Dec. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Received your circular to-day, and will send you two dollars on my subscription, as it is all the small bills I hav. Would not do without the paper for twice the amount. We take the Investigator, Freethinkers' Magazine, and the Liberal. So you see we are well supplied with food for the mind.

We look forward to Mr. Putnam's coming with pleasure. Would like to get up a club for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I liv at a railroad station, where there are but few people, most of them Catholics.

Mrs. Buckner-Johnson has left us for "sunny" Florida. All her friends miss her very much.

And now, hoping that prosperity and success will follow THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Liberal cause in general through all time to come, I am, Yours truly, B. L. SMITH.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Dec. 15, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.75—$5 on subscription for the best of papers, 50 cents for Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" to mail to my orthodox friends, and 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

I feel to say that the cartoons are excellent and full of meaning; besides, they assist in introducing the paper in this (Mormon) community, so we must not be so sensitiv "out West" here over the ridiculing of "sacred" things as some of our Eastern friends. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a fine missionary for the cause about here, as the Mormons think it hits the other Christians more direct than them. So they venture to read, not seeming to realize that thereby they will be led to question the divinity of their own creed.

What seems best of all, we are to hav the genial S. P. Putnam with us again, and before the winter is gone the Utah orthodox will begin to think Ingersollism and Infidelity is growing. HEOTOR W. HAIGHT.

JAMESPORT, MO., Dec. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It makes me sad to think tha. there is one man in this land of boasted liberty who is compelled to be a hypocrit in order to make a success of any business. Must the teachers of this country surrender their manhood and religious independence in order to keep their positions? "Schoolmaster" writes very discouragingly about his liberty. God's Town must be completely engulfed in the darkness of superstition and intolerant ignorance.

Come farther West, brother, and you can gain your freedom and manhood for which you pine and weep. We, as a class, in the West set store by a man according to his value to society. The teachers here do not find it necessary to act the hypocrit to keep in the profession. I am outspoken at all times on my religious opinions, yet I respect and consider the feelings and opinions of others. Some of my best friends are in the Christian ranks, although I am known by everyone to be past redemption. I work and argue against Christianity on every occasion, and yet am now employed for the sixth successiv term in a Christian district by Christian directors. For seven years hav I contended against every class of religious fanatics without mercy or fear, and during all that time hav been employed continuously in three districts, one after another. Christianity is certainly on the wane here.

Mr. Remsburg writes me that he will be here sometime in January, and I hope he will awaken a spirit of investigation and inquiry. We need hundreds more such men in the field constantly, if we wish to accomplish a final triumph of our cause. I am often surprised at the ignorance of the people with regard to religion. Can there not be some more perfect system of organization proposed? It seems to me that the Liberals lack system, especially as to revenue. The fund of the National Secular Union is uncertain, and depends entirely upon the liberality of its friends. This is not as it should be. A few pay all the expenses, while the great mass of Liberals pay nothing. U. F. SHULER.

MONTROSE, IA., Dec. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Assuming that you will pardon a stranger friend for addressing these few lines to you, I will state our case, and solicit some advice. There are a great many Liberals in this vicinity, but we are unorganized, and hav never had any Liberal lectures in this neighborhood. So the field is all open to the preachers, who hav been striving hard for the last ten or twelve days and nights to get up a revival, but without success, or a very poor one, as they got only one old darkey woman and one white man and his wife to come forward, the latter having once been Methodists, and then Baptists, and now Methodists again.

The preachers tried all their arts to get the people to join. They first called on all who wanted to go to heaven to rise—only one or two responded. They then called on all who wanted to go to hell to keep their seats—when about all remained seated. Now, we are tired of this thing, and wish to organize and hav some lectures from a good Liberal speaker. Please tell us how to proceed, and what would be the probable cost; and by so doing you will oblige,

Yours respectfully, W. B. VAN VLIET.

ROANOKE, VA., Dec. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Enclosed find one dollar, to continue my paper three months more, and then I hope to be able to hav a club of three here. This is a very religious place. I know of but one Infidel besides myself that has got the sand to say so. My next-door neighbor, our ex-mayor, reads my TRUTH SEEKER, and is as anxious for every issue as I am, but don't want people to know it, for fear of losing popularity. I hav long since publicly expressed my unbelief, and I don't see as it hurts me in my business, for I try to show my neighbors that it does not require a Christian always to be a charitable and benevolent man. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and always intend to read it as long as I can get it. The letters from friends are very interesting. I like the pictures; but of course I don't indorse everything that comes under the head of Freethought. Some able and good men are Atheists, but I think I hav had sufficient evidence for me to be a Spiritualist. I don't doubt that half the mediums claiming to operate between this condition of man and the next are frauds; but if we can prove one genuin communication, though there be a million frauds, the fact that it is possible still remains.

E. STODDARD.

MONTESANO, W. T., Dec. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your most highly-appreciated paper is received regularly, and I find many communications and editorials upon the important issues of the day that are worthy of the highest praise.

Our small city is at present in a quiet state, but it has been but a few weeks since the good people had a serious church trial, which ended in one or more of the truly good being "fired," and finally in the burning of the church, by whom no one knows.

I believe that but a short time will expire before an orgauization will be perfected in this valley, as there are, to my knowledge, many Freethinkers here. and it needs only a starter to bring things to a business basis.

We are suffering at present from the iron hand of the local option law. The city is cheated out of a revenue of about $500 a year, and there is more whisky sold than when they granted a license.

The county has been, and is now, to a great extent governed by a set of cranky temperance fanatics, but it will not be so long, as we are gaining ground slowly but surely.

Knowing that you are working in a good cause, I expect entire success of your faithful organ.

Inclosed please find $3.00 to apply on subscription.

FRANK LESSMAN.

PORTLAND, OR., Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: There is a young preacher out West who promised to marry five young ladies. Everyone agrees that he is a very promising young man.

It would be just as reasonable to expect a man to climb a tree headed up in a barrel, as to expect a man who is a slave to a creed to think clearly on scientific subjects.

A preacher not long since accused me of lying. He said I had no right to infringe on his patent.

Preachers compare themselvs to worms. I wonder how they would like to be used for bait.

Christians should be careful what they pray for. They must remember the flood was brought about by a Baptist prayer-meeting.

I had a splendid dog, until he followed a friend of mine to a Presbyterian church. After that he went to sucking eggs and killing sheep.

I guess Christians will quit climbing the golden stairs pretty soon. They will be going up in an elevator.

The Bible was made for impostors to preach, and fools to believe.

The people are farther advanced in religion in the West than in the East. We hav a god factory in 'Frisco.

Preachers generally use large words and small sense. The man with the longest head generally uses the shortest words.

Preachers go 'round the country pedling heaven and begging on the Lord's credit, wherever his credit happens to be good.

Preachers say we must be washed in the blood of the Lamb. Why not be washed in the blood of the Pig? I would like to ask the question whether if Jesus Christ should walk into Trinity church in New York with his old clothes on he would be welcome?

I wonder how old Christ was when he was born,

A good many Christians hav more faith in a lightning-rod than in God.

There is a moral about the betrayal kiss of Judas. It shows the folly of kissing a man.

There are not many Christians who would kneel in the mud with their Sunday pants on to thank God for anything.

I think a man with a big foot would stand a poor chance on the narrow path.

The Salvation Army has nominated Jesus as a candidate for governor of Oregon. The members go around hollering, "Hurrah for Jesus!" The Salvation Army is booming town property in the New Jerusalem.

I hope that my readers will pardon any irreverent remark I might make, as I am not much of a Jesus man.

Everybody will be going to heaven pretty soon, for hell will soon be full.

The Christian religion offers a greater reward for one thief that repents than for ninety-nine men who hav always been honest.

I wonder what they would do in heaven if there should be two saints to one harp. G. W. BOWMAN.

STEUBENVILLE, Dec. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Presumption gone mad is what I should designate the disease of the religious fanatics who pretend to describe what they call God as a monster man, with all the passions and attributes of man. The idea that man should attempt to fathom the power that originated the circulation of the blood, a blade of grass, or even the growth of a finger-nail, with his limited capacity, seems to me the most presumptuous, and at the same time the most ridiculous, thing in the world. When will we learn to know that we do not know anything about it? We are of the earth, earthy, and when we attempt to go beyond that we are attempting more than our capacity warrants.

How much better "Agnosticism!" It does not pretend to know anything beyond this life, and uses all the powers that nature givs us to better the condition of our fellow-creatures and those who are to come after us. We waste no energy on other worlds, but endeavor to improve the condition of those who hav to occupy this, and, when our time comes to leave it, we resign our place and only know that if we ever are conscious again we hav nothing to regret, and hope to use the talents given us to do all the good we can in a second life as we hav done in this.

Why will man run after baubles in another world and leave undone his evident duty in this? It is the fact that cunning priests hav learned that they can liv sumptuously on the labor of others, so long as they can turn the attention of the masses to a future world, while they gull them out of the blessings they might hav in this. Talk about political rings; why, they are harmless in comparison to the rings of the priests, that encompass the whole world, both civilized and savage. They must be broken up by the organization of those who can burst the chains they hav placed on the minds of men, before mankind can be raised to the full stature of manhood. J. DOWNES.

SPRINGVILLE, UTAH, Dec. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to write a few lines to comfort and cheer all those who are advocating the cause of oppressed humanity. We hav here to labor under at least an average of adverse circumstances, and for one I will do my best to "look upon the bright side," and hope for the best.

I like the idea of Putnam and others for us to organize as far as possible in order to more effectually combat the errors of the past, and also to build up something better adapted to the higher wants of humanity. But for the present here in Utah we shall most likely hav to be satisfied with organizing politically in self-defense with all classes who are non-Mormon against the People's Church and State party.

Now a few words about subscribers for our TRUTH SEEKER. Various excuses are made for not subscribing. The few who feel inclined find it difficult to raise the money; for the little they get has to be spent for the necessaries of life. I hav offered the journal to any new subscriber for two dollars, while I pay three, so, if possible, to induce others to come along. I show it, and use encouraging words. Now, by waiting till a few days after New Year, I hav the promis of one new subscriber; therefore I delay to send till then my amount. I cannot refrain from acknowledging my grateful feelings to you and many others who write for our excellent journal; for it is a feast of mental food to all who read it, unless their appetite is depraved; and as for the pictures, I look over them with delight every time.

I cannot omit to say we hav a few good and true Freethinkers here in Utah that I love much to associate with. But for fear of trespassing too much by being too lengthy I will close, after stating in short what pertains to C. B. Reynolds for his defense and services in our cause, who deserves much more than he gets from his friends. The $2.50 sent is from H. S. Brooks, Joseph Tibbetts, David L. Evans, H. M. Dougall, and L. W. Gallup, each fifty cents.

Fraternally, L. W. GALLUP.

HAVANA, ILL., Dec. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav not written a letter for THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, I thought I would giv you a short sketch of our Freethought work here.

Quiver township is in Mason county, Ill. It is noted for its great revival meetings, which are held here every winter by Rev. Mr. Juda, pastor of the Christian church. Last winter this Rev. Juda was conducting his orthodox circus, and about fourteen were converted, baptized, and declared members. All were baptized in winter, when the themometer was about zero. They were afraid to put it off until warm weather for fear they might die, and if they should die without being baptized they thought sure the devil would get them. This same Juda, who did all this work last winter, has just closed his big meetings to his sorrow. After all his preaching, begging, and kind invitations for people to accept his doctrin, I am glad to say he did not get a convert. Disheartened-looking, sad, and melancholy, he gave it up as a bad job. This was rather sad for the man of God, but what was the cause of all this? Why, the good people of Quiver are beginning to think and reason upon this subject, and during his meetings a couple of true and not-afraid-to-speak Liberalists scattered the doctrin of Freethought among this good people, and that is what opened their eyes and caused them to think. The minister tried to stuff them with his Bible myths and prodigal-son stories as he had done before, but it was all of no use.

Last Sunday, December 19th, the members had the pleasure of baptizing a lady who united with the church last summer, but at that time was in feeble health, and they thought it unsafe to baptize her then, but last Sunday, when the thermometer ranged about zero, she was taken to the beautiful Quiver creek, and, when all the congregation had assembled on the banks, she was led down into the ice-cold water and ducked in the name of the Lord. The waters in the creek seemed to laugh at such ignorance as this. It was a disgrace to a civilized community like Quiver. But the great time is over, and the minister has gone to labor in some more promising field. I am happy to say that Freethought gained more converts than he did.

I think if we can keep the ball of Freethought rolling, we can do a great deal of good in this community. I for one am always ready and willing to, and do spread Freethought every time I hav a chance, and I think it's every true and honest man's duty to do all he can to keep the flag of liberty flying in the air. Our forefathers fought hard against the church that we could hav the pleasure of enjoying liberty, and now to stand by with our mouths shut, and say nothing, and let our country go back into the hands of the church again, would be like standing by and seeing a thief run off with the goods of an honest man's labor.

I am a Freethinker now, and will continue one until this mortal frame of mine is laid to rest. J. A. WEABER.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Dec. 19, 286.

MR. EDITOR: The worthy secretary of the American Secular Union has hit the right nail on the head when he says: "If it were not for political power I should never think of a Freethought organization." That sums the whole thing up in a nutshell. Liberals, did you ever consider that as long as you are about equally divided up among the political parties you are not the "kind of cats" that politicians cater to? The majority of Catholics are Democrats, and the majority of Protestants are Republicans; and do they not both receive favor from their respectiv parties? Hence the advantage is apparent of being organized and throwing our influence in a body; then we can accomplish something and obtain recognition. What is the use to write to the candidate of your respectiv party when it is a foregone conclusion that you allow to vote for him no difference what his answer may be, which is generally this: "While I am in favor of a total separation of church and state, if I am elected I would vote against any measure favoring the Nine Demands of Liberalism." Is not such an answer a contradiction in terms, because the Nine Demands of Liberalism show just wherein church and state are united? And can it be possible that he doesn't know the meaning of the word "total?" No, he knows your prejudices for your party, and that with the fact staring you in the face that you can expect nothing better from the other parties you will support him.

Liberals how do you intend to accomplish the Nine Demands of Liberalism? Only through a political effort. But our leaders must not wait for us to become strong through organization before they make a political effort. Did our Revolutionary fathers wait until they became strong before they made an effort for national independence? Did the advocates of Abolition wait until they had become strong through organization? Did the noble men and women throughout all ages wait until they gained enough friends to defend them before giving their grand truths to the world? No; the word wait is not the stuff of which heroes are made. The only way for us to succeed is to make a bold stand, and then, and not till then, can we surmount what seems to be an impossibility. To pave the way for this, attend your respectiv parties' convention, and tell them in plain words what plank you are most in favor of in their platform, and insist if they don't intend to carry out the plank to the letter for the sake of truth and contempt of hypocrisy not to insert it. And then compare notes, and if there are any of the parties that will make a faithful promise to carry out our plank, then it is the bounden duty of every Liberal to support that party, and this you can do without sacrificing any of your political principles, of course, except you are prejudiced because there is no other issue between—especially the two old parties—except the tariff, and they are divided on that, there being free-trade Republicans and protectiv Democrats. But if there are none that will make a faithful promis to carry out the Nine Demands of Liberalism, then we should ally ourselvs with some new party, because they are most always progressiv, and hence the easier to ingraft upon. Remember that the Abolitionists had received no promises from that once hale and buoyant party, the Republican, who carried out the Abolitionist movement to their entire satisfaction. What would such an effort accomplish in my opinion? It would force all parties to expunge from their platforms planks they hav no intention of carrying out. What effect would this hav? Why, there are thousands that would leave their party if it should omit one plank in the platform, no matter if there never had been any other use made of it any more than an ornament; and who could blame them, that being the most beautiful part about the platform? Besides, this would force an issue and would giv an impetus to Liberalism throughout the country. I am aware that new movements are made up of individuals who hav been ostracized more or less, but if you can get them to take hold once they will sweep every thing before them, no matter if their social faculty has been forced to lie dormant on account of their uncongenial surroundings.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

KENT, O., Dec. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Much is being said at the present time about landed equality. Many claim that the god of nature intended all land to be free, and to belong to his people in equal proportions; that no one has the right in equity to hold in "fee simple" any part of Mother Earth, but that each and every one should hav the right to enter upon any lands they may desire, to grow the necessaries of life, without hindrance or objection by anyone else. I know this field of argument is open and broad enough for many fluent speeches, but I wish to giv in a few words my idea of the question, and, to represent the same, I wish to place man back to the more primitiv state, and imagin every man to be in possession of forty acres of land. On this amount of land every man could certainly grow enough to feed a large family. But I soon learn that we need something besides food for our comforts. We need clothes to keep us warm. What are we to do? Why, we hav only to grow the cotton, and raise the sheep, and we are fixed. This seems easy, but we shall need some device for making the cotton and wool into yarn, the yarn into cloth. How are we to do this from the ground? Why, one man says, you take my land and grow food for us both, and I will make machinery to make the yarn. Then comes another and says, You take my forty acres and raise keeping for all three of us, and I will make the clothes for all of us. We now hav food and raiment, but we need houses to liv in. What shall we do in this case? We can not grow our houses. Now comes the fourth man, and says, Farmer, you take my land and raise food for the manufacturer, the tailor, and the laborer, and we will make the sawmill, saw the lumber, make the iron and nail mill, make the nails, etc., to build us all houses, and we will exchange our work and product for your work and product. By this plan all are fed, clothed, and housed. No price seems to be set to any article of production on either side. A mutual and equitable exchange or barter is expected. When the farmer takes his product to the manufacturer to barter for articles of manufacture that he needs, he finds a great deal of time and labor is required to make the exchange; also finds that many times other farmers hav supplied the wants of the manufacturer and laborer, and he fails to make an exchange. He may desire to cross the Atlantic, but finds no place where he can trade corn for a ticket of transit. Neither is it convenient to carry with him potatoes or onions to pay his other expenses while making the trip. To remedy this, our government, like others, has said that certain metals of certain size and quality shall hav a certain denominate value, and such minerals (called money) shall be taken and given in exchange for all articles of value; also shall be taken for all labor, service, or assistance rendered by one to another. The law-makers when making such law did not, nor could not, put a price upon any article of traffic or commodity, but left each and every one to determin what he should, or can, get for such article or service. If law should fix the price of corn or a day's work, and it was afterward found the price of corn was too high, the laborer would soon be found a producer of corn, and a surplus would be the result. Then a reaction would come, and the number of laborers would be augmented, and corn would become scarce.

Where the price of everything is left to be governed by circumstances, equality of prices can be better fixed. When there is a surplus of corn, the price of corn decreases. When more manufactured articles are on the market than there is a call for, the prices must decline. When there is a surplus of laborers, and men are looking for work, there must be a reduction in wages.

Thus we see how it is that landed property came to be in the hands of a few. We do not all want land. The doctor, the lawyer, manufacturer, mechanic, etc., hav no use for land, but each earns his living by his brain and skill. Land did not grow everything needed to make us comfortable, and barter or exchange was a failure. We find that although each had an equal proportion of Mother Earth when we started, necessity compelled us to barter away our rights in such land that one man might hav more land in order to raise produce for those who choose to utilize the other blessings that nature has placed within our reach. Even those that wish land do not need the same amount. One man wishes land on which to graze his flocks, and needs more acres. Another wishes to grow grain, and requires less acres. Another livs near town, and wishes to engage in "truck farming," and can till but a small amount of land. No two require the same amount. Again: if there were no individual lands, who would take the trouble to enrich the poorer lands for others to work? Who would work the poorer land when the rich valleys are more productiv? To remedy this difficulty, man, from the earliest ages, has made natural, just, and equitable laws to protect each individual in his natural rights. No one is allowed to infringe or trespass on the rights of another. I believe it as much impossible to keep up and maintain a civilized nation or government without individual rights and individual property as it is for vegetation to grow without the light and heat of the sun. All are not, nor cannot be, farmers. It requires skill and hard work to grow the necessaries of life. No two farmers can grow the same amount of crops, even on the same land. The farmer who uses the best judgment, does the most work, and that at the proper time, who is the most economical, and sees to his business the best, is the most successful. As with the farmer, so with the manufacturer, the doctor, lawyer, mechanic, and the common laborer. No two laborers will do the same amount of work in a day of the same quality. No two use the same economy, etc., consequently one makes a better living than another.

Would it be right for the economist to be compelled to divide with the shiftless spendthrift! No two trees in the forest are of the same commercial worth, although growing side by side on the same ground, their leaves drinking in the same rains and dews, and breathing the same air. Nature has so decreed, and man cannot change her laws. We may, and it is our duty to, improve our condition in life all we can, but we cannot all arrive at that same moral, physical, or financial worth. We should not envy those who succeed better than ourselvs. If we do as best we can, the same god or power that brought us into this world, and to which we are all subject, will, when the separating link is broken that binds the present with the eternal future, if he has so decreed, waft our never-dying soul to its future destiny—our material bodies back to mother dust to foster the minute germs of a new creation.

From whence we came, or where we go,
Is not for mortal man to know.
We need not ask—no one can tell
Whether we stop here, or go hence to dwell.
While we are permitted here to liv,
Ask not what we would not freely giv.
Make the best of everything all we can,
And envy not our fellow-man.

CONOORD, KY., Dec. 17, 286.

MR. EDITOR: "Chilton A. White has joined the Christian church." So says one of our country organs. Not that there is anything remarkable about a man of this name joining this church or any other. It is a simple fact, an every-day occurrence, but there is a point or two of which I wish to make a note.

Chilton A. White has been a distinguished light in our political circle. He has heretofore been regarded as a profound jurisconsult, gifted with a large share of forensic eloquence, and has held positions of trust and emolument. As we said before, this thing of itself is of little moment, but we believe one logically inclined might get an argument out of it, might draw an inference.

Why did Chilton A. White wait until this time in his life to seek ingress at the door of salvation? That entrance would hav welcomed him years ago. There is a reason, and I propose to voice it. He, unless compelled, would never do it. He has harbored the reason long, but he smothered it too, and would hav suffocated it if he could. But it seems secrets are tired of concealment, and are avenging themselvs by revelation, so this one has strengthened with his weakness, overmastered, and, at last, betrayed him.

Our reason or inference is this—and if our distinguished subject can detect an error in it we would be glad to hav him do so: He is growing old. Whisper it as softly as you please, but it is all too true. He is growing old in that sense that bespeaks inanition and decay. The kind of vitality which he has been utilizing is running low, and he seeks this holy receptacle for his waning powers. Yes, after having harvested the fruitage of his prime and vigor, he is going to devote his exhausted energies to God. It seems as though God gets a great deal of this kind of largess. I do not know whether he ever inspects the nature of the compliment or not, but if he does he cannot feel very highly flattered, one would think. But what matters it so Chilton A. White turns good and goes to heaven? And then here is something else of consideration. If younger and more effectiv men hav crowded him from the rostrum and forum, he may yet occupy the exhortation platform, and it may be in time the pulpit, in his turn filling the place of some one still more effete than himself—not be hustled into obscurity all at once, but by kindly imperceptible degrees. If he is compelled to forsake Blackstone, his God of civil law, which he never desecrated by question or deviation, he still as a dernièr resort has the supreme head of the new Jerusalem for quotation and interpretation. Quite a philosophical deduction and a pleasing perspectiv.

We will close our brief criticism with an antithesis. We quote verbatim the brave words of one whose name is as familiar to THE TRUTH SEEKER family as a household word: "Having been victimized by this sentiment called religion, and the best part of my life lost, I feel certain that it is, and always has been, a curse to the race, and I am striving to rid myself, and wish I could the world, of the last dregs of it."

What a contrast! The author of these grand utterances has had the advantages of time, experience, and education. He is a man of letters, has figured conspicuously in court circles, and been made the recipient of many honors due his superior abilities. But greater than all are his unswerving integrity, his deep insight into truth, and his unwavering fidelity to it. It is these supereminent qualities that hav lifted him above his fellows and made him the greatest "Roman of them all." Accumulating years hav not robbed him. They hav, instead, added majesty to his mind and dignity to his name. Unlike our newly-made child of Christianity, the act of whom proclaimed retrogression, deterioration, and decline, his course is marked by development, progress, and advancement. While the one has sunk into the driveling occupation of saving his own soul, the other is working earnestly and intently in meliorating the condition of the race. The act of the one abets and indorses enslavement, while every thought and deed of the other make for emancipation. The one is forging manacles; the other is striving by every honorable means to break them. The one, as the crowning act of his life, blindly embraces delusion; the other as indignantly rejects it. The church may vauntingly boast of its newly-acquired acquisition, and prate of the wonderful influence likely to result from it, but a thousand such acquisitions are as nothing compared with this name which glorifies the splendid domain of Freethought.

Begging our friend's pardon for the contrast, we will leave, for the time, the "regenerated," who, like the poor cardinal, turns to his God when he can no longer serve his king. O religion, thou art a jewel!

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Hail, Thou New Year!

Hail, thou New Year! though thou hast come so soon,
I'm hardly willing yet to say good-bye
To the old friend who lays aside his crown,
And in the grave of time lies down to die.
I had grown fond of him, and learned to know
The faults and virtues of the dear Old Year;
He brought me many a comfort, many a joy,
Although—ah, yes—he caused me many a tear.

But for the tears, as often as they flowed,
He gave me peace, he gave me smiles again,
And taught me to look upward to hope's skies,
And see the rainbow gleaming through the rain.
The dear Old Year! He came as merrily
As thou dost come, just twelve short months ago;
And now, because he has grown old at last,
Shall we forget the faithful life? Ah, no!

Thou art a stranger; what know men of thee?
Thy promises may all be fair and bright,
But many a morning dawning cloudlessly
Has brought a weary day and stormy night.
Well, we will welcome thee—ay, trust thee, too;
Thy face is fair, and young, and glad, and we
Will ask a blessing on thy reign, O king!
Till a new year shall take thy throne from thee.

Rebecca.

Rebecca lived away back in the last century, when the people spun and wove all the garments they wore. The spinning-wheel was more important than any other article of household furniture, and it was not ornamented with gay ribbons and set up in the best room, as sometimes seen in these days, but it was in almost constant use, the big wheel going round and round from the rising to the setting of the sun. Rebecca was very handy at spinning all kinds of yarn, except street yarn, and also knew how to weave the yarn into cloth; then, too, she knew how to fashion the cloth into clothes. She was a bright-eyed, smart, capable Yankee girl when she attracted the attention of the wife of Governor Belcher, who was in pursuit of a maid to assist her in such work as Rebecca was versed in. Jonathan Belcher made the acquaintance of Lady Belcher in England, where they were married, and she followed his fortunes to the wilds of America. Mr. Belcher was a graduate of Harvard College in the year 1699, and was regarded as a very promising young man, and in England associated with the Princess Sophia and her son, who is known in history as George I.

When Governor Burnet of the Colonies died in 1730, Mr. Belcher was appointed by the king governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and he held that honorable position for eleven years. Afterward he visited England for the third time, and then was appointed governor of New Jersey, and went there to liv. He became the patron and great benefactor of Princeton College. But it was while he lived in Boston, and was governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, that Rebecca went to liv in his family. Lady Belcher was greatly interested in her tidy waiting-maid, and was often amused at her witty remarks. Sometimes Lady Belcher was sad when she thought of her distant home and her relativs far across the deep Atlantic. At such times Rebecca would strive to interest her in various ways.

"If I could read, dear lady," she said one day, "as you can, I would not be lonely."

"Would you like to learn to read?" inquired Mrs. Belcher.

"Oh, I would indeed," answered Rebecca.

"Then I will teach you," said the good lady. "We will commence now."

Rebecca clapped her hands, and danced about in great glee. She was so apt a scholar that she soon learned to read, write, spell, and cipher.

Oh, how proud she was of her attainments! And how hard she studied! She did not neglect her other duties, but repeated her spelling lesson while at the spinning wheel, or while washing dishes.

At length, when the news spread that Rebecca had become a scholar, she was invited to teach a school. So she opened a school for little girls and boys in her father's house. There was a big fireplace in the room, for there were no stoves then, and the children sat about on benches, stools, and little crickets. She taught them well and faithfully, however, and imparted to them all the book knowledge that she knew.

After a while Rebecca married, and went to liv in a home of her own out among the blue hills at Milton. Little children of her own, boys and girls, came to her, and she tanght them how to grow into good men and good women. When they were grown they never forgot her lessons, and, as after awhile they went away to liv in other parts, they never forgot her. When children they used to hav great fun, piling into the big wagon, which was drawn by oxen, and riding into Boston to see the sights.

The time came when their children, Rebecca's grandchildren, had greater enjoyment riding out to Milton to visit her. Rattlesnakes were in the woods, it was said, and along the fences, but they did not care for rattlesnakes when they went berrying. Berries, wild cherries, and all kinds of nuts were abundant there in their season. One of her grandsons was one day up in a tree, picking cherries, when he accidentally disturbed a nest of hornets. Quick as thought, when he saw what he had done, he threw his basket over his head, and as it bounded to the ground, he jumped, and fell flat upon his face. The hornets in their wild rage flew at the innocent basket and commenced stinging it. The boy, whose name was Isaac, lay as still as a mouse, peeping with one eye occasionally at the enraged hornets stinging the old basket. There he lay until the hornets had had their revenge out, and left, which was not till near nightfall, when he cautiously arose, and ran home to tell the tale to Rebecca, his grandmother, who drew a moral from the action of the hornets toward the innocent basket.

Rebecca lived to a great age, and her life was honest, just, and useful, and she often told of the happy days she passed as lady's maid at the residence of good Governor Belcher. She was wise, thrifty, and industrious, and her traits of character may be still seen in her descendants. S. H. W.

Susie's Perplexity.

"What can they giv me, I wonder?
They gave me last year such a lot,
I really can't think of a present
I havn't already got.

"Books with the prettiest covers,
The prettiest pictures, too,
And full of the sweetest stories—
I havn't yet read them through.

"Work-boxes, thimbles, and needles,
And dresses, and gloves, and shoes
And tables, and china dishes,
How many nobody knows.

"I looked in the windows in Boston,
Full of everything nice and fine,
But I did not see a collection
One-half as pretty as mine.

"My room is perfectly lovely,
Just perfect, and anything more
Would make it dotted and cluttered,
'Twould spoil it, I feel quite sure.

"Ah, I know of another Susie,
She livs just over the way,
Her room looks bare, and her mother
Goes out to work by the day.

"She has just the sweetest of faces,
She's just as good as she looks,
But her mother can scarcely giv her
Her food, and her clothes, and books.

"So I won't take any presents
This year, but this I will say,
Giv them all to the other Susie,
Who livs just over the way." —M. W. R.

Regulating the Elephant.

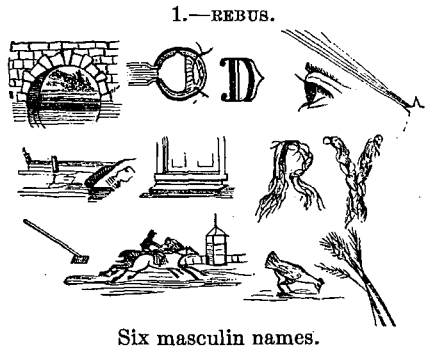
Everybody had heard that the great elephant was loose, and several families whose gardens he had torn up and whose boys he had trampled upon, were sure of it. There was great excitement, and the town held a meeting to decide what should be done. They did not want to exterminate him; in fact, many of them did not believe that they could extermiuate him, for he was a pretty big elephant. Besides, he was useful in his proper place—in shows, in India, and in story-books.

"Our best plan is to try and regulate him," said an enthusiastic speaker. "Let us build toll gates along the routes we find he is going to take, and make him pay——"

"Yes, but that leaves him roaming round," shrieked an old woman. "And I don't want my boy killed."

"Keep your boy away from him; that's your business. Why, madam, don't you know that an elephant's hide and tusks are valuable for mechanical and surgical purposes, and that he is useful in India? Besides, there's the toll he will pay. We shall by this means get money enough into the public treasury to build schools for a good many boys who are not trampled to death."

"That's the plan. Regulate him! Regulate him!" shouted the crowd,



So they appointed a great many committees, and drafted constitutions and by-laws, and circulated petitions, and by the time the elephant had killed several more boys and trampled down a quantity of gardens, they had erected very comfortable toll-houses for the gate-keepers and gates for the elephant; and then they waited with great satisfaction to see the animal regulated.

Slowly the great feet tramped onward; slowly the great proboscis appeared in view; and, with a sniff of contempt, the elephant lifted the gate from its hinges and walked off with it, while the crowd stared after him in dismay.

"Well!" exclaimed the keeper, catching his breath; "we havn't made much money so far, but the regulation plan would hav been first-rate if the elephant hadn't been a leetle stronger than the obstruction." The elephant's name was Whisky.

Giving the sequel to "Adam's Adventures," as suggested by Heston's eighth cartoon in Truth Seeker of September 11th.

Altho' it was not harp-time yet,
A creature with a harp I met.
'Twas Erin's harp, and Hirem Pat
Was playing "Adam's old prime hat."
The tune to me did he impart
With all the vim of his imp heart;
Yet ne'er before did harp emit
Such discord as did hamper it.
Poor mother Eve cried, "Hie, tramp fly!"
"With widow's weeds don't tamper, Hi!"
"You cannot trap me, Hi," she said,
And knocked that prime hat off his head.
But Hirem cried, "Oh, I'm her Pat,"
And begged, "Pray, do not rip me hat!"
So fierce she grabbed him by the hair,
I knew we ne'er should see them pair.
A perfect earth-imp now in ire,
Revenge has set his soul on fire;
With cunning now he eyed their map
To know the place where Eve must nap.
"So when her eyes in sleep are closed,
I'll steal the monkey unopposed;
And so of household gods bereft,
The hat by will, the beast by theft,
'Twill leave her sad and desolate."
'Twas thus I overheard him prate.
"A thrim ape 'tis," Pat swore in court,
For he had bobbed the monkey short.
In vain the trick the rogue to save!
Justice still overtakes the knave!
He sees her with a rope, not far,
And hears her warning, "hemp Itar."
'Tis ever thus since Eden's blight
Our "household gods" work Love's despite.

Irwin, Iowa. J. K. P. Baker.

Note.—All the italicized words contain in each place all the letters of a name for certain "household gods." Only eight letters; and if anyone will try to accomplish something of the same kind perhaps he will giv me some credit for what I here offer in the form of a story—the sequel to "Adam's Adventures."

Correspondence.

Ely, Vt., Dec. 21, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon. As I am a Freethinker, and a reader of The Truth Seeker, I think I will write a few lines for it.

I liv among the snowy hills of Vermont, but in spite of the snow and dismal weather which we are now having, it seems quite pleasant here to me, as this has always been my home.

There are not very many Freethinkers here, but those that are are so cowardly that they dare not speak the word Freethought outright. There are one Catholic and two Protestant churches here. I go to the Protestant church quite often, as I like to hear both sides of the story.

It seems so strange to think that people will believe such stories as there are in the Bible. If the fairy tales had the word Bible printed upon them, the people would believe they were true. I think that Freethought is one of the greatest beliefs in the world. Yet how many people hav been put to death on account of it—a business that would be carried on to-day if the churches had the power. A great many people think that a person is not human unless he believes in some church, and yet how many of the greatest and most distinguished men were, and are, Freethinkers!

How the people of the church dislike Robert G. Ingersoll! I heard it preached the other evening that "he would not be the orator he is if it wasn't for the Christian world."

Now, dear Miss Wixon, I think I shall hav to close, as I am afraid I shall tire you with my letter. If you think this worth printing, I should be pleased to see it in print. I remain, Yours respectfully,

Dena L. Dimond.

P.S.—I should be pleased to correspond with some of the young folks of The Truth Seeker who are about sixteen or more years old. D. L. D.

Oak Point, W. T., Dec. 12, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I saw in The Truth Seeker of Nov. 6th that some kind friend offered to giv a small prize to the little girl who can write the best piece in regard to the world we liv in.

Although we hav but a slim chance for education in this part, I thought I would try my hand at it. I am eleven years and three months old. We liv on the north bank of the Columbia river, forty miles from the Pacific ocean, and sixty miles from Portland, Or., the principal city of the Northwest. Lumbering and fishing is the principal business. Trees grow very large here, from two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet tall, and from six to seven feet in diameter; they are mostly fir, spruce, cedar, and hemlock, and there are logging camps here, where the men cut down these big trees and saw them into different lengths, and oxen, some six or seven yoke, haul them to the streams, or else to the railroad. A railroad passes by our schoolhouse with logs, where it rolls them into the Columbia river, and then these logs are made into rafts, and towed by steamers up or down the river to mills, where they are sawed into lumber, and ships carry it to every part of the world.

There are a great many salmon in the Columbia river, and, in the early spring and summer, men go out in boats, two men to each boat, with long nets six hundred and seven hundred yards long and thirty feet deep. They drift all night and take their fish in the morning to the canning houses, where they are cut up and put in cans, cooked, and then labeled and sent to all parts of the world. Some of these salmon weigh forty and fifty pounds.

In the fall we can see the ships go right below our house, up to Portland, empty, and go back down the river loaded with wheat, which comes from Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory, and which goes mostly to Europe, where there are many people and bread is hard to get.

The largest city in the world is London; the largest in the United States are New York, Boston, Chicago, New Orleans, and San Francisco. In Chicago they pack large quantities of beef and pork and send it to all parts of the world.

In the Southern states there are great quantities of sugar, cotton, tobacco, and rice; the Middle states produce plenty of fine fruit, grain, and vegetables. The climate of the northern part of the United States is cold, temperate in the center, and hot in the South. Europe produces large quantities of fruit, wool, wine, and grain. There are many beautiful rivers, mountains, and lakes in the world. The largest river is the Amazon, and the largest in the United States is the Mississippi.

This is all I know of this world as yet; but I hope, by reading The Truth Seeker, and especially the Children's Corner, I may grow wiser as I grow older. And, in conclusion, I think this world is just as we make it ourselvs. If we be kind and peaceable to others we will get kindness in return. I am your little friend, Lizzie Lawson.

[Lizzie's letter did not come to hand until after we had selected the little essay for the toy prize. We thank her for the interesting sketch of the place where she livs, and shall be pleased to hear from her any time. Perhaps some girl or boy in the East will tell us now about our manufactures and industries, which will interest our Western friends. We are truly proud of the intelligence and capacity of our children in the Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Uncle Bill on the Preachers.

They tell me this, and they tell me that,
And they tell me everything,
The road forks here, and the road forks there,
And the road goes round in a ring.
They giv me wheat, and they giv me chaff,
And call it the bread of life,
They claim religion is pleasure and peace,
They claim it is penance and strife.

They reason from love that God is good,
From hate—and they make him bad;
They preach: "His mercy for ever endures"—
They preach that he will get mad;
They figure and twist and make him one,
They twist him again—he is three;
They split his kingdom in two, and yield
The devil the earth and sea.

They muddle my brain with doubt and dirt
And talk of his marvelous light—
They say I am blind when I cannot see
A dawn through eternity's night;
They stand me up in a row and draw
A crooked line in the dark,
And tell me to toe the scratch, and say
I'm damned if I straddle the mark.

They prove the Bible is true, and prove
It teaches an endless hell;
They prove it is truer than that, and prove
That all shall at last be well.
They say that it says what it does not say,
And what it does say—deny,
And, say what you will, if you say they are wrong,
They say what you say is a lie.

There's Elder Brown of the Baptist church,
He argues it plain and square
That ducking a man is saving a man
And no other method is fair;
But the Presbyterian parson, White,
He argues it square and plain
That spraying a man is saving a man
And all other methods are vain.

While Rev. Green, the Methodist man,
Declares, with a two-sided wink:
The odds doesn't matter a single drop,
But just as you happen to think;
And Quaker Smith has a broad-rimmed view,
And says, with a "thee" and "thou,"
That water baptism don't wash with him
(His claim I'm inclined to allow).

But how in the devil, or how in the Lord,
Such mysteries may abound,
And celestially be all the truer because
They are not terrestially sound,
Is more than my noddle can manage, and so
I say to the preachers: Go on!
What God wants of me he can tell it to me
As well as he could to St. John;
And I say to the Lord, and believe if the Lord
Has got any sense he can see,
He needn't to send any drummers around
When he has any business with me.

FRANK FELT.

Jesus and the Jews.

She was a charming young widow of the Catholic persuasion. The subject of conversation was the rejection by a young lady, a devout member of Mother Shurch, her affianced, a gentleman of Jewish descent, well cultured and of unblemished character, whom she fondly loved. After a long courtship and an exchange of plighted vows, sealed by many tokens of genuin affection, by persuasion of parents, mother superior, and other devotees of the "true faith," reluctantly, tearfully, she told him she couldn't marry one of Hebrew extraction. No, not even if he should consent to kneel at the same altar with her.

I expressed my regret that hearts cemented by the holiest ties should thus be ruthlessly torn asunder, and that the poor girl should sacrifice her happiness at the dictation of those who regarded the most sacred affections of the soul as secondary to religious prejudice.

"Indeed," said the young widow, "I think she did perfectly right. Nothing could induce me to marry a hook-nosed Jew. I despise the race."

"Now, Mrs. J.," said I, "listen. Young widows, having tasted the charms of married life, are not usually indisposed to matrimony. Suppose you should meet a man, brilliant in intellect, pure in morals, possessed of every element of manly beauty, and, withal, blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, would you reject his suit simply because he was a Jew?"

"Yes," she returned. "I wouldn't marry him if he was the last man on earth."

"This strikes me as marvelous," said I. "You would refuse a Jew under such circumstances, and yet you and your church worship a Jew as God. Do you not suppose your savior loves his own people?"

"Oh," she replied, "the blessed master doesn't love 'em any more." B. W. L.

Obituary.

From the Tribune.

Henry Willis, of ship canal fame, died at the residence of his grandson, Milton Willis, December 20th, aged 85. He retained his mental vigor and faculties until the last. In August, while in Washington, he was taken sick with a congestiv chill, and never fully recovered from the attack. The immediate cause of death was cancer of the stomach.

Mr. Willis was born in Philahelphia, his father being English and his mother Welsh. The former died when he was two years old, the latter when he was seven. He spent his boyhood days in working at shoemaking on a farm. He then began work on the old Pennsylvania Central railroad, built in 1827–34. In 1835 he was appointed superintendent of the old Portage railroad which crossed the Alleghany mountains. In 1837 he came to Detroit and superintended work on the Michigan Central. The next year he took charge of the work of building a railroad from Kalamazoo to Allegan. In 1840 he settled in Battle Creek when there were not sixty people there, and has ever since lived there, engaged in many enterprises designed to develop the county. He helped to organize the National Republican party with Thaddeus Stevens in 1834, was an activ Abolitionist and supporter of the underground railroad, and a Republican from the birth of the party. He was also a strong temperance man, never having used liquor or tobacco. In religious faith he was a Spiritualist. He married twice and leaves five children. He was a man of immense energy and perseverance, and had achieved almost a national reputation by his pushing of the project of a ship canal across the lower part of Michigan, from lake to lake. He also traveled extensivly throughout the country.

Mr. Willis was for some time previous to his death a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Book Notice.

"MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS."

This is the title of a very radical book by Helen H. Gardener, with introduction by Robert G. Ingersoll, which has been sent to this office with a request for a review. The book is a striking illustration of the way independent women are upsetting things in these latter days, and by their logic tearing to pieces the wisdom of their elders, and by their ready wit exposing the weak sophistry of time-honored customs, that, coming down to us through the misty vistas of the musty past, had been supposed to be infallible till the so-called illogical sex got ready to investigate them. This spirit of research may well alarm the elders, chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees of the present day, who hav foolishly preserved the records of their theocratic dynasty, and with strange blindness permitted women to learn to read for themselvs.

"Men, Women, and Gods" is a handsome duodecimo volume of 175 pages, including appendix, and is devoted to three vivacious, scathing, and witty lectures, excoriating the blind belief and unthinking credulity of the devoutly orthodox Christian women of the age, who hav no more idea of the real intent of the Bible history they worship than the benighted heathen they work for in the missionary societies hav of the internal mechanism of the mcon. The volume can scarcely be called attacks upon religion or religious sentiment, since there is a divine breath of charity toward humanity permeating its pages. The author's leading opinion seems to be that women should take no stock in religion or science at second hand, but should industriously investigate everything pertaining to themselvs from a stand-point of their own judgment. The book, which has already run through five editions, is embellished with a fine portrait of its author.—New Northwest.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW. AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

MAYOR HEWITT went into office last Saturday.

PARSON MESSAROS, of Philadelphia, has been found not guilty of the charge of criminal assault.

THERE was a great fire on the 31st ult. in the People's park, Madras, India, where the annua fair was being held. It is reported that three hundred lives were lost.

ONE hundred and forty open bars are reported from the prohibition city of Bangor, Me. If the count is correct, Bangor has as many bars, according to its population, as New York.

ON January 1st the proprietors of the Boston Herald announced to their employees a proposition to giv to them during the current year a proportion of the net profits of the business after reserving the interest on the value of the property. The employees are to share in proportion to the wages received during the year.

A FUND is now being raised for the widow of John A. Logan.

THE Law and Order Society of Pittsburgh, Pa., began a war on the Sabbath-breakers last Sunday, and as a result all of the cigar stores, confectioneries, and a large number of saloons were closed. The cigar dealers threaten to retaliate by stopping the street cars and closing up all kinds of business next Sunday.

THE New York Herald's dispatches report that the Socialistic element has triumphed in the Chicago trades assembly. A Socialist named Kleiver, nominated by George Schilling, has been elected president, and F. W. Long, a member of Parsons's assembly of the Knights of Labor, defeated a conservativ candidate for secretary.

UNDER the heading of "A Clergyman's Victim," the news comes from Chicago that Miss Fannie Matthews, who eloped with the Rev. C. B. Seals, of East Lynn, Ill., has been placed in her mother's care by the Pinkerton detectiv agency. Seals, who was fifty years old, had a wife and family, and was highly esteemed as a pastor. He engaged Miss Matthews as an amanuensis, and then eloped with her.

THE Rhode Island Supreme Court has found the Rev. Mr. Goodell guilty in two cases. Deacon Foster gets a divorce, but Mrs. Goodell is denied one on account of her own improprietics. Thus after having shown each other to be without honor or virtue, Mr. and Mrs. Goodell must still acknowledge each other as husband and wife. There is, however, some consolation left this wicked minister. The committee of the Methodist church, after spending two days investigating the charges, has unanimously acquitted him.

WHILE worshipers were going in and out of St. James's Catholic church in this city, last Sunday, a feeble old woman came along, and sat down upon the steps. The weather was the coldest of the season; she wore slippers instead of shoes, and her clothes were of the thinnest material. She laid a bundle beside her, and leaned her face in her hands. It seems that no one paid her the slightest attention, until, after a few minutes, she fell over to one side—dead. Then the sexton came out and raised her up, and she was carried to the station-house, and thence to the morgue. On the third finger of her left hand was a marriage-ring, but no one knew who she was.

A SLIGHT DISAGREEMENT.

And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth.—Gen. ix, ii.

Gems of Thought.

IF through the weakness of human nature you should sometimes deviate from the strait path of rectitude and propriety, play not the false part to deny your mistake, but frankly admit that you were weak, for the moment, and resolve that the fault shall not be repeated.—D. M. Bennett.

DON'T be satisfied with telling the young student that a magnet attracts iron. Let him see that it does, let him feel the pull of the one upon the other for himself. And especially tell him that it is his duty to doubt until he is compelled by the absolute authority of nature to believe that which is written in books. Pursue this disciplin carefully and conscientiously, and you may make sure that, however scanty may be the measure of information which you hav poured into the boy's mind, you hav created an intellectual habit of priceless value in practical life.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

CHRISTIANITY not being a revelation but a conception, the gospels not being either inspired or accurate, but fallible and imperfect human records, the practical conclusion from such premises must be obvious to all. Every doctrin and every proposition which the scriptures contain, whether or not we believe it to hav come to us, unmutilated and unmarred from the mouth of Christ, is open, and must be subjected, to the scrutiny of reason. Some tenets we shall at once accept as the most perfect truth that can be received by the human intellect and heart; others we shall reject as contradicting our instincts, and offending our understandings; others, again, of a more mixed nature we must analyze, that we may extricate the seed of truth from the trash of error, and elicit to use Fichte's words, "the divine idea that lies at the bottom of appearance."—Greg's Creed of Christendom

FOR weariness comes of having
When happiness means pursuit,
And love grows dwarfish and stunted,
And bears but little fruit,
When the serpent of self forever
Is coiling about its root,

So lips which hav met in kisses
Grow chary of tender speech—
So hearts which are bound together
Grow burdensome each to each,
Since the only things men value
Are those which they cannot reach.

—Anon.

ONE man prays thus: How shall I be able to lie with that woman? Do thou pray thus: How shall I not desire to lie with her? Another prays thus: How shall I be released from this? Another prays: How shall I desire not to be released? Another thus: How shall I not lose my little son? Then thus: How shall I not be afraid to lose him? —M. A. Antoninus.

WHAT DOES IT MATTER?

Wealth, and glory, and place, and power,
What are they worth to me or you?
For the lease of life runs out in an hour,
And death stands ready to claim his due;
Sounding honors or heaps of gold,
What are they all when all is told?

A pain or a pleasure, a smile or a tear—
What does it matter which we claim?
For we step from the cradle into the bier,
And a careless world goes on the same.
Hours of gladness or hours of sorrow,
What does it matter to us to-morrow?

Truth of love or vow of friend,
Tender caresses or cruel sneers,
What do they matter to us in the end?
For the brief day dies and the long night nears.
Passionate kisses, or tears of gall,
The grave will open and cover them all.

Homeless vagrant, or honored guest,
Poor and humble, or rich and great—
All are racked with the world's unrest,
All must meet with the common fate.
Life from childhood till we are old,
What is all when all is told?

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

CONSIDER that thou doest many things wrong, and that thou art a man like others, and even if thou dost abstain from certain faults, still thou hast the disposition to commit them, though either through cowardice or concern about reputation, or some such mean motiv, thou dost abstain from from such faults.—Epictetus.

Is there anything which is more certain to sap the foundations of morality than the public maintenance of a creed which has long ceased to command the assent and even the respect of its recognized defenders?—Farrar's Seekers After God.

OUR evidence that any particular writing is from God can never be stronger than the evidence of reason for or against the matter contained in it. —Dr. Hodge.

LIFE would not go down, if it were not admitted that impulses must be controled, and that reason ought to govern our actions.—J. S. Mill.

Odds and Ends.

"WHAT is education?" asks a writer. Well, it is something a college graduate thinks he has until he becomes a newspaper man.

MANY a young man who has been too bashful to propose to a girl has had her father come into the parlor at eleven o'clock and help him out.

THE man who invented the English language must hav been a humorous sort of chap. Otherwise he would never hav called servants "help."

SOLOMON had seven hundred wives, and he was considered the wisest man of his time. In these degenerate days Solomon's wisdom would hav been questioned.

PROFESSOR ZWEIBEER is a very absent-minded man. He was busily engaged in solving some scientific problem. The servant hastily opened the door of his studio and announced a great family event: "A little stranger has arrived." "Eh?" "It is a little boy." "Little boy? Well, ask him what he wants."

A NOVELIST makes his heroin throw $100,000 of her own money into the sea so as to relieve her lover of the suspicion of being mercenary. She should hav given the money to her lover to start a paper intended to fill a long-felt want. She would hav lost it just the same, and it would hav been a little more natural.

BRUTE force again. Edith: "I was so shocked last night. I don't believe I will see George if he calls this evening." Maud: "What did he do?" "Why, last evening he suddenly took hold of me, twisted me around into his arms, and forcibly kissed me a dozen times. I don't believe your little Willie ever insults you that way, does he?" "No, he's a regular gump."

NOBODY outside of the profession has any idea how difficult it is for an editor to satisfy his patrons. For instance: A Western paper announced as follows: "Mr. Maguire will wash himself before he assumes the office of sheriff." This made Maguire mad, and he demanded a retraction, which the paper made thus: "Mr. Maguire requests us to deny that he will wash himself before he assumes the office of sheriff." Oddly enough this only enraged Maguire the more. Some people are so hard to please.

SHE and her brother, aged eight and ten, were attendants upon the Sunday-school of the orthodox church in the village in which they lived. The Universalists were endeavoring to establish a church there, and held Sunday services and Sabbath-school in the town hall. As the children were on their way to Sunday-school one day, the boy insisted upon leaving the beaten path and attending the lately organized school, greatly to his sister's indignation. In consequence of the young man's contumacy the affair reached the dimensions of a regular "scene" upon the public street, in which a sturdy boy was marching off toward the hall, with a little girl hanging to his jacket skirt, weeping in a heart-broken fashion. "What's the matter, sis?" asked a gentleman whom they met. "Has your brother been whipping you?" "No, sir; but he's real naughty." "What has he been doing?" "He's goin' to that new Sunday-school at the hall!" "I didn't know it was naughty to go there. What is the matter with the new school?" "Why, didn't you know? They havn't got any hell there."

Notes and Clippings.

ONE of the latest "missionary books" to circulate in China is a Chinese version of the "Pilgrim's Progress." The little volume is illustrated with pictures drawn and engraved by Chinese artists. In these Christian appears in Chinese costume, and throughout the book all the scenes and incidents are depicted in a garb familiar to the people for whom the book is intended.

THE Rev. Henry W. George, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Topeka, Kan., one of the most prominent clergymen in the city and state, is in trouble on account of his fondness for books, which has led him to take a great many from a bookstore of that city without troubling himself to pay for them. There hav been rumors for several years of such proceedings on his part, and now it is said that Mr. George has been asked to resign, and that he has returned many of the books which he took. His friends claim that he is a kleptomaniac.

THE organs of the Vatican announce that the Holy Congregation will discuss at one of its next sittings the project of creating a number of new saints. Among those whose claims are being considered are Cardinal Fisher, Sir Thomas More, and other prominent Catholic martyrs of England under Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth. The Jesuit Father Berchmans is also to be promoted to a saintship. If there is anything that would tend to ameliorate the sin and suffering of this sad world, it is undoubtedly the creation of a few more Catholic mummies into saints. Let the great work proceed!

THE San Francisco Methodist clergymen hav been discussing the question, Who was Cain's wife? The matter should be easily set at rest. As the Adam and Eve family was the only one in existence during the Cain era, and as he belonged to that family, his wife would of necessity hav been his sister. It is not a pleasing thought, but the clergymen generally seem to prefer it to the scientific theory of descent.

THERE was a missionary concert at a Rockland church the other evening, says the Rockland, Me., Courier-Gazette, and among other things was a long paper on missionary work read by a young lady. When she had finished, the leader of the meeting said, "We will now sing, 'Hallelujah, 'tis done,'" whereat everybody smiled.

THE recent death of Dr. Archibald A. Hodge recalls this anecdote illustrating his methods in the class rooms: Once while he was a professor in the theological seminary he asked a student for a definition of eternity. The student need not hav been ashamed to confess his inability to answer that question, but, after some hesitation, he replied that he used to know the definition, but had forgotten it. "Oh, my, my, my!" exclaimed Dr. Hodge, bringing his hand down forcibly upon the table. "What a calamity! The only man in the universe that ever knew what eternity it has forgotten."

AN EARNEST CHRISTIAN.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY says: "Tolerably early in life I discovered that one of the unpardonable sins, in the eyes of most poeple, is for a man to presume to go about unlabeled. The world regards such a person as the police do an unmuzzled dog, not under proper control. I could find no label that would suit me, so, in my desire to range myself and be respectable, I invented one, and as the chief thing I was sure of was that I did not know a great many things that the —ists and the —ites about me professed to be familiar with, I called myself an Agnostic. Surely no denomination could be more modest or more appropriate, and I cannot imagin why I should be every now and then haled out of my refuge and declared sometimes to be a Materialist, sometimes an Atheist, sometimes a Positivist, and sometimes, alas and alack, a cowardly or reactionary Obscurantist."

A SAOO, Me., paper is "proud to state that since the liquor agency was established in Biddeford not a single drop has been sold for other than medicinal or mechanical purposes," and adds: "While we deplore the large amount of sickness, we are glad to see the boom in the noble art of mechanics."

AN effort is being made by the Christian priests in Sydney, Australia, to put down all Sunday concerts and Freethought Sunday lectures by law, and they ask the government to make a law for this purpose, if there is not in existence one ready to hand. The Sydney Daily Telegraph ranges itself against persecution of this kind. It says: "Here, then, is a clear issue submitted to the judgment of the public at large. Shall Sunday Freethought lectures and Secular lectures be put down by criminal prosecution? The gospel has invoked the law. We cannot help feeling that a claim like this is utterly out of accord with the inborn British love of liberty and the higher civilization of the century. We are certain that it will jar upon the sense of moral and intellectual freedom in the majority of our readers. It is suggestiv of tyranny and smacks of persecution. There is no such thing possible to human nature as compulsory conversion to this or that form of religion."

A WELL at Yakutsk, in Siberia, has been a standing puzzle to scientists for many years. It was begun in 1828, but given up at thirty feet because it was still in frozen earth. Then the Russian Academy of Sciences continued for some months the work of deepening the well, but stopped when it had reached to the extent of some three hundred and eighty-two feet, when the ground was still frozen as hard as a rock. In 1844 the Academy had the temperature of the excavation carefully taken at various depths, and from the data thus obtained the ground was estimated to be frozen to the depth of six hundred and twelve feet. As external cold could not freeze the earth to such a depth, even in Siberia, geologists hav concluded that the well has penetrated a frozen formation of the glacial period which has never thawed out.

MICHAEL GILROY, of Scranton, Pa.; aged 65 years, died suddenly at St. Peter's Cathedral while the service was in progress. He had knelt down in his pew to pray, when it was noticed that he suddenly moved forward. Those around him supposed he had fallen asleep, and no attention was paid to him until the service was concluded, when an effort was made to arouse him and he was found to be dead.

Christian Absurdities.

No doubt many Christians will be shocked at the title of this article. For the Christian will claim that Christianity has no absurdities.

In my day infant damnation has been preached, and only a short time ago the ministers left off preaching a burning hell. Fifty years ago every Christian believed the Mosaic account of creation, and all the Munchausenisms of the Bible. In short, every word and every line was the inspired word of God. To-day Talmage and Sam Jones are about the only ones outside of a lunatic asylum who entertain such belief. Three hundred years ago nearly every Christian believed in a flat earth. Fifty years ago the Bible was on the side of slavery. Within that time nearly every minister drank spirituous liquors, and quoted texts of scripture to sustain the practice.

Indeed, the Christian believed that each and every one of these now abandoned and absurd propositions had the broad foundation of the scriptures to rest upon. If these are not absurdities, why are they not believed and preached now? If these are absurdities, may it not be just possible that, all unknown to himself, the Christian may be the champion of other absurdities equally glaring? If so, can it be wicked to point them out?

We are the creatures of circumstances. We are affected by influences put in operation a thousand years ago. As one writer expressed it, "We are the result of all that has preceded us." We, in turn, are destined to influence those who may come after us many generations hence. How important, then, that we strive to eliminate truth from error, inaugurate the reign of reason, and make a lofty manhood our constant aim. For, according to the laws of heredity, the higher we mount in the scale of moral and intellectual excellence, the higher the plane on which our children will begin the career of life. Whoever points out an error should be regarded as a benefactor. Yet it is a sad fact that Christianity has proved itself to be the bitterest foe to those who hav been most activ in leading men out of the error of their ways.

For more than eighteen hundred years Christians hav turned a deaf ear to nearly every claim of humanity, under the false impression that everything must be done for the "glory of God." What is the condition of those nations which hav been Christianized, and where the experiment has been most thoroughly tried?

There is no Christian nation which has not been engaged, first or last, in blowing out the brains of some other Christian nation. The Christian nation of England made opium-eaters of the Chinese, and forced this loathsome habit upon an unwilling people at the point of the bayonet. This Christian nation has reduced the people of India to a state of servitude which would disgrace a heathen ruler. A long time we were fairly holding our breath, expecting the British lion and the Russian bear (both Christian pets) to close in a deadly encounter, and that rivers of Christian blood would flow. The British lion has been tugging away at the vitals of Egypt, just to let her know that the "Prince of Peace" still reigns throughout the British possessions. In Ireland, one Christian tears down the shanty over another Christian's head, just to remind him that Christ had not "where to lay his head," and that he is no better than the meek and lowly savior.

Bonaparte said that God always favored the big guns and heavy battalions. In every Christian country God has favored the rich, the high-born, and powerful, and suffered the poor and the helpless to be trampled into the dust.

Go into any Christian city where the greatest number of church spires can be counted, and there you will find the greatest amount of poverty and misery, and the most degrading ignorance.

Brothels under the very shadow of church steeples; grog-shops within sound of the church organ; gambling dens as plenty as mushrooms after a shower, and gambling, robberies, and murders are the order of the day. Defaulters, bank-swindlers and confidence-men seem to be running neck and neck with Sabbath-school teachers and members of the Young Men's Christian Association.

Rome is one of the most Christian cities in the world; and yet, for perfidy, licentiousness, and pure cussedness, it has not a peer on the face of the globe. Nothing is more common than to hear Christians prating about the high standard of morality and civilization in Christian countries, as though these were the results of Christian teaching.

I maintain that we hav reached our moral standing and our high state of civilization through many tribulations, and in spite of the church or Christianity. The truth is, we hav made headway only as Christianity has been beaten back by the friends of human progress.

From a Hottentot to a Byron or a Webster, what a long, long journey! The difference in regard to mental capacity can scarcely be expressed. The difference in personal appearance is no greater than the difference in the structure of the brain. There is no process known to Christianity to make these brains similar. It is the work of centuries, of influences, of teaching, of circumstances and environments. The "change of heart" which the Christian talks so much about will not reach the case.

Christianity never turned rascality into honesty, nor ignorance into intelligence. In the earthquake district to-day may be seen the workings of religion. Acres are covered with prostrate human beings. Their screeching and wailing can be heard incessantly. The places of worship are not closed. It is one continued camp-meeting. The same scenes are enacted many times on board of a vessel in time of a storm. At such times they call on a God for assistance who never puts in an appearance when most needed. They confess acts which they never ought to hav been guilty of. They make pledges which they never fulfil. They promis things which they never perform. When the danger is past and the scare is over, they are not one whit better than they were before. Men and women are not made better by being scared, no matter whether the scare comes from a storm, or an earthquake, or a fiery hell. Sober thought, careful study, and close investigation, and not big scares, hav elevated the race. Christianity has rendered no service to mankind, but it has deceived them and made them dishonest.

A Catholic who worked for me said one day, "Well, Miesthur Pake, I have been radin' your bucks and papurs, and it all looks rasonable, and if it was not for the fear and dread of hell I wad belave it." Now, Christianity made him dishonest with his God, himself, and everybody else. For if "it all looked rasonable," he could not help but believe it, and he lied every time he denied his honest convictions.

At a temperance meeting the ministers were talking about the best method for advancing the cause. One minister said he believed in prayer—"if we would advance the temperance cause we must all pray. God would answer prayer." He said he knew it. The next Saturday night his horse got into the grain, and filled himself. On Sunday morning he took the horse to a neighbor, and wanted to know what he must do. The man told him he had better pray, but he had not the least bit of faith in prayer as a horse medicin. Christianity had deceived him, and made him say he believed what he did not believe.

Colonel Ingersoll's story of the man who stole the bread and meat illustrates a point. "What did you do with the bread and meat?" "I ate the bread and threw the meat away; it was Friday." To eat meat on Friday was a greater crime than stealing.

Nothing is more common than to hear ministers say that all great and good men are Christians. Has Christianity ever produced greater orators than Demosthenes and Cicero, or a greater philosopher than Plato, a greater mathematician than Euclid, or a man of higher moral standing than Socrates? Yet these were all heathen. What better evidence is needed to show that great and good men can be produced outside of Christianity? The study of the sciences, especially astronomy and mathematics, has done more to elevate the race than Christianity. Christianity binds and dulls the human intellect, while the study of the sciences makes the most exact and accurate reasoners, and "reason makes the full man." As Webster expressed it, "mind is the great lever of all things."

Christianity has not only made men dishonest with themselvs and others, but it has turned them into tyrants. Father Lambert says in regard to Colonel Ingersoll, "All this time he has delighted in tearing and wounding and lacerating the hearts and faith and feelings of those by whose tolerance he is permitted to outrage the common sense and sentiment of Christendom." Nobody knows better than Colonel Ingersoll how Father Lambert plays the liar when he pretends that it is by the "tolerance" of Christians that he and other Freethinkers are allowed to express their opinions. And the disposition which he manifests toward Colonel Ingersoll is ample proof that he has all the elements of a tyrant. The decrees of Christian emperors, the persecutions and imprisonments, and the tortures of the inquisition furnish the most undoubted proof that the Christian taint has had a tendency to produce tyrants all through the Christian ages.

The fair import of Father Lambert's language is that Freethinkers are only allowed to speak and write through the tolerance of Christians, and that the Freethinkers hav no rights which Christians are bound to respect. In other words, that every priest and minister has the right to berate a Freethinker as much and as long as he pleases, and then to stop his mouth if he attempts to reply.

What Father Lambert says as an individual is not a matter of so much consequence. But the fact that he is backed by all the churches, and by all the priests and ministers, shows that free speech (notwithstanding the guarantees of the Constitution) is a matter still to be fought for in this country.

I will not say, like Foster, that "every church is a den of thieves," but I do say that in their corporate capacity the churches do lie and play the hypocrit and tyrant. A presiding elder at the dedication of one of our churches said that Infidelity had never done anything that the world was proud of; that Christianity had produced every truly great man, and that we are indebted to the churches for every reform. The churches are so much given to lying and hypocrisy that they frequently deceive, and tell a half-dozen lies during the life of one generation.

Keeping in mind these high-sounding claims of the churches, let us hear what Mrs. Lucy N. Colman has to say in regard to the position of the churches only thirty or forty years ago. She was an Anti-slavery lecturer—

"All the churches were closed against us. The ministers often led the mobs who assailed and insulted us. I hav been mobbed several times, and in more than one instance the mob was led by a minister, and the persons composing the mobs were eminently Christian."

It is only a little while since the churches stopped teaching the doctrin of endless punishment, and many can remember when nearly all the churches indorsed the doctrin of infant damnation. Thousands like Mrs. Colman, hav lived to see the churches turn all these somersaults.

In our village to-day the churches hold what they call a temperance union meeting, and the ministers will throw froth all over their white jackets in denouncing the rum traffic.

In almost every town old men can be found who hav set out the bottle to ministers and drank with them. Many a time when I was a boy I hav heard ministers quote scripture to prove that God was not on the side of the "Cold Water Party," as the temperance party was then called.

"Be temperate in all things," I used to hear them shout; which, being interpreted, meant that one must not take big drinks if he drank often, and that ministers must be tolerably sober when they delivered their sermons.

To-day the church claims all the glory of the temperance and antislavery reforms—such has ever been the hypocritical pretensions of the church. It has opposed every reform until it has seen that it would be crowned with success; then it has thrown the whole weight of its influence in favor of the reform, and then claimed all the glory.

The claim so frequently put up by Christians that the church is at the head of every humanitarian movement is founded more in hypocrisy than in truth. Nearly every step in the useful arts and in the sciences has met with opposition from the church.

It was but as yesterday that nearly all Christians were laughing at the theory of evolution, and calling Darwin the descendant of a monkey. Nearly all men regarded as scientists hav indorsed evolution. When the theory comes to be adopted by the masses, as it certainly will be, the church will make the discovery that it is in perfect harmony with holy writ, and will claim that the discovery was made by some monk or priest or pious minister, and that Darwin stole it from him. And this may be taken as a specimen of all the scientific discoveries which the church has ever made. She has reduced lying to a fine art, and false pretenses and the most brazen hypocrisy will be made to serve her turn as long as dupes can be kept in ignorance of the truth.

From the beginning of the fourth century to the end of the fourteenth century Christianity had everything its own way. By bolts and bars, by excommunications and tortures, it silenced every voice raised against it. That thousand years was an age of superstition and mental darkness such as the world had not seen for a thousand years before. Through the ignorance and degradation of that thousand years we cast our vision backward, like looking through a desert, to the painters and poets, the sculptors and orators of pagan Greece and Rome. The fertil field of paganism contrasts in a telling manner with the desert of Christianity.

For this ignorance and superstitition the historian holds the church responsible. The power of the church was supreme. It commanded the purse and the sword in every Christian country. It built some of the most splendid churches and cathedrals the world ever saw. Could it not hav endowed institutions of learning as well? Be it remembered, the church has always known that "ignorance is the mother of devotion." The Christian will claim that he is just as much in favor of good schools as the Freethinker. Just so! But to run a school to suit a Christian there must be scriptural reading, prayer, and a hymn sung every morning, and the old hag of superstition must be installed as teacher. Then every scholar must be impressed with the idea that the Bible is the word of God. Then how will the story of the three Hebrew children, and that of Jonah, and the feats of Samson, and the astronomical legerdemain of old Joshua, and the Mosaic account of creation, he made to tally with science? Science will be made to tally with this worse than heathenish nonsense. Run the schools to suit the average Christian and we should soon be enshrouded in the ignorance and superstition of the Dark Ages.

Everything withers which Christianity touches.

Taking no thought of to-morrow; selling everything one has and giving to the poor; giving a thief your coat after he has stolen your cloak; turning the other cheek after one has been battered by the slugger; hating your friends and relatiws; using a sword instead of making peace, is pure Christianity. And Christianity unadulterated and unmolested will drag its votaries down to barbarism.

Man is by nature a progressiv being. Every system of religion which does not recognize this fact will hav no other effect than to load him with dead weight. There must be a never-ending conflict between the spirit of progress and any system of religion founded on so-called divine revelation. All such systems of religion, in the very nature of things, must be stationary, and therefore can operate only as fetters on progressiv beings. Christianity has been tried and found wanting. It has been in the crucible for eighteen hundred years, and has proved to be mostly dross.

The poor regard the lofty temples dedicated to the meek and lowly Jesus as monuments of hypocrisy. Into them they are never invited, nor would they be welcome if they should come. They are built for the rich. These gorgeous temples are found in every city, where the worshipers follow the example of the meek and lowly by despising the poor. Poor fishermen like those who followed Christ would be kicked out without ceremony. Even Christ himself, if he should appear, meek and lowly and riding on an ass, would not be allowed to enter one of these fashionable churches. Talmage would not go near enough to him to spit on him. And if his photograph should be found in an art gallery, "Mad Anthony" would order it taken down.

The prayers of such men could not be put on the market for a cent on the dollar, and they avail just as much on earth as they do in heaven. It is a wonder that Garfield did not liv forever when all the Christian scullions were praying for him. The whole system is a sham, and the people are outgrowing it as a robust youth outgrows "Mother Goose's Melodies." Hell is played out, and the devil has retired from activ service.

We hav in this country about eighty thousand men—good, bad, and indifferent—known as priests and ministers—I call them Christian brokers. Ask any Christian what service these eighty thousand men render to the country, and the answer is, "Oh, they explain the word of God!" Didn't God know enough to write so as to be understood without eighty thousand men to help him out with his meaning? Moreover, this word of God expressly states that "it is so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein."

Marched in single file, the eighty thousand priests and ministers would form a line more than forty miles in length. They add little or nothing to the productiv industry of the country, and doubtless it takes the labor of a million of men besides to run the Christian racket in this country. Oh, how I do wish that I could induce my countrymen to fairly figure up the output of this great outlay. If these eighty thousand pulpit pounders were divided into two gangs, and one gang should dig holes in the ground and the other gang should fill them up again, the country would be just as well off, and then perhaps the people could see how little is accomplished by the expenditures. If the people in every village and hamlet, where there is a church, would just figure out the outlay of running it each year, and then calmly consider how little the people hav to show for the money expended, they would say in a quiet way, "What fools we mortals be!"

I am aware that the average Christian will say that I am lacking in reverence for the ministry, and for what he deems sacred things; but I hav no desire to wound his feelings. At the same time, I must speak the truth as I understand it. I believe rum-selling to be a bad business, and I must not refrain from saying so because, forsooth, I may injure the feelings of the rum-seller. I denounce gambling because it is too much like stealing. If the gambler does not like the way I classify his business, let him stand from under. I denounce the rum-seller, the gambler, the horse-racer, the prize-fighter, in short, any kind of business which absorbs the sweat and the toil of the people and givs them nothing in return.

These priests and ministers are quartered on the people like so many leeches, and absorb a great pro portion of what they produce; and all they get back is claims on the promised land and an interest in the prayers of these gospel bummers, which would not affect a shadow. If the gambler does no good, and is a positiv injury to society, kick him out. If the rum-seller is an unmitigated curse, why should he be tolerated? Away with all these leeches! Why should priests and ministers hav exemption from their fair turn at the oar, and still suck up the substance of society?

Why should ministers and church property hav exemption from taxation more than other men and other property? As obtuse as the Christian is, he would feel the outrage if he were compelled to pay taxes on Infidel property.

I am unable to see why I should be compelled to pay taxes on church property more than on a race-course. I am no more more interested in the one than the other. I think both are pernicious in their effects and influences. Why should the people at large be made to pay for prayers in the legislativ bodies, in the army and navy, and in prisons? Is this government a church institution, or is it a government of the people? As the parrot said to the monkey, there would be "a hell of a time" in the Christian camp if they were compelled to pay for Infidel lectures.

Where do the president and the governors get the constitutional authority to set apart a day of thanks giving and prayer? Is it any part of their civil duty? Is it not a matter of the church and not of the state? By what authority am I compelled to observe and keep holy one day in the week? What business of the state whether I work six days and keep one, or keep six days and work one, or none at all? Why should the motto, "In God we trust," be put upon the coin of the country? Who is empowered to say for me that I put my trust in God? Is this coin exclusivly for the use of Christians? Hav I no rights under the Constitution which the Christian is bound to respect? When the Constitution was established, did the fiat come from the church or from the people?

If a man be a good citizen, what right has the state to inquire whether he is a Christian, Infidel, Mohammedan, or Jew—whether he believes in one god or twenty, or no god at all? If a citizen is called as a witness, what right has the state to inquire into his theological views? If a man see another commit theft or murder, the Christian infers that it is better for the thief or the murderer to escape justice than to allow a man to testify who is not sound on the "goose question." In some states, if a thief is a Christian, his oath would be allowed, while an honest Agnostic would not be allowed to testify—not to bring a thief to justice—not even the murderer of his wife or child.

When we formed this government, did we not hav it written down in the Constitution that Congress should pass no law to establish any system of religion, nor to prohibit the free exercise thereof? Can not anyone see that each one of the cases cited is mere church usurpation—that the church and the state hav never been entirely separated?

Still Christians are constantly talking about "God in the Constitution," Christ the "supreme ruler," and the "Bible as the foundation of all law." Instead of granting more power to the church, the people should take away from her every power which she has usurped. All the fangs of the old ecclesiastical reptil hav never been extracted—the coils of the slimy old serpent are still to be dreaded. I once heard of a boy who had a pet hen, and in due time she became impressed with the scriptural command to "increase and multiply." The day the boy arranged the nest to set the old hen, some of the older brothers found an owl's nest. They took two eggs from under the hen on the sly, and put under two owl's eggs instead. One day the boy went to look after the old hen, and he saw the head of a young owl protruding from one of the eggs. For a moment he stared with mute astonishment at the hooked beak and big eyes of the owl, and then, with hat in hand and eyes a-glare, and hair standing erect, he ran to the house and said, "Father, you just wait a day or two, and if them chickens come out with bodies pro portioned to their heads, I'll show you some of the cussedest chickens ever hatched out in America." Now, if the American people do not want to hatch owls instead of chickens, let them count the cost before they vote God into the Constitution, thereby putting more power into the hands of the church. Power in the church means chains for the people. The darkest day in the history of Europe was when Christianity bore rule without restraint.

I would like to ask if the ignorance, the poverty, the misrule, the worse than heathenish darkness of Christian Europe for more than a thousand years, secured the eternal happiness of a single soul. Will anyone pretend that good conditions, enlightenment, and happy surroundings here will cut off all hope of happiness hereafter? Does the happiness of God's children in this world so inflame his wrath that he will punish them forever in a world to come? Such has been the teaching of the church.

No matter about being happy in this life, no matter what we suffer or endure here, if we can only walk the streets of the New Jerusalem. "This world is but as dross and filthy rags; this world is but a wilderness, this world is not my home," has ever been the song of the church, and has caused more ignorance and suffering than all other causes combined. It draped all Europe in mourning for more than a thousand years.

This world is our home. Here we are born, here we must liv. We can neither sow nor reap in the skies. From the earth every blessing must come, and it behooves us to make it yield all the blessings possible. Let us hav good homes, good clothing, a good supply of healthy food, hours for sleep and recreation, and let us strive to make it possible for even the poorest to enjoy these blessings. No human being should be considered so low as not to be entitled to the consideration and help of the highest. Acts of kindness from each must ultimately result in happiness to all.

A Reminiscence of Nearly Sixty Years Ago.

In the little town in western Massachusetts where I then lived, the minister of the only church in the place (Presbyterian) was an arrogant, tyrannical man, settled for life, with a salary of six hundred dollars a year, having, in addition, a fine farm, which he married with his wife soon after his settlement.

This man acted as though "he was monarch of all he surveyed"—he took control of the schools, suggested the disciplin, ordered the recitation once a week, by all the pupils, of the Westminster Catechism; appointed church meetings, in which he told the brethren which one of the political candidates they were to vote for—in short, in all matters of any interest he was both judge and jury.

When the Methodists made their entrance into the place, this dictator said they were not to be tolerated. Keep away from them, was the command; but then, as now, there were some people who objected to arbitrary rule; they broke over the command, went to hear these enthusiastic, earnest men, and brought away such glowing descriptions of the exercises that others ventured to disobey the edict; and at last a society was formed, and a demand made for the use of the meeting-house a portion of the time. At a town meeting called to decide the claims of this new society, it was unanimously voted to grant the use of the church (meeting-house, I should hav said; it was heretical in those days to talk of a building as a church) every fourth Sunday to the Methodists. The members signed off from the Presbyterians, and their minister-tax was henceforward to be paid to support this new sect. The fourth Sunday at length arrived. My father decided to go and hear the new speaker, taking his children with him. We arrived in good season, and, when the bell ceased tolling, the Presbyterian minister walked up one flight of stairs into the pulpit, the Methodist minister the other. The Methodist, as is their custom, proceeded to open the services by reading a hymn; the Presbyterian stepped in front of the one who had a clear right to be heard, raised his hands, and said, "Let us ask for the presence and blessing of God." Either his voice was so loud as to drown the reading of the hymn, or the brazen audacity of the act completely overcame the stranger minister, and he shut his book.

The congregation was in a wonder as to what further was to come. In a moment the silence was broken by the loud voice of a man known to all the town as an Infidel, but whose character was such that any office of trust to be given by the town was given to this man. He invited the new society to occupy his house, a large, commodious dwelling just opposit the holy edifice. The minister followed (let me write his name in full, as he never married, and no children hav brought his name down to this time)—Dennis Wood, and the congregation was soon reduced to small size, and the Presbyterian preached his sermon. I wish I could recall his subject.

What of the old society? From that day their prosperity ended—the congregation diminished, it was impossible to raise the salary required. The minister's farm was so badly managed that it yielded very little. A minister's family is generally a growing one, and this was no exception to the rule. The family became so poor that they were obliged to lose their home. A brother of the minister owned a home in a neighboring town, whither they removed, were supported by charity, and finally, in the last days of the husband and wife, by a young woman whom they took in her childhood to be a servant to their children, and treated so shabbily that members of their their own church sometimes prayed for her, hoping the Lord would do for her what they dare not do. Perhaps their prayers were heard. At any rate, this neglected orphan was a success. She removed to a flourishing city, did a prosperous business, and, when she knew of the needs of these, her old oppressors, went to them and cared for them till they died. One of the most bitter opposers of the Methodist church in that little town was a man, considered rich in those days of small fortune. He was superintendent of the Sunday-school, and in a general way officious. His eldest daughter had married a man who was afterward converted to the new sect. I think the father-in-law never forgave him for so great a crime, and made public announcement, when the new church was built, that, if he could see the steeple from his garret window, he would board it up. "See how these Christians love each other," was just as applicable sixty years ago as to day.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

A PASTOR in a state adjoining this, preaching from the text, "Beware of covetousness," said: "Last Sunday night the collection in this house amounted to $1.80, and the dollar was thrown in by a Baptist brother from Richmond, Va., who happened to be here and did not know any better. The other six hundred of you dropped in the eighty cents."—Richmond Religious Herald.

News and Notes.

Again the familiar rumble of the wheels and the snort of the engin, and the journey across the continent is begun—from the shining portals of the East to the Golden Gates of the West. Farewell, myriad-lighted city, the moonlight on the Hudson, the glancing bridge glittering like a fairy palace, and the torch of Liberty. Away through the blackening night to the misty morning. Away to the blue Potomac (blue with cold at present) and the "old Virginia soil." At about noon, amid a sweeping storm, I strike Harper's Ferry. Here is where I first buckled on the knapsack and, with a new pair of army shoes, tackled the Virginia mud. A hopeless task. I found it much easier to wrap my blanket about me and recline upon its downy bed—that is, away down almost to the bottomless pit. It seems a million years ago since I was in this valley. Perhaps it was—who knows? What is time anyway? It was in this valley that I was "converted," one rainy day when the mud was knee-deep, and the musket was like a cannon on my shoulders, and my liver was out of order—a propitious time for "regeneration" Anybody would be anxious for a "change of base" under such circumstances. It was a curious psychological experience. I don't quite understand it myself. I must leave it to the doctors, for, without doubt, it belongs to pathology. Neither Moody nor Sam Jones ever had a more thorough trial of the "new birth" than I did; I was just as much a "miracle of grace" as anybody.

I arrived at Martinsburg, W. Va., at 2 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, and the moment I greeted my good friends, Louis Wolfes, Sr., and Harmon H. Bohda, I felt at home. I knew they were of the right stuff, although I had never seen them before. They are subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, of course, we were comrades of long standing. I went first to the pleasant home of Mr. Wolfes, where I met his wife, a stanch Freethinker, so full of life that it is impossible for her to be anything but a heretic; also I met Louis Wolfes, Jr., and wife, who were just in the splendor of honeymoon, and I gave them all the Secular benedictions that belong to this world; and Charles H. Wolfes, the younger son, who, like his father, is a stalwart of Liberalism.

In the evening at Feller's Hall, whose proprietor, Mr. John Feller, and his wife are Liberals, I gave my lecture, "Universal Mental Liberty." The hall was filled, and the audience was of a miscellaneous character. There were some Christians present, and a portion of these took a somewhat noisy departure before the close of the lecture. Evidently they had heard something new. The majority of the audience received what I said with approval. It was the first Freethought lecture ever given in Martinsburg, and the next day there was an immense amount of discussion on the streets. It was the opinion of some that the Infidel should be driven out of town. He had no right to disturb the peace of orthodoxy.

After the lecture I had a bit of a sleighride in the moonlight to the house of Mr. Bohda, about a mile out. On the way we passed a party coasting down hill. For a moment New England flashed over my mind, and I thought I was on the glorious New Hampshire hills, dashing along the glittering road. How I wanted to jump on those flying sleds and be a boy again!

Mr. and Mrs. Bohda made my stay delightful in their hospitable home. I could not find a better place than Martinsburg for the beginning of my labors. All was cheer and comfort. On the second evening the hall was again filled, and on Friday evening I gave a parlor lecture at Mr. Bohda's, where agreeable sociability was mixed with the intellectual entertainment. Christians were present and received our declaration of views in a very generous manner. The work thus accomplished at Martinsburg has done great good. It has stirred the community wonderfully, and Freethought has received a splendid impulse.

Messrs. Wolfes and Bohda are the chief supporters of our cause in Martinsburg. They are both from the old country, of good German stock. Mr. Bohda came to Martinsburg in 1840, and Mr. Wolfes in 1853, and both hav been residents there ever since. They were Union men during the war, and passed through many incidents of that tremendous drama, many of whose great actions occurred in the imme diate vicinity of their home. They hav always been Freethinkers, and hav manfully expressed their views. They are well known in the community and occupy honorable positions. Among other influential and outspoken Liberals of the place are John Heller, Arthur Stevens, John Hutzler, John Pickens, Thomas Kratz, and Mrs. Catherine Brantner, with those already mentioned. There are many who hav taken no decided stand, but there is a large element in this place and vicinity of intelligence and power which is in favor of Freethought. The churches, however, still cast their overshadowing superstitions. The majority of the people are unprogressiv.

I hope to visit Martinsburg on my return-trip, and greet again these vigorous and noble comrades of Liberty who hav done so much to giv me pleasure and courage for my work. I am writing this on the express train, going forty miles an hour, and I hav no doubt the compositors will scold when they see my hieroglyphics made while the coach is shaking like a ship at sea. But I must take times as it flies, lightning-train and all. The day is lovely. We speed along the ice-bound river, amid the ever-varying mountain forms, with crests of blue and mantles of sparkling snow, beneath an almost cloudless sky, intensely radiant. I am hurrying on to greet our Pittsburgh friends, that Roman company who keep our eagle standard ever at the front. I shall lecture at Pittsburgh to-morrow, Sunday; at Kent, O., Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday; at Alliance, Thursday; at Akron, Friday, and at Columbus, O., January 16th. January 8, 1887. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Liberal.

From Secular Thought.

A Liberal paper should be edited by a Liberal man. And by the word Liberal I mean, not only free, not only one who thinks for himself, not only one who has escaped from the prisons of custom and creed, but one who is candid, intelligent, and kind—that is to say, Liberal toward others.

This Liberal editor should not forever play upon one string, no matter how wonderful the music. He should not hav his attention forever fixed upon one question—that is to say, he should not look through a reversed telescope and narrow his horizon to that degree that he sees only one thing.

To know that the Bible is the literature of a barbarous people, to know that it is uninspired, to be certain that the supernatural does not and cannot exist—all this is but the beginning of wisdom. This only lays the foundation for unprejudiced observation. To kill weeds, to fell forests, to drive away or exterminate wild beasts—this is preparatory to doing something of greater value. Of course the weeds must be killed, the forests must be felled, and the beasts must be destroyed before the building of homes and the cultivation of fields.

A Liberal paper should not discuss theological questions alone. Intelligent people everywhere hav given up most of the old superstitions. They hav pretty well made up their minds what is false, and they want to know something that is true. For this reason a Liberal paper should keep abreast of the discoveries of the human mind. No science should be neglected; no fact should be overlooked. Inventions should be described and understood. And not only this, but the beautiful in thought, in form and color, should be preserved. The paper should be filled with things calculated to interest thoughtful, intelligent, and serious people. There should be a column for children as well as for men.

Above all, it should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says. The orthodox world has always dealt in personalities. Every minister can answer the argument of an opponent by attacking the character of the opponent. This example should never be followed by a Liberal man. Nobody can be bad enough to prove that the Bible is uninspired, and nobody can be good enough to prove that it is the word of God. These facts hav no relation. They neither stand nor fall together.

Nothing should be asserted that is not known. Nothing should be denied, the falsity of which has not been, or cannot be, demonstrated. Opinions are simply given for what they are worth. They are guesses, and one guesser should giv to another guesser all the right of guessing that he claims for himself. Upon the great questions or origin, of destiny, of immortality, of punishment and reward in other worlds, every honest man must say, "I do not know." Upon these questions, this is the creed of intelligence. Nothing is harder to bear than the egotism of ignorance and the arrogance of superstition. The man who has some knowledge of the difficulties surrounding these subjects, who knows something of the limitations of the human mind, must of necessity be mentally modest. And this condition of mental modesty is the only one consistent with individual progress.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the perfect liberty of speech. We should remember that the world is as it must be; that the present is the necessary offspring of the past; that the future must be what the present makes it, and that the real work of the reformer, of the philanthropist, is to change the conditions of the present, to the end that the future may be better. R. G. INGERSOLL.

Men, Women, and Books.

It is a strange fact that no matter how fully men think that they believe in a principle of reform, if it does not touch them personally, or, at least, as a class, they hav to be waked up to the realization of their own standard of belief every time the subject is mentioned.

I was a good deal amused by an illustration of this human weakness a few days ago.

A friend and I had started to take a stroll one lovely Sunday morning out on the Riverside drive. The walk was so enjoyable that before we realized the fact we were beyond the point where streets are cut through to the drive, except at long distances.

This fact being once borne in upon my consciousness, I immediately discovered that I was tired. The prospect was not encouraging. It would be a long walk to the nearest car at best, and no unoccupied public carriages appeared.

Therefore we fell to leaning over the railing looking out on the river, and idly speculating on the best way to get home.

A gentleman walked briskly past us, and then he, also, turned to get the fine view from where we stood. My friend told him of our desire to get back home, and asked if he could tell us which way to walk to find the nearest cross-street to the cars. Should we go on or back? He assured us that four blocks further on was what we wanted, and that it would also bring us out where we could take an elevated train.

This seemed hopeful, and as we walked we talked.

The gentleman was evidently a professional man, well-to-do, and of fine instincts.

We talked of the value of land along the drive, and of the fine locations for beautiful homes. I said that I should like a certain lot, that the outlook would be quite inspiring from that point.

The gentleman at once began to pass judgment, in a mild way, upon my wish. He held that no one had a right to own such a lot, etc., etc.

It was just after the Henry George campaign, and he drifted into that. He talked well.

Finally he said: "I tell you, sir, and madam, that there are to-day just two great questions before the world. Both affect every poor man. These questions cannot much longer be kept down and thrust aside. They are the questions of the labor movement and of prohibition, and they are the only questions of importance to-day or for the near future."

"Well," said I, "I agree with you as to the importance of these questions, but I think that you might, without doing violence to the truth, add another question, if not two others, that are quite as important, and which will affect quite as many, perhaps more, people." He stopped short, and stared at me. He had, up to this time, thought me harmless, and, after giving me a casual glance, had addressed most of his remarks to my more impressiv-looking companion.

I waited for his jaw to assume its normal position, and for his eyes to return to their sockets. Then I said, "And I may go farther and say that one of these questions deserves and should hav precedence to all others."

Then he began to brace up for a fight.

"I cannot conceive, madam, of any question that any human being can feel should stand ahead of these in point of either time or importance."

"Well," said I, "this question should hav been settled before the first man ever got drunk, and therefore before temperance, not to say prohibition, could hav been thought of, and before competition in labor ever created a problem to solve. Therefore I claim that it should hav precedence in time. And since it affects more than one-half of the race directly, and every human being by heredity, I claim for it precedence in importance; for those who are affected most by it are also most affected by the two questions named by you."

The man gasped. Then he said, "I am totally unable to conceive of what you mean." "That is because you are a man," said I, "and are therefore unable to conceive of an important question which has not for its object the happiness and ambition first of all for man. The question I refer to is human equality between the sexes, in this country expressed most directly by the ballot, and called woman-suffrage."

He brightened wonderfully, and my companion said, "Good. She hit you fairly that time. And I am with her heart and soul. You are in a hopeless minority in this company." Then we all laughed, but the gentleman hastened to say that he, too, was a most earnest believer in that cause—only he did not hold it "so important, nor so urgent, as the other two, though," he added, "I've advocated it strongly, because I feel sure that the woman's vote would carry Prohibition!"

As an aid in itself still the question of human equality and justice was utterly sunk in the pitiful question of whether she would "carry" another measure. We had reached our cross street and said, "Good-morning."

Then there was a moment of silence in which I knew that my companion was in the depths of humiliation. Then I laughed, and he said:

"I don't wonder you laugh. How utterly inconsistent men are! And, great God, how little they realize the altitude of their own selfishness and self-conceit! Now, that man really thinks that he is a strong believer in human equality, and would be highly indignant if told that he thought more of his own comfort and happiness and future welfare than of that of his mother or wife or daughter; and yet he had to be waked up out of a deep sleep before he was even able to grasp the idea that there is still one-half of the human race prevented from expressing even an opinion upon the topics he named, and which are of equal, if not of greater importance to that very half." "But he is a 'thorough suffragist,'" said I. "Thorough nonsense! He is nothing of the kind Manly men are ashamed to say that they are not, but so long as they hav to be waked up with dynamite before they even recall that such a thing exists as a disfranchised and humiliated class—why, they don't believe in helping to crush such an ignominy half as much as they believe in toasting their own toes before a club-fire which shall agree never to warm their wives or daughters." "Tut, tut, tut," said I, "you are excited. Why, that poor man has no idea that he did not come off with flying colors. He doesn't even know that his last remark indicated that he believed women to be so soft-headed that they'd vote the sentimental ticket always, and not be divided in their opinion and healthy in their differences as men are. He thinks they could be 'voted' in a body to carry conservativ and prohibitiv measures."

Speaking of that, it may be news, and bad news to some, that in the recent election in Washington Territory the woman's vote, quite contrary to all predictions, defeated prohibition.

The governor of Wyoming has sent me some reports from his territory, and some information which I may share with you later on. It would be very wholesome information for our weak-kneed Liberals who are "afraid to risk" the experiment of human equality for women.

But, speaking of wholesome information, if you want to get more of that desirable article in one book than you ever saw before in so small a space, and if you want to get it in such a charming style that you will be tempted to sit up nights to read it, why, I strongly advise you to get the "History of Woman Suffrage," edited by those three brilliant and deservedly famous women, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Joslyn Gage.

While it is edited by these three able women, it is written by many different people, and no one could believe, without reading it, how interesting it could be in matter, and how attractiv in manner of presentation.

It is as interesting as a story-book, and twice as instructiv. It has a good deal of Freethought talk in it too. It is humorous, pathetic, forcible, thoroughly dignified, and at the same time "light." One does not hav to "wade" through it. It is history at its best.

There is a chapter (the last one in the first volume) by Mrs. Gage on "Woman in Church and State" that is as heterodox as Colonel Ingersoll, and as carefully collected as are Mr. Remsburg's statistics.

Mrs. Stanton never misses a chance to stick pins in wherever they will do the most good, and if the situation demands a safety-pin it is always on hand and is carefully adjusted. Miss Anthony is more orthodox in her methods; but it is a vigorous trinity, and "the word, the truth, and the life," which they hav given, will do your hearts good to read, whether you believe in the "cause" or not.

Read it, and see if I hav not come even far within the truth as to the merits of this remarkable work.

I believe that I used to hav a little prejudice against Miss Anthony, but I take it all back. I heard her say something once that ruffled my temper.

After reading these volumes I am only surprised that her language was not often so vigorous as to ruffle my entire costume.

Very sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER.

Henry George Attacks the Catholic Hierarchy.

In his new paper, the Standard, Henry George givs Dr. McGlynn and his church superiors the benefit of nearly ten columns of praise and abuse. It is needless to say Dr. McGlynn receives the praise, and Archbishop Corrigan the abuse. The conclusion at which Mr. George arrives is one that exactly agrees with THE TRUTH SEEKER's prediction all along, and allows us the finest possible opportunity to say to Mr. George, We told you so. His conclusion is this:

American workingmen might as well make up their minds that in their fight for the enfranchisment of labor they must meet the opposition of the Catholic hierarchy.

The following are the vital points of Mr. George's attack:

"The Catholic church," he says, "has been used to bolster the power of tyrants, and to keep the masses quiet under the social injustice; the Greek church to support the absolutism of the czar. Luther hurled his direct anathemas against German peasants driven into agrarian revolt by the unbearable oppressions of their lords; the English church has been the stanch supporter of regal tyranny and landlord robbery, and Presbyterian ministers hav preached to Scottish clansmen that in resisting eviction from their homes they would be resisting the will of God, while in our own day and place the popular preachers of the great liberal denominations, however careless they may be of the charge of heterodoxy, are careful to temper the gospel to their wealthy sheep. But never before in the history of this country," he says, "has there been such a barefaced attempt to use the Catholic church as a political machine—such an audacious exercise of ecclesiastical power to stifle political opinion and control political action."

Dr. McGlynn, it appears, was silenced once before by the church authorities. In welcoming Michael Davitt, in 1882, Dr. McGlynn said that the soil of Ireland belonged to the people of the country, and not to a few landlords. For this a letter was sent by the cardinal prefect of the Propaganda directing Cardinal McCloskey to suspend "the priest McGlynn." Cardinal McCloskey did not do this, but Dr. McGlynn was ordered to make no more Land League speeches, and he obeyed, remaining silent for years.

When Dr. McGlynn and other Catholic clergymen had given Mr. George assurances of their support in his race for mayor last fall, Mr. George heard that Archbishop Corrigan was offended by the attitude of Dr. McGlynn, and at Dr. McGlynn's suggestion Mr. George called on the archbishop with a letter of introduction from Dr. McGlynn. This is Mr. George's account of the interview:

I called accordingly on the archbishop, who received me courteously, but gave me little opportunity to speak on matters as to which I could speak with propriety, insomuch as he opened the conversation by reading to me two letters from the propaganda, dated in 1882 and addressed to his predecessor, Cardinal McCloskey. In these the suspension of "the priest McGlynn" was demanded at the express order of the pope, because, in his Land League speeches, he had taught doctrins openly contrary to the teachings of the Catholic church, and he was censured because in other ways he had shown "propensity to favor the Irish revolution." The archbishop gave me at some considerable length a history of the matter. the essential point of which was that the execution of this sentence had at that time been suspended on the understanding that Dr. McGlynn should make no more public utterances. The archbishop said that that understanding had now been violated by Dr. McGlynn—so much so that a Protestant gentleman with whom he had recently dined had complained to him of the scandalous declarations of the doctor in regard to the rights of landowners. The archbishop told me that he had called his council to meet at 12 o'clock that day for the purpose of taking into consideration the case of Dr. McGlynn, and, as I understood, of at once suspending him.

On leaving the archbishop I called on Dr. McGlynn and informed him of the result of my interview. He said that his understanding of the promis he had felt himself obliged to make in 1882 was that he should deliver no more speeches on the Irish question, which promis he had kept; that he had since made speeches in behalf of Mr. Cleveland, to which there had been no remonstrance whatever, and that, although he had not up to that time received any inhibition from speaking at the Chickering Hall meeting, yet even should one come he could not, now that he had been announced to speak, refrain from doing so consistently with his own self-respect and without publicly renouncing the rights of an American citizen.

October 1st Mr. George held a campaign meeting at Chickering Hall, at which several Catholic priests were expected to speak. Of this meeting and its results Mr. George says:

Dr. McGlynn went to Chickering Hall and spoke, though the other Catholic clergymen who were to hav been present did not come, having, as I afterward learned, received an express command not to do so. I did not hear Dr. McGlynn's speech, but I know how it impressed those who did. A lady who was present, and who had no idea of the situation, said to me after the meeting, "Dr. McGlynn spoke like a man who expected this night to be his last." She did not know that he spoke under the shadow of what to a Catholic priest is worse than death. Dr. McGlynn informed me the next morning that he would not speak again during the campaign. And he kept his own counsel. Not until weeks after the campaign, and until the matter, bruited about from the archbishop's palace, had found its way into the press, did I learn, or had I the faintest suspicion, that on the morning after that speech Dr. McGlynn had really been suspended for two weeks. Dr. McGlynn made no more speeches in the campaign, obeying to the letter the command of his ecclesiastical superior. But he did show his sympathy in all non-forbidden ways, and when, on the eve of the election, "Monsignor" Preston, the archbishop's right-hand man, issued a pronunciamento designed to prevent Catholics from voting the workingman's ticket, which pronunciamento was distributed at the church doors, Dr. McGlynn volunteered to ride around with me to the polls—in this silent way to show that a conscientious Catholic could and did support me.

Dr. McGlynn's offending, thinks Mr. George, is not for having taken sides in politics, but having "taken a side which Archbishop Corrigan does not like. What Dr. McGlynn is punished for is, for taking the side of the workingmen against the system of injustice and spoliation, and the rotten rings which hav made the government of New York a byword of corruption. In the last presidential election Dr. McGlynn made some vigorous speeches in behalf of the Democratic candidate without a word or thought of remonstrance. His sin is in taking a side in politics which was opposed to the rings that had the support of the Catholic hierarchy."

Mr. George continues: Whether Dr. McGlynn will go to Rome is something which rests with himself; whether he ought to go to Rome is a matter which may properly be discussed. Some of his friends, following the lead of the impulsiv Michael Davitt—who, on the eve of his marriage with a charming lady, was disposed to take roseate views—hav seemed to think that Dr. McGlynn ought to obey the summons to Rome, in order to present the case of those Catholics who believe in the common right to land, and force the question to an issue, which would forever still any pretense that this doctrin was condemned by the church.

This might be all very well if Dr. McGlynn could go to Rome after some such unequivocal popular expressions as would convince the Roman authorities that he was the embassador of American Catholics, and that they did not propose to be trifled with. But for him to go to Rome as a suspended priest with any expectation of getting a hearing as against an archbishop backed up by all the influence of the rich Catholics of the United States, and by all the powerful influence of the English colony and English intriguers at Rome, would be folly. Dr. McGlynn would hav no chance in Rome to make any presentation of the case, even if the Propaganda were a perfectly impartial tribunal.

But it is not. The cardinals of the Propaganda are a set of Italian Bourbon politicians, bitterly opposed to everything savoring of freedom and progress, and committed in advance against Dr. McGlynn and the doctrin of "the land for the people."

What it would do if Dr. McGlynn went to Rome would be simply to side-track the issue and drop Dr. McGlynn, metaphorically, through some ecclesiastical trap-door. He would be worried and heartbroken by delays, compelled to defend himself against all sorts of side charges, and finally sent into some convent, or ordered off to Africa or China. As Puck, chuckling over the suppression of Dr. McGlynn, declares, "The church hath a million ways of squelching the insubordinate, and Dr. McGlynn is marked for squelching. The job will be done delicately, but it will be done effectivly." Nor does "Monsignor" (my lord) Preston hav any doubt as to what will become of Dr. McGlynn if he goes to Rome. "He is not sent for to be complimented," says this "My Lord" Preston; "he is sent for to be disciplined."

The truth is that having Dr. McGlynn ordered to Rome is a cunning scheme to get rid of him with the least possible remonstrance from his congregation. It would be unpleasant, to say the least, to try to cut off his head here among those who know him and love him, so he is to be sent away to be executed, and time is to be allowed to dull feeling.

There are the strongest possible reasons why he should not go to Rome. In this matter a great principle is at stake. Does an American citizen cease to be a citizen when he becomes a priest? Is an American citizen, because he is also a Catholic priest, to be held to answer before a foreign tribunal because of his action in American politics? If this is so, then the sooner we know it the better.

Dr. McGlynn has not been summoned to Rome at the instance of Rome, but at the instance of Archbishop Corrigan, prompted undoubtedly by the "castle Catholics" and the ring politicians of New York.

But whether the Roman ecclesiastical authorities are used through Errington by the British government, or through Archbishop Corrigan by a New York ring, or whether they act in American politics on their own motivs and for their own purposes, makes little difference. The prime fact is in the outrageous claim that the American Catholic clergy, perhaps for their numbers the most influential class of men in this country, are to be in their political action the puppets of a foreign power, four thousand miles distant in space and many centuries distant in ideas; that these men, each of whom may influence hundreds and thousands of votes, are to be subject to disgrace and punishment, to be thrown out of their homes and means of livelihood if their political action does not suit the Italian cardinals of the Propaganda or the worthy gentleman who livs in the twelve-hundred-roomed palace called the Vatican. If American Catholics hav not more spirit than to submit to this, then is Catholicism indeed utterly inconsistent with free institutions!

But I am confident that there is too much spirit in American Catholics to submit to such dictation, and for my part I would rejoice to see Dr. McGlynn make the issue clear and plain by utterly refusing to go to Rome to answer for his conduct as a citizen. In his case the point has long been passed at which endurance ceases to be a virtue. His submission when arraigned for favoring the Irish revolution has merely encouraged ecclesiastical tyranny. The time has come when he ought to make a stand for the sake of his brethren in the priesthood, as well as for the sake of the principles of American liberty.

Even without going into the question of why the government of a world-wide church should be allowed to rest in the hands of a knot of reactionary Italians, it is clear that the organization of the Catholic church in this country is not such as self-respecting American Catholics ought to be contented with, or as is suited to the genius of our institutions. The organization of the church in this country is autocratic in the last degree. The American Catholic priest has no such independence as belongs to the priest of Italy, France, or Spain. Ecclesiastically he is under martial law, for, by a fiction which the ecclesiastical politicians of Rome hav seen fit to preserve, this country, like Ireland, is considered as a missionary country, and is, therefore, under the absolute government of the Propaganda. Some pretense of securing to American priests a little show of independence was made at the council of Baltimore, but what it amounts to may be seen from the fact that there are in New York city only nine pastors who cannot he removed at a moment's notice by will of the archbishop. As for Catholic congregations, they hav not only no choice as to their pastors, and no voice in church matters, but hav no control whatever over the edifices they build and the property their contributions create. The congregation of St. Stephen's now see their beloved pastor thrown out of the church their contributions hav raised and beautified, and they are helpless to prevent it.

However, there is one thing they can do. They can keep a tight grip on their money. That would be the most effectiv means of bringing the ecclesiastical autocracy to its senses.

Has Christianity Benefited Woman?—I.

In the discussion of this question, I shall divide the subject into three heads. First: As the Bible is the foundation of the Christian religion, I shall briefly examin its contents and ascertain its attitude toward woman—whether or not its teachings, when carried into practical life, would tend to ameliorate the condition of woman. Second: To compare the condi ion of woman in the ancient pagan civilizations with her condition in Christian countries. Third: If Christianity has not been the cause of woman's elevation, what has?

Throughout the entire Bible we find woman treated with that inferiority characteristic of all barbarous people. She is treated as a being for no other purpose than to gratify the sensual appetite of man and as man's physical slave. In the second chapter of Genesis she is simply an after-consideration, and, in connection with this legend of Eden's sin and curse, woman is considered as having caused all the crime and suffering in the world; and this cursed dogma is the central idea around which many minor doctrins hav clustered that for centuries hav been the cause of woman's degradation in Jewish and Christian countries. The writers of the Bible treated women as property—creatures to be bought and sold, bartered or given away, like so many cattle. The female servant or handmaid belonged to her master, who usurped the rights of a husband, as in the case of all the patriarchs. That women were bought and sold is amply sustained by such incidents as in Genesis xxix, where Jacob agrees with his uncle, Laban, to work seven years for Rachel, but, according to the custom of the country, when the seven years were ended, Laban required Jacob to take Leah, the oldest daughter, and work seven more years for Rachel. Thus Jacob's two wives represented the price of fourteen years' labor.

In the Decalog, woman is placed in the same catalog with other property. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox. nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's" (Ex. xx, 17). In chap. xxi of the same book, seventh and eighth verses, we find these words:

"And if a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, she shall not go out as the men-servants do. If she please not her master who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed. To sell her unto a strange nation he shall hav no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her."

Here we hav the selling of one's own daughter to be a wife, or concubine, or handmaid, sanctioned by the scriptures, and if she please not her master he is to let her be redeemed. A man may buy a maid and rob her of her honor, and, if he is not in every way satisfied with his bargain, her father may redeem her. Are these the teachings that are intended to purify and elevate woman? Is this an example that would influence the stronger sex to regard with affection and respect the weaker sex?

If there is anything that tends to brutalize man and degrade woman, it is the cursed system of polygamy, yet nowhere in the Bible is polygamy condemned, but in many instances actually encouraged. The Bible characters that are taken as models of righteousness were polygamists. We read in Genesis xxvi, 5, that God blesses Isaac, and givs this reason for it: "Because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws." Yet Abraham kept concubines, and was cruel enough to turn his handmaid, Hagar, and her child into the wilderness to starve. Clearly, then, God is not displeased with the system of a plurality of wives, for Abraham obeyed his commandments, his statutes, and his laws.

David also walked in his ways and kept his commandments, and was a man after God's own heart, and yet had a score of wives. It is often said that God punished David for his polygamy, but this is not true. The punishment was for David's action toward Uriah, not because he had more than one wife. When God reproved David for his crime he says: "And I gave thee thy master's house, and thy master's wives into thy bosom, and gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah, and if that had been too little I would moreover hav given thee such and such things." If this is not conclusiv enough to prove that God countenanced polygamy, and that David was only punished for his crime against Uriah, a passage from 1 Kings xv, 5 will, no doubt, be sufficient: "Because David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite."

Solomon was another of God's favorits, and yet had a harem of a thousand wives and concubines. So much did God think of David and Solomon that he declared that their posterity should forever sit upon the throne of Israel. Whether or not he kept his promis does not concern us now.

Christian apologists say that God had to countenance many of the vices of the Jews; was obliged to lead them gradually in order to civilize them. The omnipotent ruler of the universe obliged to countenance such vices as polygamy and slavery in order to control his chosen people! He could harden and soften the heart of Pharaoh at his pleasure; why could he not hav done the same with the Jews? Why not hav made mankind better anyway? Man was made bad and governed worse, and Jehovah not being able to manage all the different people, he takes one tribe under his especial care, and leaves the rest of mankind to take care of themselvs, many of whom worked out a far better and nobler civilization than the Jews ever attained. If polygamy and concubinage were displeasing to the Lord, he might hav said something about the sacredness of the family ties and the equality of the sexes. Amid the thunders and lightnings of Sinai he might hav declared that the husband should hav but one wife, and the wife but one husband. But instead of this he sustains the barbarian in his prejudices, and fortifies the heathen in his crimes. If Jehovah was really desirous of civilizing the Jews, instead of being so precise about the fashioning of candlesticks, the killing of goats, and the dyeing of ram-skins red, he might hav said that the master should not hold his maid-servant in concubinage, that a man should not sell his daughter, or take to himself more than one wife. He might at least hav hinted to Moses that he had not shown the highest respect to the weaker sex when he ordered several thousand captiv maidens to be given up to the lusts of brutal soldiers and licentious priests. Omnipotence certainly ought to hav been able to hav said something that would hav bettered the condition of wife and mother. But if we read the Bible with an unbiased mind we will find that Jehovah had all the prejudices and vices of the Jews.

Of all the passages of the Bible that treat woman with disrespect and contempt, the twelfth chapter of Leviticus caps the climax. Here Jehovah declares motherhood a sin. The mother that has given birth to a son is unclean for forty days, and if she giv birth to a daughter she is unclean for eighty days. During her "purifying" she is unfit to enter a synagog, and, to add insult to injury, she must take a sin-offering to the priest, and he must offer it as an atonement for her transgression. If there is anything that thrills the husband's heart with tender emotions, that fills his soul with love and adoration for the gentler sex, it is the pure and lovely mother, clasping to her breast her darling offspring. But upon this loveliest of objects Jehovah looks with supercilious contempt. He pronounces her unholy and unclean. But why must her days of purifying be twice as long for a daughter as for a son? Because the daughter will, in her turn, become a mother. Such a doctrin, whether it comes from gods or devils, heaven or hell, from the church or the lowest sinks of perdition, is savagery pure and simple, and it ought to consign to eternal oblivion the god that is said to hav inspired it, the book that contains it, and the church that indorses it.

The Christian here tells us that the old Mosaic laws were done away in Christ—that the Old Testament laws are abrogated. Be this as it may, they show the barbarism of the times, and if Jehovah inspired the writing of them he was a devil instead of a god. Whether we are subject to the Mosaic laws or not, they hav influenced Christendom even to our day to such an extent that it has been, and is yet among a certain class, considered a sin, as an attempt to thwart the will of God, if the suffering of the mother was in any way relieved during child-birth, and we must judge these teachings by their influence. And it is but recently, and now only by the more liberal, that Christians consider themselvs not bound by the Old Testament. But when we examin the New Testament, we find the same ideas prevailing, that woman is in every way inferior to man, and the apostolic writings tend to subjugate and degrade her.

1 Cor. ii, 8, 9, says: "For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man; neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man." 1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35, again says: "Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home, for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." A woman is here commanded to keep silence, and if she wishes to learn anything, let her ask her husband at home. Supposing she has no husband, or supposing her husband is a dunce, as many husbands are, then the woman must remain an ignoramus or violate this plain injunction of scripture.

Ephesians v, 22, 23, 24, says: "Wives submit yourselvs unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord, for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and he is the savior of the body. Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything." The wife then is to be subject to her husband as the church is to Christ; or the husband is as superior to the wife as Christ is to the church. Does this declare the equality of the sexes?

First epistle to Timothy ii, 11–15, says: "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression. Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety." Here again woman is commanded to say nothing, and if she ventures to teach she violates the commandment; and, if the doctrins of the church be true, she will suffer eternal torment for her temerity. But the strangest part of it is that man is superior to woman because he was first made. If this be true, then the necessary inference is that the oyster is superior to man because it was formed before man. And Adam was not deceived, and consequently was not in the transgression, but Eve, being deceived, was in the transgression; or, in other words, if you sin knowingly you are excusable, but if you are deceived into sinning you are judged guilty. Remarkable jurisprudence that! And the abominable dogma is again brought forth, that for woman's sin in Eden she is to be forever subject to her husband, and he is to rule over her.

GEORGE H. DAWES.

Post Mortem Probation of Infants.

This world's social problems solved, labor subjected, crude notions of justice smothered under featherbeds of privilege, crime manacled, prolification checked, authority triumphs all along the line.

The poor we hav always with us, simply in order that the scripture may be fulfilled. Our great productivity renders misery superfluous. The rich, as usual, feed the poor; fashion, inventiv and refining, employs thousands in shooting and stuffing little birds for ladies' bonnets. At Newport banquets, that recherche dish, a paté of humming bird's tongues!

Our "vale of tears" thus redolent of Christian graces, let us turn from the serene enjoyment of this best possible of worlds, to provide for little truants that hav flown away from its school lessons.

In the Homiletic Review, Dr. J. L. Withrow, with benevolent solicitude, remarks: "It might clear the atmosphere of some of these progressiv theories to preach them squarely.

"Let those who hold to this probation frankly say to the afflicted parents, at the next funeral: 'Your child may indeed hav been regenerate, but its choice of God is a matter to be determined in the future. Of course, if it shall not choose God for itself in the unseen world, your infant will go into everlasting punishment.' Let the preacher venture to speak out such a speculation, and then settle with the bereaved as best he can."

You are wittier than you wot of, Dr. Withrow. Your speculation is a double entente. If it would not pay, that settles the question, but why not take a majority vote at the grave? The Andover Review palliates the shock by assurance that "infants transferred to the heavenly home are under influences perfectly Christian, and develop gradually into spiritual and intellectual maturity, and with a certainty as nearly absolute as any moral certainty can be; so nearly absolute that it is unnecessary to take alternativs into consideration."

Just a delicate seasoning of doubt to flavor the dead sweet of a humdrum routine! And but for the exceptions, what would become of the best of good rules—class privilege of babydom for instance?

The Andover allowance of post mortem influences might be even too liberal for the corporeal safety of babies, were not allowance also made for the decline of modern faith, and the force of the animal storge in parents. Without irreverence toward the vox populi of graveyard majorities, is not such appeal to the parties most immediately interested like subjecting tariff legislation to our manufacturers? Of course they will decide in favor of it.

As Grover Cleveland substantially allowed in his inaugural, class interest is the legitimate aim of democratic government. Hell, then, must hav been devised for some party's advantage. A chief source of clerical incomes, without which the precious influence of Christianity might be lost to this world, hell is implied by heaven as the foundation by the superstructure.

Would it be reasonable, or faithful, to deny the influence of heredity over heaven, or to assign equal chances of the sinister alternativ to a respectable pew-holder's baby, as to an Infidel's or a pauper's? Christians no longer burrow in catacombs, nor hold conventicles on the sly in Scottish woods. Nay, Parson Malthus has united Mr. Church with Miss Polly Conomy in holy bands of wedlock.

Like the high and low dilutionists of homeopathy, we may agree in principle, though differing in dosage of damnation. I think there ought to be enough to flavor a heaven rather too insipid for the vulgar taste, and where "the tune the old cow died of" is said to be still all the rage.

Theologic endowments are differential. If the Catholic owns the most effectiv hell, Islam and Utah boast a more attractiv heaven, especially for the heroic sex. Let each make the best of his belongings. Measured by their clerical revenues, fear seems to be the more efficient tax-collector. A virile Christendom repudiates sheol and hades dilutions, it takes hell-fire reverend. Dr. Withrow says Andover cheats in diverting attention from an "intermediate state," where the infant school arrangements may be wanting. It seems that the "progressiv theology" has borrowed from Rome a little purgatory. He concludes with true maternal pathos: "My dear baby of which death deprives me, and which I felt sure beyond doubt the dear Lord took to himself, was it one of those alternativ children that fail of everlasting life? Tried by this fact, who wants aught to do with the theory?"

Of everlasting life? Everlasting ephemera, everlasting phenomena, eternal nonsense. What do you know about the duration of souls, Dr. Withrow? How unfair, or how unfortunate, that in a universe where worlds are seen dissolving and suns flying to pieces, while ideas and societies follow suit in spiritual space, your little jelly-bud, that never had opened into consciousness, but trembled between plant and animal, should fail of an immortal career! If in the absence of reason, any dogma of faith could be found between the covers of the Bible, to avert such a catastrophe! But none has ever beamed on my benighted eyes.

Really, it is very illiberal first to beg the question of existence, and then damn it, before the dawn of vital consciousness.

But I suppose infants must take their chance of grace, a celestial class privilege, with the rest of us.

Swedenborg wants hell by way of contrast. Should we appreciate light and its colors without a dark background? Or perfumes without stenches, or music without noises? Must not some throats be burnt with fourth-proof spirits or red pepper, in order that others shall delight in pure cold water?

As the sun cools his fires in a sea bath, so the nervous or the bilious wed with plastic lymph, and maiden rosebuds with old money-bags. As howling winds and driving sleet make cosy hearths, so our holy fathers opine to found the heavenly mansions on the hells, the Lord's vinyard sending down roots into the lava of craters, and Trinity church leasing brothels.

Missionaries on the Congo.

[When Henry M. Stanley, the African explorer, was in this city, the Methodists invited him to address a preachers' meeting, and answer a few questions relativ to the Congo as a basis for duping Christians into giving money for missionary purposes. The following is the seventh inquiry and Mr. Stanley's reply:]

7. What hav been your relations to missionaries? Where missionaries hav been imperiled, what hav been the causes?

This is a very delicate subject. "Where missionaries hav been imperiled, what hav been the causes?" My relations to missionaries hav been very cordial, indeed. Here and there I hav met people who did not seem to understand their avocation, and who would hav been far better employed in their own country. I will giv you this instance: A missionary, who seemed very intelligent, arrived on the Upper Congo, and asked me for land. I gave him two hundred acres, at a penny an acre; granted it to him in perpetuity. I introduced him to the chiefs of the neighborhood, and they agreed to accept him as a friend. There was every prospect of that man being able to be useful in that region. Founding a state, as we were, we were glad to hav missionaries, and travelers, and tourists, any and everybody who came and could behave himself in that region, because the larger number of white men I could show to the nativs of Africa, the greater would be our influence, and the sooner would civilization be diffused among them. This missionary bargained with one of the nativ chiefs to build him a number of houses for a certain specified number of brass rods. The chief assembled the men and built the houses; and when they were completed and he asked for payment, the missionary refused. Consequently, if we had not been there, this would hav been one of the causes that imperiled that man. I told you that this was a delicate subject. I need not say to you that I argued with that missionary—I preached to him. I told him that his word should be as good as his bond, and, however heavy the demand was, he had promised to pay, and therefore it was his duty to pay. He said, "I do not see why you should interfere in our private affairs." I answered: "I hav but to say the word, and you will hav good reason to understand why I do interfere in your private affairs. If I say to this chief that I wash my hands of the matter, then good-bye to you." Well, he paid.

"Where missionaries hav been imperiled, what hav been the causes?" I told you it was a delicate subject. I dare say some of you read some remarks in some of your New York papers—something relating to the fact that I was the cause of these missionaries having been murdered—some three thousand, all the missionaries being expelled, and Bishop Hannington murdered.

The king of Ukara is a charming and amiable chief and honest man, comparativly speaking. The missionaries went there. At first they located at the southern end of the lake. They then crossed over and made friends with this honest man, the king, and their leaders were very enthusiastic for the king. To cut the story short, they bought a ship and finished her for something like £1,000. They were prepared to launch her. The king—this honest man, comparativly speaking—came with his long staff in his hand, as the custom of the African chief is, and he said: "The ship is built. It is a very fine, nice ship, indeed. Now, do tell me, who is going to pay me for the timber from which that ship was built?" The missionaries said: "We hav bought her as she is. If you hav any lien upon her, you should go to the Arab who sold her to us." "Well, perhaps you say true; I will go."

He marched off with his staff in his hand, a slow, deliberate man, and went to the Arab, and said, "I see you hav built the ship and sold her, but what about the timber?"

"Well, but you know," said the Arab, "the missionaries only paid me for the ship. They did not pay me for the timber, or for the nails, or for the work on it, but for the ship; and they took her with all the debts upon her, whatever they were."

"Well, there is some sense in that," said the king.

He went back to the missionaries, and they said, "That is impossible, we did not buy the debts. It is Sungoro, the Arab, that must pay you."

"Ah, well," he said, with a deep sigh, "you two parties in this affair do not know whether I am to receive anything or not, and therefore I put my staff on the ship and say she shall not leave here until the money is paid."

"Well," said the missionaries, "if you talk like that, help us to launch the ship, and we will go and bring our goods in her, and then pay you."

"Good," he said; "that is honest, that is fair. Now, boys, help these white men launch the ship."

The ship was launched, the missionaries embarked, but in making the trip she foundered, and they lost everything. They swam ashore, and received a letter from the Arab telling them that the king had heard of the loss of the ship, and as he had not been paid, he was sure they intended to cheat him, and, therefore, he was determined to seize upon them. "Now," said he, "you bring your small boat and help me to escape."

The missionaries brought their boat alongside the shore, but all around it were the king and his people. The missionaries were killed, the Arab was killed, and sixty of their people were killed. That is another of the causes that hav imperiled the missionaries.

What caused Bishop Hannington's death? You cannot serve God and mammon. You must serve one or the other; and there is the mammon of wealth, and the mammon of fame, and the mammon of ambition, and if a missionary becomes also an explorer for fame, he must needs meet the dangers that involve the explorer; and when the bishop left the well-known roads, and came with a well-armed force through Uganda, the people of that country took him for one of those Germans bent on annexing the whole of that region. They could not understand why a man should come to the back door when the front door was open to all comers.

On the Congo there are some forty or fifty missionaries to-day, including Catholic missionaries. It is not likely that they will be permitted to imperil themselvs or their cause, because then they would come in conflict with the state. Nevertheless, they may imperil themselvs by going beyond bounds by such conduct as the race which I described in my last work on the Congo between the English Baptists and the undenominational missionaries, headed by Dr. Sims. It was simply a race from Stanley Pool toward Stanley Falls, thinking they were doing God's work. It was very nice to see. No sooner had I given permission to the English Baptists to establish themselvs at Leopoldville than the undenominational people came and asked for permission to establish at Bolobo. Then the other party asked permission to establish at Lukolela, and then the other party at Equatorville; and then they came to me to negotiate for a grant 400 or 500 miles ahead of them, and I also gave localities there.

Lately a missionary, who has done a great deal of work in exploring, came very near imperiling the work of the missionaries on the Congo. Of course, when he had a fast steamer he could escape the nativs. He was safe enough. But suppose he had been pursued, and his steamer had gone aground, then what would hav been the outcry in England immediately? It is useless to struggle against the barbarism of Africa. It is enjoined upon the missionary that he shall not use deadly weapons; and when these people meet them with drawn bows and leveled spears, they run. That implies to the nativs that they are cowards. The nativs say, "Whatever they hav got is ours. Let us pursue them." Therefore, one of these missionaries had to use his rifle to save himself. Had he remained in the vicinity of the stations he would not hav had to do it. He would hav had the protection of the authorities. These are the causes that imperil missionaries; their own imprudence, their own want of judgment.

New York's Progressiv Excise Commissioners.

The excise commissioners of this city hav decided to encourage the sale of beer and light wines by fixing a new grade of license between the $75 saloon license and the $30 ale and beer license, which does not permit the sale of wine. They hav also decided to increase the fee for the saloon license under which spirituous liquor is sold with ale, beer, and wine.

One thing they find lacking is a sufficient force to detect violations of the law. The commissioners hav no power to enforce the law, and while they acknowledge the cordial coöperation of the superintendent of police, they say that it is nevertheless a fact that men whose licenses hav been revoked, and more to whom licenses hav been refused, hav gone right on selling in defiance of law.

They attribute much of this difficulty in enforcing the law to the fact that in some respects the law is deemed by a large number to be unjust and absurd, especially where it prohibits the sale of beer and wine at a musical or other entertainment. The law, they say, was evidently directed at disreputable resorts, and was not designed to affect rational and orderly amusements. They say that

> A very large class of our citizens, and by no means the least industrious and respectable among them, feel the operation of this law to be a purposeless outrage of their personal rights.
> That the legislature did not consider the combination of wine and music as wicked or very injurious in all cases is evident from the fact that they specially exempted church fairs and Sunday-school exhibitions from the operation of this law.
> Many people fail to understand why they should not be allowed to enjoy a glass of beer at a secular concert as well as at a church fair.

They suggest also that short term licenses for balls, fairs, and excursions should be provided for by law, and they hope that the incoming mayor will recommend to the legislature a bill embodying their suggestions.

As long as alcoholic drinks are to be sold, it is best to hav the sale regulated, if at all, in a sensible and impartial manner. This certainly is not done when beer and wine can be sold at church fairs without a license, while the respectable and orderly concert-hall next door is refused a license on account of its propinquity to a church building.

Lucky for Him.

From the New York Sun.

The Rev. Dr. Heman Lincoln, the learned Baptist theological professor and politician, explains, or tries to explain, that he didn't mean what he was thought to mean when he told Mr. Blaine and his hosts, the Boston Congregational Club, on Forefathers' Day, that "the city of Collins and O'Brien is not quite the city of Winthrop and the pilgrims." The inference seemed plain, but it is due Dr. Lincoln to say that he is averse to being considered a disciple of Dr. R. R. R. Burchard. Moreover, he is a voluminous volunteer contributor to our valued contemporary, the Boston Journal, and his communications show in him a commendably low opinion of Mugwumps. He is entitled to the benefit of this certificate of good sense.

It may be well, however, for the purpose of reminding him to be cautious in his excursions from theology into Boston politics, that it is mighty lucky for him that Boston and Massachusetts are very different from what they were in the time of the elder Winthrop. If they were the same now as then, the Rev. Dr. Heman Lincoln would not be a professor in the Baptist Theological Seminary at Newton. There would be no Baptist theological seminary in Massachusetts, Congregationalism would be the established church of that state, and Baptist preachers and teachers would hav to keep their convictions to themselvs or make for the Providence Plantations. It seems to us that the Rev. Dr. Heman Lincoln and everybody else in Boston who doesn't want to stand on the Saybrook Platform, and has still less desire to stand in the pillory, should be very glad that Boston is not the same sort of place it used to be two hundred and fifty years ago.

It is a curious thing, however, that many men, instead of being grateful for the religious toleration which they enjoy, are angry because some creed which they dislike is not excluded from it. We do not believe that Dr. Lincoln is one of that sort. All Burchardesque remarks indicate a suspended consciousness in the maker. It is as if he had gone to sleep in the time of the Mathers and woke up in the Boston of Collins and O'Brien. His surprise at finding that "papistry" flourishes and that ill-favored old women can walk past the frog-pond without being ducked for witches is natural.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

Mr. Henry George and the Catholic Church.

When Henry George ran for mayor of this city last fall, the elements supporting him were the most incongruous ever united by a common purpose. First of all were the trades-unions and the Knights of Labor, then the German Socialists, then the Freethinkers and a large dissatisfied element of scholarly voters who hav for years been so disgusted with common politics that they hav altogether refused to vote. Added to these were a few heretical Protestant clergymen, and a few Catholic priests, at the head of whom was Dr. McGlynn. The Knights of Labor and trade-unionists are largely Catholics, the Socialists are mostly Infidels, but pay no attention whatever to that phase of reform, and are not reckoned among the working Freethought contingent of this city. Aside from the clergy, nearly all the George campaign speakers were Infidels, and not a few were drawn from the membership of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The compilers of the "George-Hewitt Campaign," just issued by the Lovell Company in the interest of Mr. George, are both sturdy Freethinkers.

As the candidate of this mixed multitude of supporters, Mr. George proved himself a remarkably expert politician. He had an ear for all sorts, agreed with about everybody, but put his main dependence upon "working the religious racket," as the ordinary politicians express it. It is probable, though, that he would hav extended at least a finger to the Freethought element but for the advice of one gentleman.

Near the beginning of the campaign, seeing the general support that Liberals were extending to Mr. George, we thought it well to obtain from him some expression of views upon the objects for which Liberals are working. We wanted to know if, in case the Liberal paw helped pull the mayoralty chestnut out of the fire, the Liberals would be appreciated. In pursuance of this desire for information, we wrote Mr. George an open letter, and sent it to him by the hand of one of his chief lieutenants. Our readers will perhaps recollect the drift of the letter. Mr. George found time to read it, graciously expressed the opinion that it was "not bad," and had not one of his campaign speakers been at hand—a Positivistic gentleman with a perennial sneer upon his lips—who said that the Liberals were hardly worth catering to, Mr. George would hav answered it. However, he never did, but continued to kneel before the Catholic and Protestant altars impartially. Mr. George is no sectarian. We continued to express the opinion that the dalliance of the reform party with the church would turn out to be another Delilah affair, disastrous to all but Delilah, who would get her eleven hundred pieces of silver from all the lords of the Philistines.

And so it proved. The Chickering Hall meeting was intended by the managers of the George campaign to catch all the floating piety of the city and land it on the George platform. The campaign speakers known to be Infidels were sent elsewhere or kept quiet, and the "religious racket" had the floor. To the eye of the public the meeting was a spontaneous expression of a desire for George's election. The immense audience did not know that it was the floating piety of the city, and the absence of a few advertised Catholic priests was not noted. The result of the meeting, however, would probably hav opened Mr. George's eyes had he known what he knows now—that all the Catholic priests were ordered not to attend, and that the result of Dr. McGlynn's speech was his arbitrary suspension for two weeks.

The disciplining of his friend very naturally makes Mr. George angry. Perhaps he is also chagrined that so powerful an organization as the Catholic church has sat down upon him. But, in the end, it will be helpful. Mr. George is the friend of social progress—its advocate, and an efficient worker for it. He has stirred up the country as has no other man upon any subject, except Col. R. G. Ingersoll upon religious questions. Whether one agrees with his theories or not, he must be thanked for that. It is a matter of history, we believe, that the Roman Catholic church never agreed with a single progressiv idea until the rest of the world forced it to. Its opposition now will benefit rather than harm Mr. George. We never could see upon what grounds he expected its aid, or why he even expected it to keep silence. His land theories are heretical, and subversiv of the existing order of things, and when did the Roman Catholic church fail to denounce such theories?

Mr. George is an able man, a student of history, and he knew these things as well last summer as he knows them now. Yet he endeavored to "work the church" for votes, but boils over with hot indignation now that his theories are officially condemned. We can applaud every sentence he writes exposing the trickery, the duplicity, the tyranny, of the Catholic church, but we cannot sympathize with him. Dr. McGlynn is the injured party, and every American citizen should feel his pulse jump when he considers the danger American liberty is in from the machinations of a powerful hierarchy, directed by unscrupulous men.

Costly Playthings.

Among the financial burdens which the people of this city hav to bear in 1887 are the following large interest accounts on bonds issued for the benefit of the two museums in the Park. The bonds are due in 1903, when they must be taken up:

| | Principal | Interest |
|---|---|---|
| Consolidated stock—city—Metropolitan Museum of Art | $25.000.00 | $750.00 |
| Museum of Art and Nat. Hist. stock | 2.000 00 | 80 00 |
| " " " " " " | 291,000 00 | 14.550.00 |
| " " " " " " | 665,000.00 | 39,900.00 |
| | 983,000.00 | 55,280.00 |

This year the city raises $55,280 for the museums, besides $30,000 for running expenses, and an additional $10,000 if the museums are kept open on Sunday. At present these museums are rather costly toys for the people to support, considering that they are of value only to an exceedingly limited number of persons. It is better to pay the extra $10,000 and make them of some use.

The Andover Farce.

The Boston Post has given the Andover trial the title of "The Trial of the Century." The Post is right. It is the trial of the century—for childish absurdity. A rational person can scarcely regard the trial as a serious thing. It seems like a farce, or the play of children. Yet the men conducting it—the complainants, the defendants, the board of visitors forming the court, the advocates—are men of learning, of prominence in the community, and in their daily walks command the respect of all. But among rational folks how can seriousness attach to a trial where the complainants gravely accuse one of the offenders with having taught his students to "pronounce sheol with the circumflex accent, indicating doubt," and the accused considers the charge of sufficient importance to indignantly deny it, and affirm, with the deepest earnestness, that he teaches students to pronounce the word with the downward accent, indicating power and a full acceptance of the idea conveyed!

The charges against the five professors amount to nothing in their bearing upon the disputed points of Christian theology. The trial is a sane proceeding only when the questions discussed are whether the teachings of the professors agree with the Andover creed. The founders of the seminary settled upon a certain creed, to the propagation of which they wished their money applied. This was their right. The five professors are now accused of teaching doctrins for which no authority can be found in the creed. If they hav done this, they ought to resign, for it is not honest to misuse trust funds. The board of visitors of the seminary can remove a professor only for "misbehavior, heterodoxy, incapacity, or neglect of the duties of his office." As neither of the professors has misbehaved, or is incapable, or has neglected his duties, the charge has narrowed to "heterodoxy."

Professor Smyth is the head and front of the offenders, because, as editor of the Andover Review, and joint author of a book called "Progressiv Orthodoxy," his opportunities hav been larger, and he is alleged to hav zealously improved them. The charges against him may be taken as the substance of the complaint against the five professors. He is accused:

Of having maintained and inculcated that the Bible is not the only perfect rule of faith and practice, but is fallible and untrustworthy, even in some of its religious teachings.

This Mr. Smyth denies, but kind-hearted people would honor him more if he had maintained that the rule of faith laid down by Christ, that except a man hate his wife, and mother, and father, and brother, he could not be a disciple, is fallible and untrustworthy.

Of having taught that men "are not sinners who hav not heard of Christ, or, at any rate, not in danger of being lost."

This charge was likewise denied by Professor Smyth, who said that he predicated sinfulness of man universally.

Of having taught that no man can be lost without a knowledge of the historic Christ.

Professor Smyth likewise denied this teaching, but he ought to hav maintained it. For if no man can be lost without a knowledge of Christ, every one is safe. There is not a judge in the world who would giv a ten-day sentence on such incomplete evidence as the world has regarding Christ.

Of having held that the atonement of Christ consists in his becoming identified with the human race in the incarnation.

Of having taught a modal trinity (that is, that the trinity consists in modes of being, and not really of three persons).

Of holding that the work of the holy spirit is chiefly confined to the sphere of historic Christianity.

Of asserting that without knowledge of the historic Christ man does not stand under the law.

Of having taught that faith ought to be scientific and rational, rather than scriptural.

Of teaching that there is and will be probation after death to all men who do not decisivly reject Christ in their earthly life, and that this should be emphasized and even made central in systematic theology.

Professor Smyth denied all but two of these gentle impeachments of his Calvinistic orthodoxy. While he insisted that the "work of the spirit" was universal for the race, he held that such work had been chiefly confined to the sphere of historic Christianity.

"If it has not been confined to the sphere of historic Christianity," he triumphantly asked the court, "why has it not converted Asia and Africa without the preaching of the gospel at all?" As to probation after death for those who had never heard of Christ, he held that question to be one for further inquiry rather than for dogmatic teaching. Of whom he proposed to inquire, Mr. Smyth did not say. The question was a temporary one, he added, for in time all men would hear of the gospel. Therefore, though the idea is not wanting in practical and present importance, he would not insist on making probation after death a central doctrin in theology, but only an inference from a doctrin or fundamental principle. That is to say, rather than lose his position and salary as a professor at the Phillips Academy at Andover, Mass., he would let all those who had the misfortune to be born before Christ, and all those since who had not heard of his birth, go straight to hell! The heathen and the others should feel obliged to Mr. Smyth, and endeavor to do something for him.

The board of visitors will hav difficulty in fastening upon the five professors the charge of heterodoxy. They hold a great deal closer to Calvinism than they do to common sense. They are not even Liberal Christians. The present Congregationalism of New England is heresy itself compared to their creed. They hav proved in this trial their right to rest peacefully among the fossil relics of Andover.

If this trial shall be generally known as the "trial of the century," the title will also generally be qualified by some such word as "absurd." Tilting at windmills is seriousness personified beside this "trial."

The Annual Religious Steal.

The following is a list of the money to be spent by our city government during 1887 upon institutions of the various churches—a few of which are worthy of aid—the most of which are not. The total amount exceeds by $221,003.30 the grant for 1886:

|---|---|
| New York Asylum for Idiots | $778 00 |
| American Female Guardian Society | 25,000 00 |
| Children's Aid Society | 70,000 00 |
| The Children's Fold of the City of New York | 17,680 00 |
| Foundling Asylum of the Sisters of Charity | 279,893 00 |
| Hebrew Benevolent Society of the City of New York | 75,000 00 |
| Hudson River State Hospital | 11,697 00 |
| Institution for Improved Instruction of Deaf Mutes | 15,750 00 |
| New York Institution for the Blind | 8,750 00 |
| New York Catholic Protectory | 247,500 00 |
| New York Infant Asylum | 100,157 00 |
| New York Infirmary for Women and Children | 4,500 00 |
| New York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb | 13,950 00 |
| New York Juvenile Asylum | 107,250 00 |
| New York Society for the Relief of the Ruptured and Crippled | 25,950 00 |
| New York State Lunatic Asylum | 1,074 88 |
| Protestant Episcopal House of Mercy | 2.200 00 |
| Nursery and Child's Hospital | 110,000 00 |
| Roman Catholic House of the Good Shepherd | 6,000 00 |
| St. Joseph's Institution for the Improved Instruction of Deaf Mutes | 20,040 00 |
| State Asylum for Insane Criminals at Auburn | 1,560 00 |
| The Shepherd's Fold of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of New York | 5,000 00 |
| State Homœopathic Asylum for the Insane | 3,546 92 |
| Five Points House of Industry | 10,400 00 |
| Association for Befriending Children and Young Girls | 12,000 00 |
| New York Magdalen Benevolent Asylum and Home for Fallen Women | 400 00 |
| For support of children committed by magistrates to various charitable institutions in the city of New York, at a per capita allowance of $2 per week for each child, including deficiency for the year 1886 | 250,000 00 |
| | $1,426,076 80 |

This last item of a round quarter of a million will be divided up among those enterprising institutions which find the care of children at two dollars per week so profitable that they keep salaried agents at the various police courts to induce the magistrates to commit juvenil delinquents to their tender mercies. The Roman Catholic children's prisons will get the most of this quarter of a million, and the Protestant and Infidel taxpayers can hav the satisfaction of knowing that they are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars annually to train up good Catholics. It is a cheerful prospect, and we congratulate the Roman Catholic authorities upon their success in grand larceny. The boodle aldermen can sit at their feet and learn.

Genesis and Geology.

In expounding the Sunday-school lesson from Genesis for the little Methodists recently the exigetist, Dr. Vail, said: "But the records of the rocks, the account written on the stone leaves of the book of nature, declared that these six days must hav meant six long periods of time." This statement has been the cause of many letters being written to the Methodist official organ asking if this is the doctrin of the Methodist church.

The reply of the organ is that the church has not formulated a doctrin on the conflict between geology and Genesis. Many Methodists, says the organ, no doubt "believe that these six days must hav meant six long periods of time. But many Methodists believe that six literal days are meant; and some of the ablest scholars among us hold that view, and also some who are most proficient in the natural sciences. Still others take the ground that the narrativ is not to be interpreted literally, except as to its fundamental facts—the creation of matter and man by a personal God, the free agency of man, and his fall—and hold that the rest is a semi-poetic drapery. Some of the clearest thinkers who believe both the testimony of the rocks and the testimony of Genesis, hold that immeasurable ages ago God created matter, and left it without form and void to the operation of natural laws, which natural laws account for what geology reveals, and that he then fitted up the earth for the habitation of man in six days. Under these circumstances let every intelligent Sunday-school teacher and superintendent teach without impeaching the sacred record what seems to him to be the truth."

This is a yielding on the part of the church quite unexpected, but we doubt if the view will be accepted by the majority. Of all Protestant denominations, Methodists are usually the last to get a new idea, but cling tenaciously to the ancient doctrins of the sect. Nevertheless, if the church makes the six days of creation mean six "good whiles," she may at last accept the science of evolution, and then where is theology?

We should like to get the views of the late Mr. John Wesley upon the subject. We fear they would not coincide with this advice of the editor of the organ.

Editorial Notes.

"If the number of women admitted to the clergy were much larger, and they were allowed to exercise the pastoral function in all churches, they would be likely to hav a poor chance in competition with clergymen."—Daily Paper.

Yes, there would undoubtedly be a falling off in the church attendance now composed largely of parson-worshiping women; but might not a boom in morality be reasonably expected?

Moses Hull, who was arrested in the suit against him by one Hale, has come off victorious Hale advertised in various papers that he gave a great number of books away with every subscription to his insignificant journal, and Mr. Hull expressed his doubt of the genuinness of the transaction. Hence the arrest and subsequent acquittal. Mr. Hull is to be congratulated upon the good work he has done.

The Evening Post of this city makes the charges that church statistics are wilfully falsified by church officials to show that the churches grow faster than the population; that church statistics are less trustworthy than others; and that church membership lists are intentionally inflated, as also are the returns of church benevolence. The Post seems to understand the effect that Christianity has upon its professional supporters.

George Macdonald, the English novelist, is a reverend, and consequently an authority upon what constitutes a Christian. Here is his latest definition:

"A Christian is just one who does what the Lord Jesus tells him. Neither more nor less than that makes one a Christian."

It is well that the world should know this. Jesus said, among other things, that if any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." By doing just as Jesus tells him a man may become a good Christian, but he would scarcely be deemed fit to associate with decent folks.

Mr. George Macdonald desires space in The Truth Seeker to remove a misapprehension. Many discriminating persons hav thought that he is the author of the articles published in this paper signed Si Slokum, and he has received assurance of distinguished regard on that account. This he does not object to, but when a correspondent comes forward and accuses him of seeking to inaugurate chaos and to involve the country in civil war, he conceives it his duty to arise to a question of high privilege. Mr. Slokum is a separate and distinct individual, and resides at 2 Lewis avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. He is a littérateur whose name has been in the papers almost as long as that of Ned Buntline. He is a story-writer, and has furnished a tale for the Truth Seeker Annual for 1887 that Mr. Macdonald is sure he never could hav written. His views as published in The Truth Seeker are his own, and he has abundant ability to defend them. He had won a reputation as a writer before George Macdonald was born. Like other men of merit he is modest and does not write for glory, so that no great harm has been done. But if some day the writings of the younger Macdonald should be attributed to Mr. Slokum the injustice would be of a serious nature.

We print in this issue an article by Colonel Ingersoll, setting forth his ideas as to what a Liberal paper should be. These are among his sentences:

"A Liberal paper should not discuss theological questions alone."
"The paper should be filled with things calculated to interest thoughtful, intelligent, and serious people."
"There should be a column for children as well as for men."
"Above all, it should be perfectly kind and candid."
"Nothing should be asserted that is not known."
"Above all and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, THE PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH."

We find in the article nothing with which we can disagree, and this for the reason that The Truth Seeker is exactly the sort of Liberal paper the colonel has described; and, besides having all the features enumerated, The Truth Seeker is illustrated, though this may be covered by the passage which says that "the beautiful in thought, in form and color, should be preserved." Altogether, the prospectus applies to this paper about as closely as words can be adjusted to fact.

Our Canadian friends hav another Freethought journal, and we trust it may be longer lived than its predecessors. Mr. Charles Watts and H. C. Luse hav begun at Toronto the publication of Secular Thought, and the first number is out. Mr. Watts tells us in his usual dignified and dispassionate style why he publishes the journal, Dr. E. B. Foote writes upon the Secular value of the laws of health, C. A. Watts sends a short account of Secularism in England, E. A. Stevens shows Secularists their present duty, Helen Gardener writes a letter from this city, Colonel Ingersoll informs Mr. Watts how to conduct a Liberal paper, Allen Pringle describes the failure of theology, the associate editor, Mr. Luse, tells a story for the children, J. A. Risser briefly surveys the Secular movement in Toronto; there are some short thoughts for thinkers, a few sunbeams, and some editorial notes and comments of great luminosity. The paper is well printed, and contains about half as much matter as The Truth Seeker. It will undoubtedly be a powerful force in civilizing Canada, and no country is in greater need of reclamation from Christian barbarism. Mr. Watts also professes to be not unwilling to send a copy or two into the United States. We extend to our esteemed contemporary a cordial welcome to the battle against ecclesiastical wrong, and the hope that it will meet with the success the talents of its distinguished editors deserve. There ought to be a hundred Liberal journals where now there is only one.

In the Progressiv Age of December 18th, Mr. J. M. Jamison, who writes the "Current Jottings," asserted that the editor of The Truth Seeker had been obliged to refrain from condemning the conviction of the Chicago Anarchists because of loss of subscribers. Mr. Jamison was asked why he printed such a statement when he knew nothing about the facts. Up to this time he answereth not, but in the Age of January 1st we observe the following:

"Pardon.—The editor of the Progressiv Age is not responsible for the article which appeared against The Truth Seeker, nor does the publisher claim to know anything about The Truth Seeker's gains or losses The article in question which appeared in this paper December 18th last was contributed by Mr. Jamison. How Jamison received his information about The Truth Seeker's affairs we do not know, but we are under the impression that Mr. Jamison, as a Liberal, would not misconstrue things; but if the editor of The Truth Seeker does cherish such sentiments, we trust that Mr. Jamison will use some method to right himself. As far as the Progressiv Age is concerned, it disapproves of all personal controversy. In addition, we must state that we look upon The Truth Seeker as an honest, upright journal, and fearlessly expressing its views on all subjects, and deserves the support of every Freethinker. H. Hammerschlag, Publisher."

This exonerates the Age, and Mr. Hammerschlag's friendly feelings are reciprocated; but, with him, we wish Mr. Jamison would "use some method to right himself," as that gentleman is wrong on both counts. We hav not lost subscribers because of our position on the Anarchist case, and we hav not refrained from expressing our opinion when we considered it advisable. And perhaps we may be allowed to suggest here that an addition to our subscription list would not induce us to say what we do not think, nor would the discontinuing of his subscription by some dissatisfied reader induce us to keep quiet when we think it necessary to speak. That would not be Freethought, and The Truth Seeker would not then be a Freethought journal.

Lectures and Meetings.

Two clergymen came all the way from Illinois to attend J. E. Remsburg's lectures at Mt. Vernon, Indiana.

Mr. W. F. Jamieson has obtained the promis of Brother Putnam to go to Denver, Colorado, and occupy his "pulpit," for two Sundays. Other speakers will fill three other Sundays during Mr. Jamieson's absence in Nebraska. January 25th and 26th he has an engagement in Minden, or near there; 28th, 29th, and 30th in Central City; February 4th, 5th, and 6th in Osceola; 7th, 8th, and 9th in Stromsburg; dates not yet filled for other points; will probably visit Wilber, Waverly, Eagle, Clearwater, Neligh, Syracuse, Salem, Frenchtown, Iudianola, and Arlington. He will hav about twelve nights left, and invites Liberals who would like to hav him giv them from two to five lectures to write him without delay. He would be willing to dip down into Kansas for a half dozen lectures, and will invade Iowa if the "call" is loud enough. Address 271 Fifteenth street, Denver, Colorado.

Letters from Friends.

ELYSIA, O., Dec. 19, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say that we hav had Mr. John E. Remsburg here. On the 13th he gave us a lecture, "False Claims," and everyone was very much pleased with it. It was very hot for the lovers of the Bible, but it was the truth, and they could not deny it, and they want him to come again. I wish every Liberal would try and get Mr. Remsburg to lecture in his town. He sows good seed, and they will all take root and grow. He is a grand orator.

CHARLES A. WOOD.

GARRETTSVILLE, O., Dec. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The cartoon on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 25th illustrates plainer than words the situation of many professed Liberals, who claim to stand on evolution, yet cling to orthodoxy with a death-like tenacity, worthy of a better cause, afraid of Mrs. Grundy, fearful of losing patronage, or it might stir up unpleasantness in the family or church to which wife or daughter belongs. A fig for such Liberals. "Git offen dat platform, or leff go de critter."

A. C. LAKE.

MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS, WYO. TERR., Dec. 31, 1886.

TO READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I sent for "What's to be Done." It is one of the most interesting and original books that has ever been written. My copy has been in constant use, and those who read it are compelled to see the follies and crimes that grow out of Christian Paganism. It is not Anarchistic, but rather highly Socialistic. Its morality is of an order so high that the best among us will stand self-condemned in the presence of the moral ideals that are therein presented.

The author is all the more grand and worthy that he dared to confront a merciless despotism, and present ideas that must ultimately govern men's thoughts and lives if we are ever to reach that heaven to which we expect to attain.

Many portions of the book deal with the most complex problems of Sociology. Altruism is taught as the fundamental principle that should guide human conduct.

G. L. HENDERSON.

SOLDIER'S HOME, WIS., Dec. 29, 286.

MR. EDITOR: "What an awful malediction where God threatens, 'If ye will not hear and lay to heart to giv glory to my name, I will curse your blessing.' The curse of God is bad enough, but when it falls on our very blessings, in what a sad case we shall be! Let us hasten then to giv glory unto his name, by lips and life, by word and walk" (Christian Standard). Poetical surely, though it savors somewhat of the Don Quixote persuasion, which existed way back in Spanish lore of frenzied knight-errantry. Doubtless this editor of the Christian Standard is abundantly familiar with God to giv him all the lip he wants to. And yet it would not be a safe investment for us poor heathen who never knew this God, lest he become angry and curse our blessing. Now, Mr. Editor, if this immaculate journalist of the great Christian Standard keeps on the track of his God as he has found it, there is nothing on earth to prevent him from becoming the greatest hound in the orthodox pack, except his overzealous pursuit, which might run him into a strait-jacket.

Respectfully, NELSON HUNT.

THOMPSONTOWN, PA., Dec. 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, to be used as directed.

I want to do all I can afford to to spread abroad the work of L. R. Smith, "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," of which I order several copies, so that it may be read all over the land. It expresses a thought well worthy of consideration. Let the eyes be opened of those who so unfortunately are forced to dread hell in a personal existence after death, and of those as well who are made to believe that they alone will go to heaven without a thought of others. Let humanity learn to be good here—now—in this world, the only one we know of. Establish happiness here by acts of justice and right. Enjoy this and rejoice over the coming of a profound and dreamlesss sleep in nature after (at best) a toilsome life here. How sweet an unconscious sleep! Rest, instead of a doubting, dreading, endless torment or fancying a monotonous horn-blowing, harp-snapping, golden street-walking, starry crown-wearing heaven. Any sensible man or woman would rather sleep than march in the ranks of a Salvation Army. Friend L. R. Smith, let's shake!

JAY F. HALDEMAN.

LUNENUURG, MASS., Dec. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to your artist that the cartoons during the past year hav, as educators, been a success.

> Folly and fraud, secure from pulpit, law and throne,
> Are reached by ridicule alone.

Those illustrations that hav so keenly presented to the understanding of your patrons the ridiculous fables and legends of a most superstitious age, are priceless. Take the last, if you please. As a fact, what a blasphemous reflection upon God who had just fitted up the world as good as new, and got everything running as nice as a cotton hat. A most roundabout way to gain a desired end, viz., to get a good sort of people started on this planet, worthy of the cost of time and material.

After Noah had got everything secured for a sea-voyage, port-holes all calked and "payed," hatchways tarred and canvassed, it is reported that an Irishman appeared before the ark, claiming audience with the captain, whom he addressed as Mr. Noah. Standing knee-deep in water, he cries, "Good Mr. Noah, do let me take passage with you during the storm!" But the inexorable "No" rang from the upper deck, and the supplicant withdrew. Still the rain fell, and the flood increased, and Pat, submerged to his loins, returned to the ark and renewed his supplications, with prompt denial from him he had so lately addressed as Mr. Noah. Turning on his heels with dauntless heroism, he exclaimed: "Go to hell with your ark, Old Noah, there will be no great of a shower after all."

I consider this story as authentic as anything about Noah's voyage, and any methods, and all methods, that turn the mind of readers, hearers, or seers to the folly and fraud of such fables are commendable; and truly horrible as those illustrations hav been, they are as mild as daisies and gentians to the terrible realities they aim to lay before the mind's eye.

A. H. WOOD.

EAST HICKORY, PA., Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps you don't know that I liv in a hot-hole of superstition and bigotry. There are a great many here that will read THE TRUTH SEEKER and call it good, but dare not subscribe for fear of their friends. I hav got some of them to think that the Bible God hates a coward. I guess I can get two or three subscribers by New Year's. I hav had bad luck for a year—burnt out once, now hav a broken leg. I am going to the post-office to-day, and will send you some money. I will also try hard to get a subscriber or two. As soon as I can afford it, I want to get Paine's works and lots of others; but for the present THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav to fill the bill. It is a thunderbolt in this community. The cartoons are just the ticket. They tell longer stories than could be printed on twice the space they occupy, and some people will look at them who would not read, and it starts a train of thought they otherwise never would hav had. There is a tough set of citizens in this neck of woods, but we thank God we do not liv in New Jersey.

N. SPENCER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 25, 1886.

TO THE HUMANE READER: For fifty years "without money and without price," with tongue and pen, under persecutions, prosecutions, pecuniary losses and sacrifices, mobs, injury of person and perils of life, I hav advocated and defended truth, liberty, individuality, justice, and humanity against all usurpations of power over natural and individual rights, all monopolies, slaveries, and tyrannies, under every name and in every form.

During all this time I had hoped that now, at sixty-eight, I should hav a home, but I am at present a homeless tramp. I hav not been shrewd and selfish enough to keep my home, and pretended friends hav unjustly deprived me of it and what little I had, and I hav but $150 left.

I suffer much from insomnia and several chronic ailments, and I need a warm, quiet room to myself, near liberal, congenial, humane minds.

If any who read this are able and want to let me hav a life lease of an acre or half an acre of land, on which to build me a small, cheap house, I will be very grateful, and they can address me at Columbus, Kan.

J. H. COOK.

FABIUS, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1886.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Please mail me six copies of Ingersoll's Lay Sermon, so I can distribute them to friends in various parts of the United States. Did my finances permit, I would scatter them broadcast over the land to set people to thinking. As it is, I am compelled to pay tax to the powers that be—which are ordained of Gold—else I must take a respectful leave of my home and its surroundings, which "Barkis" must obey nolens volens.

That book notice by Chamberlain was splendid. I guess Hageman is on the right track. Mrs. Freeman's letter was very interesting. McArthur, too, deals sledge-hammer blows to the "Mither Choorch" that tell every time. Historic facts are, indeed, stubborn things.

We shall anxiously watch for full reports of Reynolds's, also the Anarchists' trials in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Am glad to learn my friend McMillan, of Wamego, Kan., gets some Freethought sentiments in local papers, a thing I've been doing for several years with fair success. Hope many of your readers will do the same, so as to kindle and keep the camp-fires burning. Eternal vigilance is required for safety.

HOMER A. BILLINGS.

GRIDLEY, KAN., Dec. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am happy to inform you that I am impelled to do so from a sense of justice, not so much for myself or for you and for those who are already enlisted and fighting against the evils of the church, but I feel this to be one of the best methods Freethinkers hav to build up and keep up the march of the human race to freedom and happiness. I feel that I hav enlisted in, and am now engaged in, the grandest undertaking of my life—that of trying to disabuse the minds of the rising generation of the great church idea. In my feeble way I try to make plain to all with whom I talk upon the subject that we hav nothing to do with anything but this world, and that it is an impossibility for us to know anything of any other. Consequently it behooves us to improve all our time and energies to make this world and its inhabitants better. I am happy to note the forward strides made in the past year by the American Secular Union, and especially the solid work performed by its secretary, Mr. Putnam. I long for the time when he may again be on the wing, and fly from city to city, or hamlet to hamlet, sowing the good seed which will fall in good ground, to be safely garnered in due season. His "News and Notes" are so full of everything that makes or puts life in literature that I am always desirous for the paper when he is on the road. Yet there are many more reasons why I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, I like the editorials, the management, the letters from friends, the Manhattan Liberal Club, and last, but not least, the pictures. They catch the eye of the young, and such as would otherwise pass the paper unnoticed. I trust that you may be fully supported, to the end that the paper may always appear as bright and buoyant as in the past year.

Wishing you and all truth seekers a happy and prosperous New Year,

C. H. CUSTENBORDER.

NEW CASTLE, WASH. TERR., Dec. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed 25 cents in stamps for "Truth Seeker Tracts" as per order.

One would think by the appearance of your columns of letters from friends that Freethought has but few followers in this far-off corner of the world. Very seldom a letter is to be seen. But one who livs here a little while will soon satisfy himself that the seed of Freethought has been sown, and that a grand harvest is at hand. The only thing that is needed is a good lecturer to urge organization among us, and form leagues. The church has but very little influence, although she has her embassadors in the field.

I think if Brother C. B. Reynolds should be so fortunate as to get clear from the baboons of New Jersey this time he would do well to immigrate at one with his tent also, and we will assure you that he will find a race a little further advanced from the ape.

The noble TRUTH SEEKER is anxiously looked for every week. All your subscribers are well pleased with it. Its appearance creates considerable discussion with our Christian friends, though it is pretty hard to get any of them to read it. But if they won't read, they hav to talk.

Yours fraternally, J. MORGAN.

MISSOULA, Dec. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10 as my subscription for 1886-7. With balance send me Lacy's criticism on Lambert, and also Antichrist on Jesus, and Gladstone and Huxley on order of creation. I do not think they know much about it, but man must talk anyhow. Think of Argyll and Sir. W. Thomson. The latter givs the age of the earth at about fifteen millions, and the former about ten millions—only a jump of five millions in fifteen. Did ever you see boys at marbles? They make no mistakes like the above.

In the "Reign of Law," by Argyll, he labors through pages on pages to tell us about it. The preposterous egotist! Why, any Rocky Mountain savage will say more in two or three simple observations than his dukeship in all his pages of law. The Indian thus saith, "Behold, everything you see has its own way to act or to be, and the way of everything is the way fixed for it by the 'parent power' sustaining it."

After all, science can only be the perfection of common sense. Scientific speculations are of another kind, are they not? Theology is only the exercise of speculativ desire. Well, I suppose those giants will ever be at it. The field is grand and tempting, but, oh, how futil the trial that must forever end in throwing up the sponge! As for myself, I think I see that parent power every day, call it what you choose.

A. MCDONALD.

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y., Jan. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It becomes my sad duty, on the present occasion, to inform yourself and the many patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the death of F. N. Albright, my only brother, who passed away at his recent home near Hudson, Mich., on the first day of December last, at the advanced age of seventy-four years. I hav not learned the particulars of his demise further than that his death was not preceded by a long and painful term of sickness; that, after the first day or two of suffering from a quite acute pain in his side, there appeared to be but little if any pain up to the time of his death, which ensued in about two weeks. He passed away without a struggle, like one passing into unconscious slumber, so peaceful and quiet that the friends in attendance hardly perceived when the heart ceased beating. Our brother, as you were aware, no doubt, Mr. Editor, was a stanch Freethinker of the Materialistic order—one whose mental ability, logical acumen, and quick perceptions made it quite easy for him to discard those ancient fables misnamed the holy Bible.

Our brother, though dead, speaks to the world through the influence which he wrought while living, which was to console the broken in spirit, to destroy the theological scarecrow, to giv in its place human sympathy and brotherly love. Brother was an admiring friend of D. M. Bennett, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and yourself, writing Mr. Bennett letters of condolence while in prison; also writing to President Hayes, in his behalf—those friendly missivs and urgent appeals in behalf of one who was wrongfully incarcerated, and whose greatest desire was to liberate his fellow man and sister woman from theological shackles. Yours truly,

A. F. ALBRIGHT.

MONTROSE, IOWA, Dec. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find three dollars to apply on my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1887, a paper that has been coming to this office before and ever since it became a weekly, and never missed but one number to date. Perhaps you would like to know whether it has filled its mission here or not. So far as I am concerned, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in connection with other Liberal papers and books, has placed me in a position to defend the truth as I see it. Their influence was not confined to me. All those who are capable of thinking for themselvs hav more or less read your paper. Most of them are convinced that there is no truth in the doctrin of a personal devil, the divine inspiration of the Bible, or in the divinity of Christ. And the teachings of Liberal works are so reasonable, so convincing, and so true, that these views hav penetrated the churches, even to the front seats, and the clergy know it. Hence their raving madness. With malice they wilfully and maliciously misrepresent the moral character of those they call Infidels. They do not tell their non-thinking sheep that the inmates of all penitentiaries, houses of ill-fame, lowest dens of vice, and all murderers are Christians. At the same time many there be skeptical to the core who pat them on the back and tell them to "go in; we will foot the bill," claiming to be Christians, yet believing not a word of it.

There are two or three here whom the priests hav given up for lost. We thank them for it; we hope their voices may be heard all over the land. May they echo and reëcho from ocean to ocean, that all may "rejoice and be exceeding glad." But the truth of the matter is, Christians are the ones who are lost—lost in the fog of superstition, a fog of their own manufacture.

The cartoons are all right. Go on with them. Those who cannot comprehend simple truths by reading should be accommodated with something they can comprehend. Yours in Liberalism, A. CRANDALL.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, VA., Jan. 2, A.S. 287.

MR. EDITOR: You must surely hav had a happy New Year yesterday over your success in preparing such a splendid paper as is the first number of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 287. Let me say I wish you would change your chronology, and use the Bruno calendar. Even the Mohammedan era would be more honest than the Christian, for from the Arabs monkery filched the almanac, both name and art.

To begin with, the picture of the year "1887," so-called, is a bright idea fit to be lithographed and framed for the office or library. If the artist will turn his hand to that kind of work, though he do only one sketch a month, I venture that not a reader will rail at "them horrid pictures," and all subscribers will be satisfied.

Samuel P. Putnam's "New God" is the best one ever gotten out of the fire. Pain's furnace heat must hav been seven times more intense than ever to hav freed the old demo from so much dross, and brought out a boss democrat. This piece of work is the author's best poetic production, and all the better poetry because it is thoroughly logical. Yet, the more you refine God the worse you make him, for then he must suffer to see the misery which he is unable to amend. Let us build heaven on earth. JOHN P. GUILD.

HAVEN, KAN., Dec. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith you will find 80 cents, for which please send me books, etc., indicated by the inclosed list. I hope you will continue the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as each one seems to be better than most of those that appeared before. I hope you may make arrangements for printing an edition of the Bible with illustrations by Heston. I had thought to ask you to print the year's pictures in a book, but I see that some one else has done so, so I will second the motion.

I must tell you of the revival at the church near here this fall. They had a number of preachers, and preaching two and three times a day for several weeks, and when they closed they had caught fourteen converts—one lady, six girls, and seven boys. It was a Hardshell Baptist meeting, so, of course, the converts had to be baptized, and that was where the fun came in for some of the outsiders. At the time set for the water part of the program all hands repaired to a place in a ravine near by in which there was a small quantity of water, and the performance began by the dipping of the boys, and by the time the seventh one had been dipped the water was very muddy. A man who is the father of three of the girls that were to he baptized, told the preacher that he would not allow him to baptize one of his hounds in that mud-hole. The preacher then said that the ladies would be excused until some future time. About a week after the postponement the managers found a more satisfactory place in a creek, about six miles away, near where it empties into the Arkansas river, and took the females there to dip them. The ice was three or four inches thick, the day bitter cold, and they had to cut a hole through the ice before the performance could begin. The old lady was the first to be baptized. The immersion passed off quietly, but the next was a girl who was not used to wading in the water, and as she waded in her dress floated on the surface of the water, which caused much merriment among the small boys standing on the ice. The last to undergo the torture was a nervous girl who seemed to hav no control over her feelings, and as she was led into the water she said, "O-o-o-h, I can't stand it!" and kept repeating it till the preacher tipped her over backwards, when, as she forgot to close her mouth as she went under the water, she strangled, and as she came up she screamed, and crying, "Help! help!" bounded for the shore. If the church people had known how much profanity their cold water performance would tempt people to indulge in, perhaps they would hav waited till a warmer day. Such performances should be prohibited by law. Several of those young ladies caught cold, but nothing serious resulted. The preacher was protected by water-tight rubbers under his "jeans." G. S. BISHOP.

STONEHAM, MASS., Jan. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I write because I hav two things to say. First, I want to add to others my thought that I am glad, as a truth seeker, you express a desire for justice to be given to the Chicago Anarchists. If killing can be made legal (as it is), it is hard for some of us to see why some of the illegal killing is wrong. I am totally opposed to murder, whether private, legal, or scientific. To me, all are wrong. Perhaps it may be because I like the golden rule of Confucius, which it is said Jesus told again. I should certainly object to being killed myself, and should not advocate what I dislike. I believe the Anarchists are sincere. But, if they are dangerous, then they can be restrained. If other wrong-doers were as summarily dealt with, we should hav a few less monopolists for Anarchists to preach against. Factories, shops, and mines are in many cases productiv of death. Sometimes the owners know it, but the world takes off its hat, givs them the best pew, and silently ignores the slow bomb that has killed many a girl, woman, boy, and man. Overwork, to fill some one's greed, is another bomb that slowly kills many. I think a person hardly Liberal who advocates death for his brother man. That is better for Noah and his friends, whom Brother Heston is now representing. Let me add to J. N. Brown's rule for capital and labor. "Let each man keep an exact account of his business," and if he is an employer and finds that his men and women are faithful, and are earning three times as much for him as they are for themselvs, let him follow the example of Warner, Godin, Leclaire, De Courcy, and others, by introducing profit sharing. This will stop all strikes and Anarchists, and decrease ninety-nine per cent of soup houses and pauper houses, and increase civilization at the same rate. I would say more, but abler pens than mine are ready.

Second: Why cannot Miss Wixon, Mrs. Slenker, and others get up some cheap story books for our children? I will do what I can. I mean this for Spiritualists and Liberals. Let them be sold for five and ten cents. Can we do this? I am ready to work in this direction. Educate the children, and the old folks will be all right. Mrs. Rockhill cannot see my point. It is this. We claim (and I am a Spiritualist) to be Liberal, to prove all things, to hear all sides, and to feel that the church, in restraining free discussion, has more Christianity than humanity. So it seems to me that all that tends to enlighten and Liberalize rightly belongs in a spiritual paper. If my point is still dull, I will say that our papers are doing this more and more. The Banner has a Freethought department, and other papers, like the Olive Branch, are seeing the point and acting up to it, for which I am heartily glad. The Independent Pulpit, with a Materialist editor, is extending to Spiritualists a hearty greeting. I am glad that both sides of the question are to be given. We shall all be wiser and better for it. Investigation will injure no truth or fact. Let it tear down the false, eliminate the mistakes, and giv us chance to grow.

Brother Macdonald, send me for the inclosed stamps Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon." Burns says:

> "What's done we partly may compute
> But know not what's resisted."

If the family circle knew how much I hav refrained from saying, they would breathe a sigh of thankfulness. I will close with what may be in the next Bible revision. And he said unto his disciples, "Giv me the storm and tempest of thought and action rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith." Verily, verily, I say unto you, ye shall hav "malice toward none and charity for all."

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

BURTON, MICH., Jan. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav often thought within the past ten years I would present a few ideas through your excellent paper on some of the objectionable features of funerals as practiced in most of the towns and cities of this country—costly caskets, expensiv hearse outfits, dark or black mourning habiliments, required, black crape for badges and door-knobs; whispering and muffled tread in the house of mourning, and while handling the remains before burial. The popular and wealthy and highly connected must lie in state with great pomp and circumstance, and sometimes on a gorgeous catafalque or cenotaph. Most of these customs grew out of the church dogma taught in the Bible, that death is man's greatest enemy, his implacable foe. He comes on his white horse, silent and invisible, like a thief in the night. He strikes, and none can stay his fatal blow. He is sent of God. The smiling infant, the blooming maid, the stalwart man, must go at his call.

> Death, the tyrant, heeds no cry,
> And none can from his presence fly.

He is ever watching in all the abodes of men, on the farm, in the shop, the cottage, the palace, on railroads, steamboats, and in the awful tempest,

> The angel of death spreads his wings on the blast,
> And breathed in the face of his foe as he passed.

He is here. Yes, his victim is now stiff and cold in his unyielding embrace in this house of mourning. Step light, speak in whispering sighs and agonizing fear, his fingers may now be feeling for your heart-strings. This is terrible to contemplate, and much worse to observe by sensitiv philosophic souls. I do not wonder many do not liv out half their days. These funeral scenes, with their grief, fear, and horror, make many sick, and fill their few lingering years with sadness and gloom, especially if the lost friend did not accept the faith of the saints. If he be a Catholic, priests may mumble Latin prayers for his release from purgatory, if his friends can pay enough money. If not, his doom is sealed. According to the faith of both Catholics and Protestants, the majority, if not two-thirds, are doomed to unmitigated and remediless woe. So they join hands to drape the world in black, emblem of night, sorrow, and gloom. The churches recommend and encourage the undertakers, sanction and sustain these customs to giv solemnity and power to priestly rule. The casket-makers charge treble the cost of their caskets, and treble for hearse and attendants. This is a terrible tax on the community. Let people join hands to produce plain, cheap coffins, and their neighbors and friends will convey the deceased to his narrow house. Especially let the poor and common classes start shops for this kind of work, and they will soon regulate this merchandise of death. See how this works. The opulent say, "May as well be out of this world as out of fashion." So the poor, not to be thought odd or ridiculous, often ape the ways of pride, and the burden is too great. Shall the living struggling poor suffer to display the insignia of death? A casket costing $20, $25, $40, $50, and even more, to be gazed at a few minutes, then hidden forever beneath the sod! Years are often required before the poor man can cancel this debt, with the wants of a surviving family pressing him hard.

I write this to help the church man, the poor, the opulent, to throw off most of this burden, and if we must squander, help the living brother. I believe in paying due respect to the dead—a plain, cheap coffin, stained or simply varnished, decent, ordinary clothes, moderate and unaffected grief, not fashionable public wailing, fainting, and screaming.

Brother Liberals, Spiritualists, and reformers of every shade, let us try and mingle reason and common sense in our dealings with both the living and the dead. Friends of reform, let us hear from you on this subject. Help make and direct public sentiment. Let us begin this reform in our own homes. When death by accident, disease, doctors (for doctors sometimes kill), old age, earthquakes, cyclones, shipwrecks, railroad disasters, removes the vital forces, and allows the chemical to fully enter the once activ form of some one in our family circle, let us not allow those to mouth platitudes over them who hav fostered the crape, the pall, the night of endless woe. Death is as natural and beautiful as life. It is the portal to better conditions and fairer scenes. Man is immortal in his personality. I know it, but will not here try to prove it. There is no resurrection of this mortal body, as the church holds. It never will be needed. A fine, beautiful, electro-magnetic, spiritual body will be his. He will start "over there" in his progressiv career where he left off here. Forever will bloom before him the realizations of hopes deferred here, with kindred to share and enjoy. The custom of using flowers in moderation, evergreens, etc., at funerals is beautiful everywhere. Let us liv right, die right, and be buried inexpensivly, until cremation comes to dispose of our dead as the most healthy, economical, and expeditious. This will relieve the masses from the tax of caskets, tombstones, marble monuments, slabs, etc., that indicate the Golgothas of our land. A cheap headpiece for the grave is dry, smooth, two-inch plank, boiled in pitch, painted white, with name, date, etc. It is very durable. D. HIGBIE, M.D.

CONOORD, KY., Dec. 29, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Theology would hav us think that it has made a discovery. It now says that God is not God, but the divine principle of love. Hence, we may infer when we hear the word god that it is only a soubriquet for love.

It is by no means flattering to our self-respect to be called profane, blasphemous, or hav applied any of those harsh epithets which superstition so cunningly makes the means of shielding itself, but how much does this divine principle resemble that God described in the Garden of Eden? I am always sorry to spoil a pretty legend, but whenever I read that story, I invariably think of the deity as an unusually large man, wearing a broad-brimmed hat drawn considerably over his eyes, stogy boots, the remainder of his garb of some coarse, substantial material, and himself as exercising that gruff kind of authority that some landlords are wont to use toward a dependent.

Now, we are quite willing that the divine principle shall here be supplemented, but do solemnly protest against the surreptitious manner in which it is done. This love idea never grew out of the church. It has been sweeping through the realms of Freethought for ages. It is the legitimate child of Freethought. Nor will she relinquish her claim without a struggle. Call it kleptomania, or by any other refined species of nomenclature, but this sort of transfer of others' rights should be restrained. It is a well-known fact that the church requires strong propensities and weak faculties. Reverse these properties, and we would soon know her as she is no more. But with all this, prosperity, attained by piracy, should feel the weight of an embargo.

If God and love are synonymous, or rather, if love is going to annihilate Jehovah, we shall sheath our sword, discard our proud title of Infidel, and believe. This divine principle has demonstrated its ego in manifold ways. It finds a delightful and delicate rendering at the hands of one who pays his devoirs to the tangible only that he may invade the holier sanctum of the intangible. Thus

> Space is as nothing to spirit, the deed is outdone by the doing;
> The heart of the wooer is warm, but warmer the heart of the wooing.
> And up from the pits where these shiver, and up from the hights where those shine,
> Twin voices and shadows swim starward, and the essence of life is divine.

This essence is a pantheism in which the student of nature has implicit confidence. Science, that reliable witness that was never known to shrink at cross-examination, and has never been guilty of perjury, attests it.

It may vary with the medium through which it passes, manifesting itself in the crude forms of untutored ignorance, no less than upon passing through the refining cupel of intelligence.

It reveals itself in the clutch of avarice, the scowl of hate, the mad frenzy of jealousy, and the brooding spirit of revenge, these being forms of "elemental strife" by which, we are told, all subsists.

It can be read in the caress or infancy, in the betrothal seal, the parting clasp of friendship, and the lingering kiss of death; in the gladness of a smile, the pathos of a tear, the moan of misery, the shout of joy, the cross of suffering, and the Christ of compensation; for

> Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure
> Thrill the notes of deepest woe.

The student of nature discerns this essence alike in the heart of society and the depths of solitude. It resides in the atoms, diffuses itself everywhere, and permeates all things. It is a republicanism, disdains a shackle, and should serve as the archetype of every nation on the globe. It is the affection of the universe, and with the completion of the harmonies will make heaven. VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Five and Ninety-Five.

A lady sat in happiest mood
Whiling the hours away,
With pondering thought of the many gifts
That made her life so gay.

For she had youth, and beauty, and wealth,
And friends of honored name;
Said she, "I'll heed ambition's voice,
And add to all sweet fame.

"Out of every hundred, the proverb says,
But five of these are wise;
So I'll try to please the ninety-five,
For in numbers the magic lies.

I'll write bright stories from day to day,
And string pretty words of rhyme,
But I'll never say aught that will giv offense,
Not even for truth sublime.

I'll never pen one odious word,
Lest friends might grow estranged,
But twine my laurel with love and praise
That it may bloom unchanged."

And so she wrote, and wrote, and wrote,
And the ninety-five gave praise;
But scarcely heeded the other five
Her paltry prose and lays.

Her laurel has faded. This lesson learn,
Would you keep your fame alive,
Grapple the truth though the heavens fall,
And seek praise of wisdom's five.

A Selfish Girl.

The school children at Maplewood were a very dull set, both at books and at the playgrounds. Everything seemed to be so uninteresting, especially for the younger ones. The schoolhonse was a tottering shanty, situated on the side of an old red hill, very uncouth in appearance, the only ornament being a gourd-vine, which had crawled up the mud-and-stick chimney. Scarcely a quarter of a mile from this house a beautiful little river flowed, but none of the smaller children were allowed to go there alone, and the larger ones did not hav the inclination to go with them.

The teacher, who had noticed their discontent, one day called them up and told them to study hard for three weeks, and if at the end of that time they had said perfect lessons, she would giv them a long play-time, and let them spend it on an island in the river.

They clapped their hands and readily consented, all but Ethel Hammon, who was very stubborn, and never willing to learn. She was not liked by the other pupils because she was so easy to get mad, and so liable to quarrel and fight.

Mabel True, who had heretofore stood about the middle of her class, was encouraged by the hope of a reward, and soon stood at the head. Mabel was quite different from Ethel, being of a good and kind nature. She was not worshiped by the other pupils, but could make herself liked when she tried; but you know people don't always feel in a mood to be liked.

For the time being, Maplewood school was changed—a spirit of interest was now among the pupils. At noon they laughed and talked about their long playtime, and learned their lessons without any trouble. Mabel, after learning her own lessons, would teach the smaller ones theirs.

Finally the much-talked-about day was at hand. Of course some novel way of enjoying it must be thought of. After a short discussion, they decided to crown one of the little girls their queen.

"Who shall it be?" asked Shelley Benton.

"I want Mabel!" said several of them together.

"I don't," Ethel said, trying to get in front of each. "I don't want Mabel, I don't want her, and if you don't crown me I will not play."

"Well, we will not hav you," Ledonia Wall retorted. "Mabel is so good we will giv her the crown."

"She is not," and Ethel slapped Ledonia in the face.

Ledonia did not resent, and they decided to crown Mabel.

All the large girls consented to go with them down to the river. When they were safely rowed over to the little island, Ledonia and several other of the little girls proceeded to make the crown—some to gather pretty autumn leaves, some to pull the thorns, and some to pin them together. The boys walked around in search of pretty flowers so it would resemble gold. Shelley procured a whole handful of dandelions and goldenrods. How beautifully the colors of the autumn leaves blended with the yellow flowers! The shade of a large dogwood-tree was selected, so they marched to the cool, shady bower in pairs. Mabel walked in front. Shelley and Ledonia followed close behind bearing the crown.

Poor little offended Ethel who sat on the bank looked up through her tears and saw the procession. She immediately ran up to the other children as if she meant to join in the play.

"Is it possible," said Ledonia, "that you mean to join?"

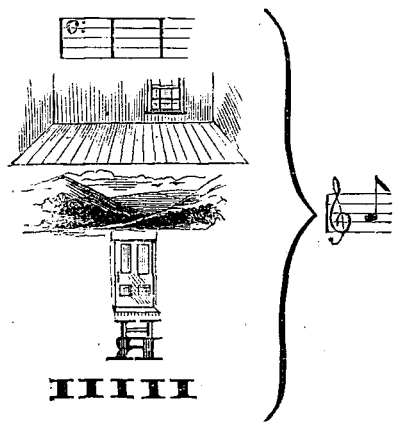
"Yes," she said, snatching the crown and placing it upon her own head, "but I won't let Mabel be queen, for I wish to be it myself."

"We don't want you Ethel," said Ledonia, "because you are so mean."

A struggle followed, and Ledonia procured the treasure. Ethel snatched it from her, tore it and threw it on the ground. "I shall not play with you," so she ran back down to her old seat and continued to weep.

When Ledonia saw that the beautiful crown was torn, she began to cry, but Shelley took up the shattered leaves and said, "Don't cry, we can soon mend it," and they did. This time they succeeded in crowning Mabel, and all of them declared that the colors were very becoming to her.

When they came back to the school-house the teacher saw that all had enjoyed themselvs but Ethel, but the little girl excused herself by saying, "I wanted the crown and they would not giv it to me."



Mabel did not part with the wreath until school-time, then she took it off and hung it on a bonnet-rack. Later on, when all the pupils were engaged in learning their lessons, Ethel reached over, took it, and placed it on her head. She did all she could to attract the attention of the others, but they refused to look up from their books. The teacher, however, looked up and called her to stand up in the middle of the floor the rest of the afternoon. She felt terribly ashamed, and did not take her eyes from her book the whole time, and as soon as school was out she threw the wreath upon the floor and hastened home. Ethel was the only one who had been selfish, and, consequently, the only one who did not enjoy herself. She ought to hav learned a good lesson by this, but, as it is a true story, she did not.

3.—A TIMELY ENIGMA.

For Arabic precision, or bold Roman grace,
Examin me carefully, look at my face;
Of all the figures that one can see
There is none more graceful than mine may be.
My eyes, too, are black, black as jet, you must know;
But my face is as white as the driven snow.
Connoisseurs hav declared that my frame at its best,
Would surely be found to be most statuesque.
I'm certainly activ, I am just built to go,
Tho' sometimes folks say, I'm a "little too slow;"
Then my time-serving critics discover at last
That they "really believe" I am "going too fast;"
And it may be the truth in either case,
For, tho' always I run, yet I keep the same place.
Long ago they compelled me, both early and late,
And always, to carry a pendulous weight;
But, having at last lost the pendulous thing,
I hav gone ever since, as I should, with a spring.
In argument, too, on some questions, I find
I hav really convinced the most skeptical mind;
So the very same person who "wound me up tight,"
Will acknowledge at last all the time I was right.
I sometimes the truth, by my silence, maintain,
But sometimes I speak it out loudly and plain.
In Germany, Italy, England, Spain, France,
All know what I tell them, or show, at a glance.
To enlighten mankind is my mission sublime,
Not on questions of Heaven, but questions of time.
I am priest to the present, the hours as they fly,
And giv no attention to gods, ghosts, or sky.
I am peaceable always, and yet, if you like,
When the proper time comes, for the right I can strike;
And I strike without moving my hands from my face,
Yet this striking is no metaphorical phrase;
I strike with my tongue, which no one may dispute,
Be it angel or devil or human or brute.

Correspondence.

Dec. 22, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl eleven years old. I liv in Cle Elum. It is in Washington Territory. The coal mine is about three miles, and the silver mines are about twelve miles from Cle Elum. Cle Elum is a nice little place. It has no school and no churches. I like to go to school, but I don't like to go to church very much. My mamma and papa hav a ranch on the Snack River. It is very nice on the river. I hav a nice little horse. He is a pacer. His name is Casie Eye. My sister and I hav a large Newfoundland dog. His name is Crucan.

From your little friend, MAY KAHLOW.

OMAHA, NEB., Dec. 14, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written twice, and, seeing my letters published, I will write again.

This fall, mamma, my little sister Mary, and I went out to Wisconsin to see grandpa and grandma. We had a very nice time. Once I went to giv the cow some corn, and she came after me, and I ran into the hen-coop, and she came in there, and I began to scream, and grandpa came out and told me to giv the corn to the cow, and then grandpa drove her to the stable, and I ran to the house.

Well, good-bye for this time. I am rocking the cradle, so I can't write very good.

With good wishes, I remain,

Your friend, MAGGIE GRIFFITH.

MYSTIC BRIDGE, CONN., Dec. 26, 1886.

DEAR AUNTIE: I was so glad to get the "Story Hour." I hav wanted it for a long time. Little Susie's face is beautiful. Mamma read me about little Susie. It made me feel so sad I could not help crying. It was wicked that she had to die, so lovely, and all you had, too. I commenced this letter one week ago to-day. Now I will finish it. I hav read with mamma nearly every story, and it is so lovely all the way through. Some of the stories are so sad, others so funny; one makes me laugh, and then I feel like crying. Mamma says you are a natural writer. I wish I could, when I grow up, write such lovely stories. Do you like fairy stories? Mamma doesn't, but I do. I had a pretty tea set from mamma, a fairy book from Ira, Christmas cards, candy, nuts, and other little thing, whole suits of clothes for my dollie. I hav got mamma to finish my badly-written letter. I will try to do better by and by.

From your little friend, CORA.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.

SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.

OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

Uncle Pete's Religious Experience.

I've been thinkin', as I pondered
O'er my Testament to-day,
How I learned to love my master
And his blessed laws obey;
How I traveled on in darkness
Many long and weary years
'Till a big protracted meetin'
Rather ruffled up my fears.

I had kind o' got to thinkin'
On my last eternal rest;
And in huntin' the division
'Twixt the cursed and blest,
I found it where we register
And sip the sacred cup,
But now, in my opinion,
It's a little higher up.

If I ever served the devil,
It was in a modest style,
And my conscience kept a botherin'
'Bout the end-up, a'l the while;
And whene'er they prayed in meetin'
For the sinners who were there,
I felt that my roost was twisted
By the magic of their prayer.

But with rallied resolutions,
I determined on a start
For to find that sweet salvation,
And that blissful change of heart;
If I missed the gates o' heaven,
Of which I'd hearn 'em tell,
Still I'd merit moderation
In the temperature of hell.

Though the devil was a lurkin'
'Round about my carcass still,
I rather thought sensation
Would pull me up the hill;
It came (I'll ne'er forget it)
In a noble-looking man,
He had a bald place on his pate
And a warm grip in his han'.

He was erect of stature,
Was rather long and slim;
He had angelic features,
And a traveling agent's grin;
He made me a sort o' study,
And oft partook my cheer,
And I found him strictly human
In his masticating gear.

On life he spoke of dangers
That beset us goin' through:
He led me out in Eden
And portrayed a thing or two;
He made the cities solid gold
For old rusty ones like me,
If I only took the sacrament
And dropped in a liberal fee.

He said angels sang the louder,
And thumped their harps the more
When they snatched a veteran sinner
From pandemonium's door;
And ended up by sayin',
Though not exactly in what way,
'Twould increase my earthly blessin's
What time I had to stay.

I had often felt forsaken,
And lonely, and depressed,
Since my good wife smiled so faintly
And passed to eternal rest;
Now, I felt my sin the greater,
The heavier my care,
For in her dying moments
I agreed to meet her there.

I felt my heart had melted,
I felt sure of a reward,
I had no fear of evil,
I had learned to love the Lord;
But as a sort o' passport
To the mansions of the blest,
I told the world about it
And was converted like the rest.

The preacher heard us witness,
Each convert in his turn.
And, pointin' out God's precepts,
Their meanin' bade us learn;
Some went off into trances,
While some indulged in fits,
I felt no end of feelin',
But I didn't lose my wits.

He stood us in a circle,
And, with big tears in his eyes,
Asking that God s gentle blessin's
Might be showered from the skies;
He described our gentle savior
In his melting monotones,
While our good old white-haired deacon
Filled the pauses up with groans.

Since then I've lived a Christian,
Though it often tries my steel,
And I sometimes tell of glory
That I don't exactly feel;
And it often makes me waver.
Bein' a little steeped in sin,
To see so many out o' church
Better than them that's in.

That modest village preacher
Has never come a-near
Since our liberal contribution,
And our hearty welcome here;
And I've learn he frankly stated
(Just where I now forget)
That "he saved that batch of sinners
On a hundred-dollar bet."

Now, when in the lofty steeple,
The bell swings to and fro,
And I think of all that's happened
In the years so long ago,
I feel a secret, sneakin' dread
To rally at the call,
When I think I was converted
By the devil after all.

Scriptural Wine.

A work of unusual interest at the present time when "Christian Temperance" is widely advertised as something efficacious in destroying the evils of intemperance, is a publication in pamphlet form by the New York Truth Seeker Company of a compilation by E. C. Walker, of Kansas, of the texts of scripture bearing directly or indirectly on the question of liquor drinking.

The writer holds that the "overwhelming weight of its [the Bible's] argument, precepts, and the example of its saints, is against temperance," and to sustain his position he has gone to the book itself and copied its texts, which constitute the bulk of his pamphlet.

In List A he includes "all texts which unequivocally condemn the use of intoxicants." The list begins with Proverbs xx, 1, and concludes with the remark that "of the New Testament writers not one has clearly said that wine and strong drink are curses to the children of men."

List B is composed of those passages "which commend or enjoin the use of wine or strong drink, or which promis an abundance of wine as one of the blessings to be bestowed upon certain favored individuals or families or tribes, or upon the Israelitish nation, or include the deprivation of it among the punishments inflicted upon the disobedient." This list is a long one and includes forty-five texts, which are printed in full, with irreverent comments that make the Bible temperance preachers stand in a ludicrously inconsistent light.

In Num. vi, 20, the Nazarite is told that he may drink wine; in Deut. vii, 13, God is represented as promising Moses to bless the wine of the Jewish people; in Deut. xi, 14, God promises rain to help out the wine crop; again (ib. xiv, 26.) the command is given to buy wine and strong drink and drink it; in xv, 14, the "fruit of the wine-press" is to be given liberally as a blessing, and in xxviii, 39, the prohibitory doctrin is set forth as a curse, as also in verse 51, where wine is to be taken away as a punishment for disobedience.

In Judges ix, 13, it appears that God himself drinks more or less and feels it; and David, the man after God's own heart, dealt out wine, according to 2 Sam. vi, 19, to men and women; the same book, xvi, 2, says that wine exists "that such as faint in the wilderness may drink." Solomon, according to 2 Chron. ii, 10, when he decided to build a house for the Lord, promised to pay for the labor in wine among other things.

In Ps. civ, 15, we are informed that "wine maketh glad the heart of man," and that the Lord is in the wine business. In Prov. iii, 10, abundance of wine is promised as a blessing, and in xxxi, 6, 7, is found the famous quotation: "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more."

"Drink thy wine with a merry heart," is a quotation from Eccl. ix, 7; and the author discovers the earliest mention of milk punch in the Song of Solomon v, 1: "I hav churned my wine with my milk; eat, friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O believers." Passing over a number of texts, all showing that wine was regarded as an article of luxury to be freely partaken of by the righteous and withheld from the unrighteous as a punishment, we come to the familiar passage in Isa. lv, 1, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, . . . come buy wine and milk, without money and without price."

In Jer. xxxi, 12, the goodness of the Lord for his provision of wine is to be sung. Wine is placed in the list of blessiugs in Jer. xl, 10, xlviii, 33, and in Dan. i, 5, it is spoken of as "nourishing." God threatens to take away his wine as a punishment, Hosea ii, 8, 9; ix, 2. In Joel i, 5, drunkards and priests and ministers of the altar are commanded to awake and "howl" because the new wine and the drink offering is cut off, but later the howling should cease because "the mountains shall drop down new wine," according to Joel iii, 18. In Amos ix, 14, the Lord commands the making and drinking of wine, or prophetically says, "They shall drink."

The destruction of wine is continually threatened as a punishment (as is also the destruction of corn and oil), and its restoration promised as a blessing. See Mich. vi, 15; Zeph. i, 13; Zech. ix, 17.

In the New Testament the wine business seems to hav been respected. In Luke vii, 33-35, we read that the son of man came drinking, and was pointed out as a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. "Here was his opportunity," says the author, "to condemn the drinking of wine, to speak for that which is now called temperance; but from his lips fell no word of warning; to those gathered about him he said nothing in favor of the great reform which Christians of to-day, falsely assuming to speak in his name, declare finds its sanction and inspiration, its bulwark and tower of defense, in the Bible."

The good Samaritan (Luke x, 34) had a supply of wine with him. Jesus, according to John ii, 3-11, made wine at a feast by miracle to "manifest forth his glory," and when he came again into Cana he repeated the performance (John iv, 46). Finally we come to the passage in 1 Timothy v, 23, "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for the stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." And to show at what complete variance is the Bible with prohibition, Col. ii, 16 is quoted: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days."

List C., covering eight pages, givs passages conditionally condemning the use of wine upon certain occasions by certain persons. Luxe x, 9-11, forbids the priests to drink wine when in the tabernacle; forbids communion wine as well. Num. vi, 3, 20, forbid and permit the drinking of wine. Judges xiii, 4, warns a woman against wine-drinking and the eating of "unclean" things now freely eaten. Prov. xxxi, 4, 5, tells kings and princes not to drink wine lest they forget the law. Eccl. ii, 3, and Isa. v, 11, are quoted with comments that show the inhibition to hav been against excessiv drinking, and verses 8 and 10 show that failure of the vintage was threatened as a punishment, as usual.

In Jer. xxxv, 6, the Rechabites abstained from wine because their father commanded, "Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons forever," but for the same reason they would neither build houses nor sow seed —verses 7, 8, 9, 10. "Is living in a house and planting seed equally wrong with planting vinyards and drinking wine?" queries the author.

Daniel would not drink the king's wine nor eat the king's meat—because it was the king's. He went without wine for "three whole weeks" (Dan. x, 3). Joel iii, 3, speaks of selling a girl for wine; Rom. xiv, 21, says it is not good to eat flesh or drink wine; Eph. v, 18, says, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess;" 1 Timothy iii, 3, says the deacons must not be "given much to wine," or filthy lucre, or lying! 1 Peter iv, 3, speaks of "excess of wine." In conclusion the author says of this list: "The condemnation, where there is any, is of its excessiv use, and especially of its excessiv use by the priests when engaged in the duties of the altar."

List D contains passages which incidentally mention the use of wine and strong drink without condemning or commending them, which "amounts really to the sanction and authorization of their use." Melchizedek, who was priest of the most high God, "brought forth bread and wine" (see Gen. xiv, 18). Lot got very drunk without rebuke, according to Gen. xix, 31-36.

List E is devoted to passages showing that scripture wine did intoxicate. This is largely a repetition of List D. Gen. ix, 21, shows Noah drunk on wine. Lot (Gen. xix, 31-36) was made drunk by his daughters, who apparently knew that Bible wine was intoxicating. About thirty texts are referred to, showing beyond possibility of doubt that the wine of the scriptures was an intoxicating liquor.

It may be well to mention that Mr. Walker is himself a total abstainer and an advocate of the strictest temperance. He simply undertakes to show, and succeeds perfectly, that the claim that the Bible is the great bulwark of temperance is absurdly false. In conclusion he says: "There are but a very few passages, none of which are found in the New Testament, which condemn the use of intoxicants; more than five times as many encourage or enjoin their use; a few condemn the use of wine on stated occasions, by certain persons, or in excess, while a large number of other passages make mention of its use as a matter of course, and with no hint of censure or of its evil effects; and, finally, there is nothing found in the Bible which supports the assumption that Bible wine was not intoxicating."

We heartily commend this pamphlet to the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in this and other places, and to ministers of the gospel who hav imposed upon themselvs or are imposing upon others the notion that the Bible is a temperance book. Ten cents sent to the Truth Seeker Publishing Co., 33 Clinton Place. New York, for "Bible Temperance," by Edwin C. Walker, will bring ten times its worth of information to all who are interested in this prominent modern phase of the temperance question.—Winsted Press.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. Gives cheer and hope to the afflicted by saying and proving that SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., can be cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. No failure in any case.

It is one of Dr. Fellows's valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected. by pad and bandage, which cures by absorption, and which is the only reliable method of curing Seminal Weakness and Loss of Sexual Power.

Send five 2-cent stamps for his book "Private Counselor," telling all about the disease, and the external cure, with evidences of success. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

News of the Week.

PARSON GOODELL returned to his pulpit in Providence last Sunday after an absence of five months, and in a prelude to his sermon declared to a sympathizing congregation his innocence of the scandalous things charged to him.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND is getting better.

DR. MCGLYNN has expressed his determination not to go to Rome.

A STRIKE among coal-handlers has caused a stringency in coal in this vicinity.

IT is reported that the Socialists hav captured all the offices in the Chicago trades assembly.

JUDGE PICKETT, of New Haven, Conn., has fined an employer $50 for blacklisting workmen.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S son, Herbert, has been appointed special agent of the United States treasury.

JOSEPH TOSSO, the man who composed the "Arkansaw Traveler," died at Covington, Ky., last week, aged 85.

FOUR young men hav just suffered the death penalty by hanging in Sydney, New South Wales, for assaulting a servant girl.

TWENTY-SEVEN lives were lost last week by the wrecking of the German ship Elizabeth, near Cape Henry, Va. A dozen or more bodies hav been recovered. Twenty-one of the crew of the Harvey Mills were lost in the foundering of that ship between San Francisco and Seattle, W. T.

BRIG.-GEN. MARVIN LUBE, a Salvation Army warrior, of Pittsfield, Mass., was brought into court the other day charged with threatening to kill his wife.

JOHN ROACH, the shipbuilder, died last Monday of cancer of the tongue similar to that which caused the death of General Grant. Mr. Roach, it is said, never used tobacco.

A MONKEY was the first comer at a leading church in Providence, when it was opened last Sunday for morning service, and there was considerable of a time in getting him out.

A TERRIBLE railroad accident was caused on the 4th by the collision of a passenger and freight train near Tiffin, O. Sixteen passengers were burnt to death by the cars taking fire from a stove.

WARNINGS against the custom of praying and otherwise worrying the Almighty are growing more terrible every day. On Jan. 4th Miss Kate Nicholson, of Maysville, Ky., while preparing to retire at night, knelt in front of the grate to say her prayers. Her clothes caught fire and she was burnt to death.

GEN. W. S. SMITH, the hero of the cavalry charge on Mobile, mct the Rev. Mr. Booth, of Buffalo, on a Niagara Falls train, one day last week, and grabbed him by the throat. The men were separated, but met again, and the general drew a pistol on the clergyman. Peace was again restored by timely interference. General Smith charges Rev. Mr. Booth with ministerial attentions to Mrs. Smith.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK recently seized a big squash in the window of a Harlem clothing store, and charged the owners of the squash with violating the lottery laws. They had offered a gold watch and chain to the customer who should come nearest to guessing the number of seeds in the squash. Justice Welde has decided that the squash has committed no offense, and its owners were dismissed. The squash was returned to them, and four stalwart negroes wrapped it in the Stars and Stripes and bore it back to the store on a litter. A brass band preceded the squash through the streets. The question of the number of seeds has been resumed.

Gems of Thought.

OUR race is as susceptible of improvement as the races of any of the animals below us. If it is found possible to spend time, care, and expense in improving the breeds of horses, cattle, sheep, and swine, is it not vastly more important to hav a care for securing a vigorous, healthful, and long lived progeny?—D. M. Bennett.

THE religious demand of to-day is religious truth, and men who dare speak it. Better that the truth should sever the church than that lies should be told to keep it together. the truth would prove everything that we now hold holy and sacred to be false and base, we must still say, Let us hav the truth!—L. K. Washburn.

To a believer in Christianity nothing seems so like a special act of providence as the preparation made for the coming of Christianity through the preceding events in the history of Greece and Rome. To a believer in Christianity, I say, it seems so. But those who do not believe in Christianity say, "Yes, that is the true account of the matter. Christianity arose from a happy confluence of the Greek and Roman with the Hebrew civilization. This is the source of that excellence you call divine." —Goldwin Smith's Study of History.

THE ability to think is never found except as an ability of animal organization, and the ability is always found higher or lower as the organization is higher or lower. The exercise of this ability varies in childhood, youth, prime, and old age, and is promoted or hindered by climate, food, and mode of life, yet the orthodox maintainers of "soul" require us to believe that the ability to think might be found without animal organization, and might, nay, will exist in dependent of all vital conditions. They contend that what they call the "soul" will liv when the human being has ceased to liv; but they do not explain whether it did liv before the human being began to liv. The orthodox contend that as what they call the elementary substances, taken separately, do not think, therefore man without a "soul" cannot think, and that as man does think he must hav a soul. This argument, if valid at all, goes much too far. A trout thinks, a carp thinks, a rat thinks, a horse thinks, and by parity of reasoning, all these animals should hav immortal souls.—Bradlaugh's Has Man a Soul?

THE spell of sanctity once broken, the Bible once approached, examined, and studied, as other books, an analogous result has followed. The critic has approached tenderly and respectfully, but the approach at all implies an assumption of a right to question the supernatural character of the object of his investigation. Certainty passes into probability, and the difference between certainty and probability is not in degree but in kind. A human witness is substituted for a divine witness, and faith is changed into opinion. The authority of the translation was the first to be shaken. Then variation in the manuscripts destroyed the confidence in the original text. If the original language was miraculously communicated there was a natural presumption that it would be miraculously preserved. It had not been miraculously preserved, and the inference of doubt extended backward on the inspiration.—Froude's Science and Theology.

LET the young student but remember that truth can never contradict itself, and that a vigorous conflict between counter-claims can permanently injure only error. For what fails to survive the tests of truth deserves to fall, even though it lacerate our heart-strings to surrender it up.—Edward Kobber.

I HAV always found that the honest truth of our own mind has a certain attraction in it for every other mind that loves truth honestly.—Carlyle.

DEATH is universal. Rich and poor, young and old, happy and sad, all go down before it and it asks no questions. It does not wait upon your convenience or mine; it does not ask whether it is conferring a boon or wrecking a life; it goes right on, and all the arts of thousands of years hav not disarmed that old foe.—Frothingham's Consolation of Rationalism.

"OH," but they say to me, "you take away immortality." I do not. If we are immortal it is a fact in nature, and we are not indebted to priests for it, nor to Bibles for it, and it cannot be destroyed by unbelief. As long as we love we will hope to liv, and when the one dies that we love we will say, "Oh, that we could meet again!" and whether we do or not it will not be the work of theology. It will be a fact in nature. I would not for my life destroy one star of human hope, but I want it so that when a poor woman rocks the cradle and sings a lullaby to the dimpled darling, she will not be compelled to believe that ninety-nine chances in a hundred she is raising kindling-wood for hell.—Ingersoll.

BE not simply good; be good for something.—Thoreau.

DID NOAH AND FAMILY EAT BUGS AND REPTILS?

Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb hav I given you all things.—Gen. ix, 3.

Odds and Ends.

TENNYSON was once a peerless poet. Now he is a poetless peer.

THE congregation were singing "I would not liv always, I ask not to stay," when lightning struck the church steeple and the scramble began.

ADAM, in Eden's Garden, was by heaven
In restful slumber cast;
Then woke, and lo! a wife was to him given;
That first rest was his last.

A BACHELOR, upon reading that "two lovers will sit up all night with only one chair in the room," said it could not be done, unless one of them sat on the floor. Such ignorance is positivly shameful.

GUS: "I see that the queen has forbidden the admission into the household of Windsor Castle of all newspapers containing reports of the Campbell divorce case." Jack: "Yes, I suppose she thinks they might poison the moral sensibilities of the prince."

THE ministers who oppose the ballet do so upon principles of humanity. It is cruel to expose so many girls of sixty years of age and upward to the draughts of the stage, with such slight protection against lumbago, rheumatism, and sciatica as they wear.

"THE great trouble with you, John, is," said a lady to her husband, who was suffering from the effects of the night before; "you cannot say 'No.' Learn to say 'No,' John, and you will hav fewer headaches. Can you let me hav a little money this morning?" "No," said John, with apparent ease.

THE news editor prepared an article in which he said: "Mr. Dash is hopelessly ill." Before going to press Mr. Dash died, and a hasty alteration was made in the sentence to meet the new condition of affairs. When Mr. Dash's friends read in their paper that "Mr. Dash is hopelessly dead," they were naturally shocked.

THE Salvation Army in Portland, Oregon, held service in the jail there on a recent Sunday; and the leader told such a startling story of his wickedness before he joined the army, that, after the performance was over, one of the convicts said, "The lamp can now be extinguished; the vilest sinner has returned."

DISHEARTENED missionary, returning to his field after years of absence: "Oh, unhappy man, you hav lapsed into error and darkness and paganism again!" Chief heathen, apologetically: "Well, you see, after you went away a Catholic missionary came along and told us the bad place was full of Methodists, and so he scared us into communion; then he went away and a Presbyterian came along and waked us up on regeneration, adoption and election, and we joined his church; then an Episcopalian came and we burnt our Westminsters and stocked up on prayer-books; then he left, and a Baptist landed and walked us into the water and baptized us right, and we'd just about got settled when a New Congregationalist came over and told us that so long as we were heathens we had a dead sure thing of going to heaven; but if we became Christians we had to walk mighty straight or go to the everlasting bonfire. So we ate him up, burnt our Bibles, and resumed business at the old stand. Boys, put the parson in the cage and fat him up for Thanksgiving day."

"I SEE that your brother Moses was arrested in Chicago the other day," he remarked to old Abrahams yesterday. "Vhell, dot doan' signify nothings, does she?" "Yes, but he was charged with arson. That's a serious offense." "Dot doan' amount to shucks! To show you how easy he get oudt of it I haf a letter in my pocket, written two weeks ago, in which he says it vhas all fixed up for his wife to set der place on fire while he vhas off to his lodge. All I hat to do to clear Moses is to send on dot letter."

AN estimable old sheep-raiser of Vermont, though a church-member and a deacon, was sadly addicted to the ardent. He was induced by the reform committee of the local church to take the abstaining pledge, subject only to the sheep-washing periods, during which tasking times it was deemed essential to allow of some stimulant. But matters did not seem to mend with the worthy deacon very much and the committee paid another remonstrating visit after a while, when they found him in a woeful state of intoxication. "You see that 'ere sheep?" he asked, pointing to a dejected looking Cotswold; "that's (hic) cleanest sheep in Vermont; wash him every fifteen minutes."

THE unlucky Tom-tit: A certain Tom-tit, feeling himself somewhat swelled up by the salubriousness of a fine large October morning, thought he would go ahead and puff out his plumage to such an inordinate extent that his fellow-tits would mistake him for an owl; and, scurrying away, afford him much amusement of a refined and intellectual character. His little racket would hav worked all right, had it not happened that, just as he was indulging in the preliminary chuckles over his success in frightening his comrades, a Philadelphia gunner came along, and, mistaking him for a partridge, bowled him over without further ceremony. Moral: This fable teaches that safety does not necessarily lie in insignificance, unless the latter receives the undivided attention of the individual.

Notes and Clippings.

A MAINE clergyman writes to a Portland newspaper to say that his salary has been cut down one-half because he voted for St. John.

A MINISTER may occasionally be carried away with the inspiration of his theme, but he generally gets back in time to take up the collection.

JOHN SWINTON enters his earnest protest against Heury George's stirring up of the Catholic church. Michael Davitt also takes sides against George.

A RELIGIOUS newspaper says that it does not seem to be quite the thing to depend on the profanity of the passengers to keep the street cars hot in these cold days.

OMAHA preachers are struggling with the question whether hell is larger than heaven or not. It is pleasant to note that the question is generally decided in the negativ.

CONSCIENCE is said to be the voice of the soul, but it does not follow that the man whose sole squeaks all the way down the broad aisle has a troublesome conscience.

CHARLES H. MCKENZIE, who died in this city last week, was one of the "noble six hundred" who made the charge of the light brigade at Balaklava, of which Baron Tennyson wrote when he was a poet.

THE most heavily endowed educational institutions in the United States are: Girard College, $10,000,000; Columbia, $5,000,000; Johns Hopkins, $4,000,000; Princeton, $3,500,000; Lehigh, $1,800,000; Cornell, $1,400,000.

LAST week the German Reichstag failed to pass a bill which Bismarck favored, and Bismarck dissolved the parliament and sent the members home. A new election will be had, and if Bismarck is again defeated it is believed that something like a crisis will occur in German affairs.

AUGUST SPIES, the condemned Anarchist, is to be married to Miss Van Zandt, who is said to be an estimable young woman. The general sentiment is that it would be in better taste for Mr. Spies to refrain from taking a wife just now. The prospect is that she would soon be a widow.

A WRITER in one of the Washington Sunday papers calls the attention of the American Bible Society to the fact that he recently sought in vain to find a copy of the Bible in one of our largest federal buildings in the capital of the nation. He wants a few home missionaries sent into this field.

A MAN who delights in calculations contributes this: "If the immortal George Washington, when he was forty-eight years of age, had stepped into a railroad office and pawned his little hatchet for a ticket to the planet Mars, he would at the rate of fifty miles an hour hav arrived there this year."

JUDGE DANIELS, much to the delight of the labor reformers, has recently decided that the "cornering" of food products by monopolists is a conspiracy punishable as a crime. Judge Daniels was a candidate for the Court of Appeals last fall and was defeated by the Labor vote, which, as is charged by John Swinton, was sold out to Peckham by a bargain between the Labor party leaders and the Irving Hall Democrats. Regret is now expressed that labor should hav opposed its friend; but politics seems to be politics the world over, whether it goes under one name or another.

THE Journalist does not giv the name of the hero of the following story, but it cannot be Dr. Buckley, for the Advocate office is nearly two miles from the Alderney Dairy: "The editor of one of the religious weeklies patronized the Alderney Dairy for ten days running last month. At his last visit, he called the waitress to him, drew a large handful of money from his pocket, and remarking, 'You are a very faithful servant, young woman, and shall be rewarded,' put some coin beneath his place. He ate his usual dinner of oatmeal, baked apples, milk and pie, and departed. Tho expectant waitress raised the plate and found two cents!"

IT is strange, says the editor of the Secular Review, what an intimate connection there is between bishops and brewers, how naturally the cathedral runs to drink, and what "beauty of holiness" sits enshrined in the sublime alliteration, Bible and Beer, Gospel and Gin, Lush and Litany! The fact has lately been ascertained that the largest owners of gin-shops and beer-houses in London are its two cathedrals, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. The bishop of London, it is said, in riding from his abode in St. James's square to his official palace at Fulham, passes more than a hundred gin-shops built upon land belonging to the church. A writer in the Examiner says: "Some years ago, after residing three or four months in Scotland, I had occasion to visit several cathedral towns—Norwich, Peterborough, and others. In the North I hardly found a person who could not read and write; in the cathedral towns I found very few who could." According to general testimony, the inhabitants of cathedral towns are exceptionally ignorant and drunken.

CONGRESSMAN GALLAGHAN, of the Pennsylvania legislature, has a queer reason for objecting to prayers in Congress. In the House the other day he made a sensation at the opening session by moving that the custom of opening the House with prayer be dispensed with. He said he did not make the motion because he was opposed to prayer. The legislature proposed to force upon the people a prohibition amendment to the Constitution, which would be an abomination in the sight of God, and it would be little less than sacrilegious to hav the proceedings of a body which proposed this opened with prayer. God had sanctified the use of wine, and it would be an abomination to abolish its use.

SIX coal carrying corporations—the Philadelphia & Reading, the Delaware & Hudson, the New Jersey Central, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, the Lehigh & Wilkesbarre, and the Lake Erie & Western—hav combined to put up the price of coal and to put down the wages of the coal-handlers. These corporations control immense quantities of coal. Recently the coal-handlers hav struck, the coal supply has nearly stopped, and prices are something enormous. This action on the part of the monopolists furnishes to the Socialists a strong support for the argument that the state should own the coal fields, pay handlers living wages, and supply the consumers at the lowest possible rates.

Christian Absurdities.

The money spent in the vain endeavor to get men to heaven would make all comfortable on earth.

The Methodist society in twenty-six years has spent $19,000,000 on missionaries and for missionary purposes; so says the editor of the New York Independent, while right under his nose to-day, in the same city, in four blocks are eight hundred destitute and starving people.

Trinity Church owns $15,000,000 worth of property, and derives an income therefrom of $400,000 a year. Nine million dollars' worth of this property is exempt from taxation. Some of the most disreputable places in the city of New York, according to report, are owned by the Trinity Corporation.

About a year ago a committee was appointed to examine into the condition of tenement houses in the city. In their report, Jan. 6th, Dr. Gunn, chairman of the committee, said that among the tenement classes, Trinity Church had the reputation of being the meanest landlord in the city. He says he found halls covered with filth from overflowed closets. In one instance he found a cellar covered with filth a foot deep, from a broken sewer pipe. Dr. Gunn says it is the policy of the church never to repair a building until no one, however wretched, can live in it. Yet Trinity, like other churches, spends vast sums for missionary purposes.

Oh, how long will the people be deceived! Can not anyone see that the churches are not founded on the principles of humanity? Cannot anyone see that the missionary is not moved by the lofty desire of taking the poor and ignorant by the hand and leading them up to a nobler manhood and a higher civilization, but by the groveling and ignoble device of adding numbers and power to the church? For this the missionary is hired. And yet the Christian must eat the broken body and drink the blood of his savior, and wear a long face, to let you know that his kingdom is not of this world.

Did a long puritanical face ever get anyone to heaven? Do the clanging of bells, and forms and ceremonies, have an upward tendency? Must a man wade through fountains of blood, and be splashed under water, to win a white robe and golden crown? Must a man turn cannibal, and eat the body and drink the blood of a man who died eighteen hundred years ago, in order to be saved? Must a man believe in an old book written by semi-barbarians, abounding in tales and fables, and filled with obscenity and absurdities—with all manner of nastiness and impossibilities—in order to secure a through-ticket to the New Jerusalem?

In order to secure heaven must a man wander through the earth enshrouded in gloom, and look as though he was struck with death? Judged by the sermons of fifty years ago, a smile would send a man to hell, and a dress finer than sack-cloth would cut off a woman's hope of heaven. There was great danger of hell if everything was not as gloomy as the grave.

If it isn't going to be a little cheery in heaven, I don't want to go there. If a little fun on earth is going to send us all to hell, then hoorah for hell, say I. Let us make the most and the best of this life. This, to my mind, is the surest way to stave off hell, and the shortest route to heaven. Let us have a little of the sunshine of life, with smiles and joy and cheerfulness, while we may.

In the broad light of the nineteenth century ought we not now to begin to outgrow their superstition. But the moment you bring a man's superstition under the focus of common sense he begins to stare like a stuck pig. This is partly because he is afraid of hell, and partly because the priest has taught him that common sense will be at a discount in heaven.

Nothing but gold will satisfy the Christian avarice here, and gold is to be the chief attraction in heaven. The streets of the New Jerusalem are to be paved with gold, and he is to have a golden harp. Then he is to have a white robe, and walk over the gold-paved streets, and twang his harp, throughout a never-ending eternity. The Christian declares that this is just to his taste; no change of dress, no change of occupation; never dreaming that this may grow just a little monotonous after fifteen or twenty thousand years. One would think that after one or two hundred thousand centuries he would joyfully glide into the land of forgetfulness just for a change. Jewels and gems and gold would have no attractions for me, and I would much prefer my every-day clothes to white robes. And as for wings, I think they would be terribly in the way when I want to put on my overcoat. I am quite fond of music, but I think the eternal blare of a brass band, or any other kind of music, would become tedious after a while.

What kind of companions would old Abraham and David and Solomon and Joshua make for such men as Emerson, Bryant, and Phillips? Who that has been put through the modern schools of civilization would want to associate with old David and Joshua, splashed all over with human blood?

And then these men to have from fifty so a thousand fancy women, and some of the rest of us not to have any. Queer heaven that! I want to see all the women in heaven, and I want my choice among them all, and then I want to be the choice of the woman who is my choice. And then occasionally—if they could only stop the twang and bang of the harps for a little while—I would like to hear the innocent prattle of lovely children. And then, too, if there is to be anything like a perfect heaven, there must be some courtship going on. It would afford me a thousand times more delight to see a loving couple in some secluded nook making love, with the birds singing over their heads, than to see old David straddling round with his bloody clothes on.

Oh, happy love! where love like this is found!
Oh, heart-felt raptures! bliss beyond compare!
I've paced much this weary mortal round,
And sage experience bids me thus declare:
"If heaven a draught of heavenly pleasure spare,
Our cordial in this melancholy vale,
'Tis when a youthful, loving, modest pair
In others' arms breathe out the tender tale
Beneath the milk-white thorn that scents the ev'ning gale."

"Love rules the court, the camp, the grove,
Love is heaven, and heaven is love,"

Yes, I have an idea to have anything like a tolerable heaven, there must be a great deal of love there: love of wife, love of children, love of friends—that is, if I consent to stay there. And with heaven full of love, whom will such bloody old tyrants as David and Joshua find to fight?

Now because I have no desire for the Christian's heaven, and because I do not fear his hell, he is anxious to have me wafted to the most uncomfortable region that his imagination can paint for all eternity. This may be extremely orthodox, but it is very inhuman. In some states I would be imprisoned. This shows that it is not policy to differ from a Christian. If one is in the state of Delaware or New Jersey, he had better get out before expressing an honest opinion.

The Christian need not wonder that I have no taste for his society, nor any desire for his heaven. If a Christian should go into one of our large cities and open just such a heaven as is described in the New Testament, he could not loop in one out of a thousand, especially if there was a good minstrel troupe on the next block.

How long will the brains of men be muddled with such heavenly (or hellish) nonsense? The idea of divine inspiration, or that God has been in the book business, is exceedingly ridiculous. Still more ridiculous the idea of a class of men once existing who could foretell coming events. But when the statement is made that a man wrote an account of his own death and burial, it would seem that the very hight of absurdity had been reached.

It is well understood by scientists that as we trace back the history of man he descends in the scale of civilization until he reaches a state of brutish ignorance. Hence it is but natural to suppose that the writings of three thousand years ago would be stained more or less with error. If the scientific attainments of that age be considered, it will be no surprise to find the writings of that age marred with the grossest conceptions. We must not wonder at the Mosaic account of creation. It was the nearest approach to science that they could make.

When the last cloud of superstition is dispelled, we shall find that all the Bibles which hav ever been written reflect only the knowledge of the times in which they originated. Not one of the score of books claimed by different peoples as sacred rises above the ignorance and superstition of the age which gave it birth. Not one of them transcends the powers of the human intellect. The belief that those writings originated at the throne of God has had a blinding effect upon the minds of men. Because the chains of superstition forged by these writings must be broken before men can outgrow the ignorance of these so-called sacred writers. And to-day we are struggling to free ourselves from the meshes of ignorance thrown over us three thousand years ago.

There is no system of supernatural religion which will stand the full blaze of reason. Honest historical and strictly scientific tests would sweep them all from the face of the earth. Faithful historical records would show each and every one of them to be of human origin.

The scientific delvers have brushed away the last vestige of the miraculous. Among scientists scarcely a man can be found who is considered sound by strictly orthodox men. The fall of man is not accepted by men of scientific attainments. Mr. Beecher ridicules the idea. Man has occupied millions of years in his ascent from the most brutal savage up to his present condition. His fall has been gradually upward. The plan of salvation must follow the fate of the fall.

Moreover, crucified saviors have been too plenty to give to any one particular significance. The story of Christ agrees so perfectly with the story of the Indian savior, Christna, as to leave no doubt of its borrowed origin. When two stories are told exactly alike, it is reasonable to believe that the one has been copied from the other. If one story is many centuries older than the other, it is evident that the older was not borrowed from the later.

The Freethinker marvels at the stupidity of the Christian. But it should be borne in mind that probably as soon as he could talk he was taught to say his prayers, and the sacredness of the scriptures was firmly impressed upon his mind. Through years of Sabbath-school teaching, and by hundreds of sermons and exhortations, this idea has been ground into his very soul. And then it should be remembered that the constitution of the mind is just as much inherited as the constitution of the body. And according to the rules of heredity, for centuries this idea has been wearing channels into the brain, widening and deepening as the generations have come and gone, until finally men became so blinded by superstition that they tortured and murdered those who differed from them in opinion. Thousands have been hanged for the unmeaning crime of witchcraft, because people had been taught in an old book that they must not suffer a witch to live. The most cruel wars have been waged, and millions have been slain, because Christians believed that the most high God was tickled by blood-letting and throat-cutting. For hundreds of years men were kept in the most besotted ignorance because they believed that the Bible contained all they ought to know. When these things are held up before the followers of the "meek and lowly," they say that Christianity is the handmaid of learning, and that it never persecutes—that it is full of patience and long-suffering, that it upbraideth not, thinketh no evil, is full of love and charity even unto the end.

If this is true, then there was no Christianity in the world for more than a thousand years. Was the Inquisition instituted by some power outside of Christianity? Can what are known as the Dark Ages be attributed to anything but Christianity? During that time were there not the most terrible wars recorded in history, and such tyranny and oppression as the world never saw before? For hundreds of years was it not death, and that by slow torture, to say a word against the church? May the world never see the like again!

I am glad that it is better now; but it is not because the church has reformed, but because she has been crippled; but she longs for her former strength. She still believes that there is no salvation except through blood. Allow her to get God into the Constitution, and to make Christ the supreme ruler of the country, and then see how long it will be before she will go back to her old tricks of making converts by the rack and thumb-screw. Allow me to say to every Liberal in this land that the battle has not been won as long as Christianity gives to men preference, place, and power. Let every man stand upon his mental and moral worth.

When men and women depend upon faith and prayer, and let people die without medical treatment, it shows that Christianity has not lost its blighting grip upon the minds of the people, and that there yet remains much for Liberals to do. When an old feeble woman past eighty is plunged through the ice into the water, when the mercury is below zero, and dies the same day from the exposure; when our asylums are peopled with Christian lunatics; when men and women turn cannibals and eat the body and drink the blood of their savior, it all goes to show that there is yet work for the lovers of freedom to do. Fifty years from now we shall make the Christian as much ashamed of these superstitions as he is now of the fiery hell and infant damnation of fifty years ago.

Fifty years from now religion will consist in doing good and making our fellow-beings happy. To-day all the merit of the Christian religion lies in belief. "He that believeth not shall be damned." No matter about good works; you must believe. A more damnable doctrine was never taught. The Christian is sure he believes, and therefore he is as confident of heaven as though he held a full covenant deed of it, without being troubled about good works.

Now, I want to show the Christian by his own standard, the New Testament, just what his chances of heaven are worth (Mark xvi, 16 to 19): "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that do believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover."

Now, my dear Christian friend, step forward. In addition to a check which will secure for you a crown and a harp, I will give you one hundred dollars for the first lively, healthy, robust devil that you will cast out. If you have never learned anything but plain English, I will give you another hundred dollars if you will utter a few sentences in Greek, Hebrew, or Sanscrit. And if you will handle a good big rattlesnake without mittens you shall be rewarded with his rattles; they will prove a fine accompaniment to your harp. Now, I will take a little strychnine—just what will lay on the point of a small pen-knife—and drop it into a little water. Don't tremble now, because if you take it and pull through all right you will not only escape hell, but will secure heaven. Remember the promise in the New Testament, and down with it; if you have faith like a grain of mustard, there is not the least bit of danger. Webster says that to be sick is to be affected with any kind of disease. Now, most people die of some kind of disease. But why should any one die of disease when the simple laying on of hands would cause one to recover?

Either there are no believers, or else the promise is not worth a penny whistle. Now, Christian, how is it? If you can't heal the sick, you don't believe; you must go to hell sure. Allowing the promise to be good, and that every Christian is a believer, all the doctors' diplomas in America would not be worth a rupee.

Unless these Christians are very great liars, they are praying for my conversion every day. But is there a sane man who believes that any Christian can exhibit these signs any more than I can? Consequently, his chances of heaven can be no better, and I am nothing but a poor Infidel, whose oath would not be taken in a court of justice in some of the states in this Union, and who has been loaded with a thousand Christian curses. JOHN PECK.

Has Christianity Benefited Woman?—II.

But we find woman in the pagan countries of Egypt, Greece, and Rome not only regarded with hat respect and adoration due the weaker sex, but having the opportunity of reaching the highest pinnacle of fame. Minerva occupied as exalted a place in the hearts of these pagans as Hercules. With them woman was considered the social and intellectual equal of man, and instead of motherhood being a curse, the mother was considered the highest type of womanhood. Centuries before Christ was born women sat upon the Egyptian throne. The education and religion of that country were largely in the hands of women. Sibyls wrote the books of "Fate." Hundreds of years before our era women had been accorded as high places as the intellectual arena afforded. Sappho flourished 600 B.C., and so highly was her intellectual endowments considered that Plato assigned her the honors of sage and poet, and familiarly entitled her the "tenth muse." Women occupied places in the philosophical schools and lectured on literary and scientific subjects, the last representativ of which was the ill-fated Hypatia, who was murdered by St. Cyrel and his mob of Christians at Alexandria, A.D. 414.

It is true that in early times women had been subject to barter and sale between their male relations, according to barbaric customs. "But the later Roman (pagan) law having assumed on the theory of natural law the equality of the sexes, control of the persons of women was quite obsolete when Christianity was born. Her situation had become one of great personal liberty and proprietary independence, even when married, and the arbitrary power over her of her male relations or her guardian was reduced to a nullity, while the form of marriage conferred on the husband no superiority." Thus, as a daughter and a wife, she had grown to be honored and recognized as an equal with the son and husband under pagan law.

Sir Henry Maine, speaking of this great liberty of the pagan women, says: "Christianity tended from the very first to narrow this remarkable liberty. No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by the middle Roman law. The expositors of the canon law hav deeply injured civilization. There are many vestiges of a struggle between the secular and ecclesiastical principles, but the canon nearly everywhere prevailed. In some of the French provinces married women of rank, below nobility, obtained all the power of dealing with property which Roman jurisprudence had allowed, and this local law has been largely followed by the code Napoleon. The systems, however, which are least indulgent to married women are invariably those which hav followed the canon law exclusivly, or those which from the lateness of their contact with European civilization hav never had their archaisms weeded out."

When Christianity came into power in the Roman world, Maine says, "again began the sale of women. Christianity held her as unclean and in all respects inferior to man, and during the era which begins modern history the women of dominant races are seen everywhere under various forms of archaic guardianship, and the husband pays a money-price for her." Unlike the polygamist practices of Bible characters, and as was the custom of the early Christians, the pagans of Greece and Rome strictly enjoined monogamy, and to them Christians are indebted for the system of monogamy, and not to the teachings of the Bible. Lecky says in his "European Morals": "The Roman (Pagan) religion was essentially domestic, and it was a main object of the legislator to surround marriage with every circumstance of dignity and solemnity. Monogamy was, from the earliest times, strictly enjoined, and it was one of the great benefits that hav resulted from the expansion of Roman power that it made this type dominant in Europe. In the legends of early Rome we hav ample evidence both of the high moral estimate of women and of their prominence in Roman life. The tragedies of Lucretia and of Virginia display a delicacy of honor, a sense of the supreme excellence of unsullied purity, which no Christian nation could surpass." Hallam says, in his "History of Literature:" "Love with the ancient poets is often tender, and sometimes virtuous, but never accompanied by a sense of deference or inferiority. This elevation of the female sex, through the voluntary submission of the stronger, is a remarkable fact in the philosophical history of Europe. It originated partially in the Teutonic manners. Some hav said the reverence and adoration of the female sex, which has descended to our own times, is the offspring of the Christian dispensation. But until it can be shown that Christianity established any such principle, we must look a little farther down for its origin. Without rejecting the Teutonic influence, we might ascribe more direct efficacy to the favor shown to women in succession to lands, through inheritance, or dower, by the later Roman law."

The early Christians did not look upon marriage with that sanctity that characterized the later Roman and Teutonic nations, but in its grossest forms. Lecky says that marriage under Christian rule was viewed in the most degraded form. The notion of its impurity took many forms, and exercised for some centuries an extremely wide influence over the church. Polygamy was not uncommon among Christians, even down to the eighteenth century. And how could it be otherwise? Believing in a book that teaches polygamy and a God that sanctions it, their lives could not be different than they were. And, strange as it may seem to Christians, the early apostles, nor did Christ, ever say one word against that debasing system. William Ellery Channing, one of America's ablest divines, says: "There is no prohibition of polygamy in the New Testament. It is an indisputable fact that although Christianity was first preached in Asia, which had been from the earliest ages the seat of polygamy, the apostles never denounced it as a crime, and never required their converts to put away all wives but one."

The biography of the popes is almost one continuous recital of licentiousness and crimes against females. For many years the Vatican was nothing but a brothel, and one historian declares that the licentiousness of the clergy had ruined Italy. Justinian was a polygamist and a companion of prostitutes. Charlemagne, who spread Christianity and devastation by fire and sword throughout a large part of Europe, had a harem of nine wives and several concubines. And Louis XV., the "most Christian king," had a harem that cost more than $100,000, and consisted mostly of young girls.

The Protestant critic will say that all this Christianity was not responsible for; that those people were Romanists, and had turned aside from the principles of Christianity. However this may be, they lived lives which were consistent with the teachings of the Bible; nor, as has been shown, can they find that Christ or the apostles ever uttered a word against a plurality of wives. But if Catholics practiced polygamy, Protestants did the same. Sir Wm. Hamilton, in his Discussion of Philosophy and Literature, speaking of Luther and Melancthon says: "They promulgated opinions in favor of polygamy, and went to the extent of vindicating to the spiritual minister the right to private dispensation, and to the temporal magistrate the right of establishing the practice, if he chose, by public law."

On Dec. 19, 1539, at Wittenburg, Luther and Melancthon drew up the famous "Concillium," authorizing Philip of Hesse to hav a plurality of wives. This document bears the names of Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, Dionysius Melander, John Lening, Antony Corvinus, Adrian Kraft, Justus Winther, and Balthasar Raida, nine of the most eminent of the leaders of the Reformation.

Luther advised Henry VIII. to hav a plurality of wives, but by murdering two, and divorcing two others, the founder of the English church avoided it.

John of Leyden established polygamy at Munster, and drove from their homes all those who dare oppose the odius custom, and other Protestants followed his example.

With such a record as this, it ill becomes Christians to point the finger of scorn at the Mormons, and, with the most glaring inconsistency, the Congress of the United States will employ a chaplain to open the business of the day by reading a chapter from a polygamous book, pray to a polygamous god, and then enact a law for the suppression of polygamy in Utah.

Neither did Christians think it necessary to educate women, and too many of them now think that money spent for the higher education of women is thrown away. Less than three hundred years ago a woman was hardly permitted to learn the alphabet, and to learn the multiplication table was overstepping the bounds of propriety; and Luther had the manliness to say that "no gown worse becomes a woman that she should be wise." The most of the Christians are to-day opposed to giving women equal educational privileges with men, setting forth the monstrous and unjust excuses that they are too frail, or that it would make them vain and forgetful of their motherly duties; and these excuses are fortified by passages from St. Paul, "Women should learn in silence with all subjection." Yes, woman is too frail to be the intellectual and political rival of man, but she is not too frail or vain to be his sexual and physical slave. She is not too frail to enter the workshops and factories and help support a family. She is not so frail but Christians will take advantage of her circumstances and employ her for a mere pittance to do labor in mines that the strongest men and mules should do; and the Christian church looks on and says, "'Tis well, she must not be suffered to teach nor usurp authority over man."

The Liberal Club.

It is hoped that the absence from these columns, the past few weeks, of reports of the regular meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club has not led any to believe that those meetings hav been discontinued. Not by any means. Except during vacation, the Liberal Club never suspends. When the final smash of matter and crush of worlds takes place, and "this old hulk we tread shall be a wreck, a slag, a cinder, drifting through the sky without its crew of fools," the president of the club will secure the attendance of some lecturer who makes a specialty of seismic cataclysms and other judgment-day phenomena, and the subject of the recent disturbance will be ably discussed in speeches of ten minutes each. Admission, five cents; ladies and Presbyterians free.

The 429th regular meeting of the club was well attended. The writer of this was present, and having taken a seat, and satisfied himself that the beauties of his new ten-dollar diamond badge-pin were not concealed, he was enabled to make the ensuing observations. He found himself surrounded by a distinguished company. Mr. Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, was seated by the register, near the door. If a man was ever designed for any special purpose, Mr. Eckhard was designed for a treasurer. His substantial structure suggests a granit bank building with burglar-proof vaults. A little way up the aisle Mr. Edward King sat upon the front edge of a chair, this position being necessarily assumed in order that the feet of Mr. King might rest upon the floor. Although still a young man, deep thought has made Mr. King partially bald, but he still remains the favorit orator of the workingmen, and has a walkover among the fair sex. Over against the wall reposed Herr Eckstein, a mysterious individual from the West, who is known to hav set type on the Ironclad Age, and to hav an acquaintance with the Anarchists of Chicago. On the present occasion he wore a look that plainly expressed his dissatisfaction at the mild character of the proceedings. The legal profession was represented by nearly all the Law Committee of the Labor party.

The Chair opened the meeting by expressing regret at the continued absence of the secretary. Dr. Leverson, one of the oldest members of the club, was the orator of the evening, and "The Coming Constitutional Convention" was his subject. He held that there was a science of legislation, which, if understood by all, would make difference of opinion upon law-making unnecessary. This science was the result of a study of all legal experiments since the time when the first law was made of which we hav any historical record. These experiments were first methodized and reduced to a system by Jeremy Bentham. The legal science is almost unknown among our legislators. The first reform which Dr. Leverson would ask the Constitutional Convention to make would be the establishment of the referrendum, as in Switzerland, where all laws are submitted to the people for ratification. Then there should be proportional representation, the method of securing which the speaker described. It is in operation in Denmark. All other desirable reforms would follow from the adoption of the referrendum and proportional representation, and a vast amount of highcockalorum would be gotten rid of. Dr. Leverson is a member of the Law Committee of the Labor party.

Mr. Wakeman announced that he was on the Law Committee of the Labor party and had helped to draft a code which would substantially abolish the legal profession.

Lawyer Searing opened the discussion by invitation. He would hav the Convention inaugurate some measure to limit the time covenants may run on land. At present if land is sold under the covenant that it shall never be used for certain purposes stated in the conveyance, the covenant holds good forever. The conveyance of property by wills and testaments should likewise cease. Mr. Searing is a member of the Law Committee of the Labor party.

Colonel Hinton argued with great earnestness that there should be some provision made to remunerate hired journalists for their services in building up great newspapers. At present newspaper proprietors enjoy the proceeds of other men's lives and brains.

Mr. Sutherland pointed out what he conceived to be the weakness of Dr. Leverson's scheme, and was applauded.

Lawyer Chamberlain said he had a good deal to do with getting up the Constitutional Convention in the way of distributing ballots for it, but he was not sure he had done a good thing. Mr. Chamberlain is a member of the Law Committee of the Labor party.

At this point Dr. Weeks, author of the "Songs of Morning," and Captain Clark, the ancient mariner who has seen a composant, both arose to speak, but the Chair announced that the time had arrived for Dr. Leverson to close the debate, so both were disappointed and the audience doubly so. Dr. Weeks always has something good to say, and Captain Clark, having made observations in all parts of the world, civilized and barbarous, is a valuable addition to the literature of the day.

After Dr. Leverson had cut up his critics in a smooth and unruffled manner, the audience dispersed.

THE SAME PROTRACTED.

The meeting following the one of which the foregoing is an account was addressed by Prof. Thomas Davidson, of Boston, on the subject of coöperation. The professor is one of the most learned of men. He belongs to the Concord School of Philosophy, is a student of the occult, and is able to read and write many dead and most of the living languages. He also speaks Latin with fluency and Greek with safety. What is more important, he has a good command of English.

The usual audience had assembled to hear about "Coöperation." The secretary of the club, it is well known, is treasurer of the Workingwomen's Fair Association, which is now holding a fair to raise money for the purchase of a press to print the labor daily on. The duties of that position prevent the secretary from attending the club, and the minutes of the previous meetings hav not been read for about six weeks. In opening the present meeting the Chair expressed regret at this state of things, and exhorted the members to attend the fair in a body and do what might be done to induce the secretary to return. The Chair would go itself. The man with the badge-pin cannot too highly praise this resolve on the part of the president of the club. The fair is a very attractiv institution, and affords more pleasing young ladies to the square inch than any other place except the Liberal Club. The president's determination to take it in, therefore, needs no further commendation.

Professor Davidson was introduced with appropriate ceremony, and received with applause. Coöperation, said the professor, is simple social justice. It is not Socialism, for Socialism is slavery. It is not Anarchy, for Anarchy is confusion. It has all the good points of both. Its end is Anarchy—that is, the abolition of government, which would come when people became perfect; not before. But Anarchy is an end, not a beginning, and if the Anarchists dealt more in thoughts, and less in words, they would see that free coöperation is the proper thing for them to advocate. Many things are mistaken for coöperation which are not such. Among these are profit-sharing and those so-called coöperativ institutions carried on with borrowed capital, like Godin's enterprise at Guise in France. Coöperation must begin in a small way, and before it can begin people must be educated in its philosophy.

Professor Davidson's lecture was full of interesting remarks, and, as the saying has it, should be heard to be appreciated.

Captain Clark was first on deck. He conceded that the lecturer showed marked ability, but regretted that he could not agree with him. The captain here hoisted a large roll of paper upon the desk, ballasted it with the glass of water which stood conveniently at hand, and otherwise prepared himself for action. He did not believe in coöperation. It was only a substitute for something worse, and bore the same relation to Socialism that varioloid bears to small-pox. "It has been suggested to me," said the captain, "that I should follow the Socialist, Dr. Aveling, about the country, and take the platform with him in the interests of Socialism. I was told that what he would say in favor of Socialism could never do it half so much good as I could accomplish by making an unmitigated ass of myself in opposing it." Captain Clark regarded such language as unjust.

Colonel Hinton said that the previous speaker could not be called a Socialist or a Communist. There was nothing social about him, and he seemed to hav no views in common with the rest of mankind. The reform of our present unjust system, Colonel Hinton thought, would come through the trades-organizations and the Knights of Labor.

Mr. Leavitt noted that the lecturer had ignored the many experiments in coöperation which had already been made. There were Brook Farm, Harmony, Economy, Oneida, the Shakers, and many other coöperativ enterprises on record. All of these were inaugurated by able and earnest men, but not all were successful.

Mr. Henry did not believe in altruism. He believed in thorough selfishness. No man deserved any more rights than he claimed and exercised. If people want more rights than they hav, let them take them.

A stranger, who developed into a strong supporter the theories of Karl Marx, took the floor. We couldn't afford to wait, he said, for coöperation. It was too slow. This speaker delivered himself with a strong German accent. He had bristling hair and whiskers, each particular one of which stood on end in an aggressiv way, and in the midst of which his face looked like a bare spot in a buffalo robe. Why the typical Socialist should consider this the proper way of getting himself up is one of the problems to which an evening's discussion at the club might be profitably devoted. If there is anything in the science of physiognomy, this jack-in-the-box style must hav a deep significance. This is said in all kindness, because it is plain that an orator who appears before an audience looking like an unkempt pirate must plead his case under a prejudice.

Following this lecture, William Snyder, Esq., speaks, Jan. 21st, on "The Land Grant System and Its Abuses;" and on the 28th Dr. R. G. Eccles will present "Evolution, Illustrated by a Flower."

Among the resolutions which the writer of these lines made on New Year's Day was one to the effect that, with divine assistance, he would hereafter report the meetings of this club with regularity. That he will do so with veracity he trusts the reader needs no assurance. Long familiarity with the truth has taught him to prize it highly. His Friday evenings shall be lent to visiting these meetings, and after a few moments spent in interchange of greetings, he will proceed to make a note of all who take the floor, whate'er their name, transcribe the same, and print it as before. Then as a casual line of verse in an agreeable meter ne'er made a story sound the worse, but winds it up the neater, he will henceforth, from time to time, evolve a closing bit of rhyme.

Law and Order.

From the Standard, Henry George, Editor.

The Anarchist cases hav proved that while organized workingmen are as a class in favor of due administration of law, the society-saving class is at heart a lawless class. Spies and his associates were convicted by a jury chosen in a manner so shamelessly illegal that it would be charity to suspect the judge of incompetency.

The accusation was murder by an explosiv thrown by an unknown person between whom and the defendants no connection was shown. The meeting, at which it was thrown, was peaceable and lawful. The mayor so declared it; and although the chief of police agreed with him, hardly was the mayor out of sight when the chief, at the head of a squad of policemen, ordered it to disperse. Then the explosiv was thrown.

The only evidence against the defendants in connection with this meeting was that they were present and that some of them spoke. Yet this jury, many of whom confessed to fixed opinions against the accused, found a verdict of murder.

Upon this the labor organizations, although opposed in opinion to the defendants, raised a fund to vindicate the law. How different the position of the "better classes." No well-informed lawyer can defend the conviction upon legal grounds. Laymen may think the proceeding lawful because outward forms of law were observed, but the lawyers who defend it do so solely on the ground that "Anarchy," and "Communism," and "Socialism" must be stamped out. They concede that it was a mere subterfuge to punish men for opinion's sake, but urge that the opinions are dangerous to society; and when a layman is confronted with the truth that this trial was a legal farce, he falls back upon the same plea. An opinion more dangerous to society than that men who teach unpopular doctrins may be silenced by illegal convictions of infamous crimes could hardly be conceived.

Which then is the law and order class?—the class that demands a lawful trial for victims of popular hate and fear, and out of its slender means contributes to that end, or the class that uses the machinery of the law to mangle the law itself in an endeavor to silence doctrinal adversaries?

Lenses for the Lick Observatory.

The San Francisco Chronicle's San José correspondent writes under date of December 28th:

The crown and flint glasses of the great objectiv of the Lick Observatory arrived safely at the summit of Mount Hamilton at 1 P.M. Monday. The boxes containing the glasses were taken to the south room of the observatory, where a fire had been started hours before to produce the proper temperature. When the covers of the boxes were removed it was found that the glasses had not moved out of place in the slightest degree. The wrappings of cotton flannel, forty yards to each glass, were then carefully cut away, and the glasses brushed and wiped with the utmost delicacy by Mr. Frazer, in accordance with instructions given him by Alvin Clark. This done, the glasses, set on edge on steel rollers, were put in a cast-iron cell inlaid with silver, with a space of six and a half inches between them. This space has eight oval houses for cleaning and ventilation. The next move was to transport the cell, with its valuable attachment, weighing altogether six hundred pounds, to the vault in the north room under the pier which supports the twelve-inch equatorial. Here every precaution had been taken to prevent moisture, and here the glasses will remain until the time comes for mounting them. Investigation shows that neither the flint nor the crown glass had been injured at all. Each was in as good a condition as when it left the hands of the Clarks. Captain Floyd thinks that the observatory will be ready to be turned over to the trustees of the university by the 1st of September.

The Lick observatory, an illustration of which was published in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1886, was built with $750,000 left for that purpose by James Lick, a pronounced Freethinker. The observatory is located at San José, Cal., and is so far advanced in construction as to be ready to receive the monster telescope which it is designed to support. The telescope will be the largest and best ever made. When completed, the observatory is to be connected with the University of San Francisco.

The Privacy of Mail Matter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Permit me through your columns to make an appeal to all Liberals, of whatever name, in reference to the question involved in the following extract taken from the Topeka, Kan., Commonwealth. I am not in a state of health to do the subject justice, but the intelligence of your readers is such they cannot fail to see that it is a question in which we are all interested; for we know not how soon any true Liberal may be called upon to occupy a prison cell.

It seems that E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman object to having their correspondence read by the prison officials, and as a consequence are not allowed to send or receive letters. It makes no difference whether we sanction the course pursued by those parties or not. They are imprisoned for what they believe to be right. So was Bennett; so was Heywood. The question is, Hav prisoners rights that officials are bound to respect? I hope the friends will look into this matter—test this question to its utmost.

Mr. Dodge is stated to be assistant U. S. district Attorney of Cleveland, O. The Commonwealth says:

Mr. Dodge has written an opinion in which, after carefully reviewing the law governing the delivery of the United States mail, he declares that no prison official has the right to open a prisoner's mail, and that any official who does so is liable to fine and imprisonment under the federal statutes. The only law in the Revised Statutes which would seem in any way to apply to the almost universal practice of opening and reading letters addressed to prisoners before delivering them is contained in section 3,892, which provides that "any person who shall take any letter, postal card or packet . . . before it has been delivered to the person to whom it was directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence or pry into the business or secrets of another, or shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy the same, shall for every such offense be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or by both." This provision apparently applies to all letters passing through the mails, and no exception is made in the case of convicts or any other class of persons.

Longmont, Col. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

The "New God."

I like Mr. Putnam's "New God" very well, if he would call it by some other name than "God." In fact, it is now thirty-five years since I hav believed in an "outward God" or an inward God, the highest aspiration in myself and others being my standard, which I would not disgrace by calling it "God."

We hav had too many Gods, most of them very bad ones, too long for a new God—one thus christened, I mean. We may exalt the better life within ourselvs, but for humanity's sake, and progression's sake, let us not call it "God." Let us drop that misnomer, and, if we must worship something, worship ourselvs and others, since the worst of us are better than any God ever made. But I do not believe in worship. A worshiper is a cringing sycophant, a very slave. A venerator, an aspirator, is a noble being.

Hav we not outgrown substitutes? We want nothing in the place of religion. We need no God. All we need is to search out the good within ourselvs and cultivate it. Away with a church of humanity! We want humanity without the church. The church has been cursing humanity for eighteen centuries. Its God, devil, Bible, creed, and priests hav been right in the way of all reform, progress, and philosophy ever since there was a church. Let us not pick up these old fungous words and clothe our new views and reforms with them as Christianity gathered up pagan mythology and wove it into her church of humanity eighteen hundred years ago.

But I forbear. Those readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who see the Freethinkers' Magazine, December number, will find my views on this subject more fully set forth than space can be allotted me for in these pages. ELLA E. GIBSON.

News and Notes.

I came Saturday, January 8th, to the much-flaming city of Pittsburgh. It is almost as brilliant by night as by day. The natural gas is so exuberant that it is kept burning all the time, and Pittsburgh looks like a gay festival city whether the sun shines or not. It is a mighty center of industry, and just now it is quite prosperous. The iron arms are constantly busy, and the glittering molten seas roll into innumerable forms, for the service of this world.

This is the place for the Liberal pioneer band to do its level best, and it does so with Roman Staley, Frank Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Abel, H. H. Timby, Harry Hoover, and others to stand by the flag of the free through thick and thin. I like to sojourn at Pittsburgh. The friends here giv plenty of inspiration for the long task that is before the secretary, for they are full of hope and good cheer. On Sunday afternoon I gave my lecture, "The New God," and all seemed to be thoroughly satisfied with the modern divinity. In the evening I spoke at Allegheny City on "American Democracy." Good audiences were present at each lecture, and besides the lecture quite a number of Freethought books were sold. Our Pittsburgh friends are doing much in this direction. Our best literature is on sale every Sunday, and several hundred books and pamphlets are yearly distributed in the community. This is a useful work for every Liberal society to undertake. A large instrumentality of growth is the well-read book, and if a book is purchased it is pretty sure to be thoroughly perused.

The Pittsburgh corps is about the best disciplined of the divisions of the grand army of Freethought. It has learned much in the school of experience and knows how to adjust its forces for the most valuable results. It wastes no material.

Sunday afternoon I enjoyed the pleasant hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Abel, with Mr. and Mrs. John Meingle, Roman Staley, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Abel are always ready to lend a hand and make the pathway of the Secular pilgrim attractiv. They are among the foremost Liberals of the place. Besides those already mentioned, I was glad to meet among our allies Mrs. Jane Douthitt, L. W. Wickes, Philip and Ed. Baumbach, Mr. Joseph and family, G. R. Griffiths, Thos. Grundy, C. L. Stevens and wife, etc. Countenances, I find, are more familiar than names, and I cannot always remember the designation, but the pleasant greeting and warm wishes are not forgotten.

Monday afternoon I left Pittsburgh for Kent, O. On arriving at Ravenna, O., I found the train for Kent three hours behind time; there was nothing for it but to take a sleigh-ride to Kent. I like sleigh-rides when the weather and the horses are favorable, but this particular sleigh-ride was not very attractiv. It was ten degrees below zero. Old Boreas had a "nipping and an eager air" as he came sweeping over the western Reserve, and the horse was about twenty years old, and he did hate dreadfully to take that cold journey. But he did his work "manfully," when he got down to it; his aged heels perambulated with delightful assiduity over the creaking snow. He seemed to me like Tam O'Shanter's nag, as he went tumbling along into the icy darkness. Good old horse! he brought us safely to the well-lighted hall just in time for the lecture, and I proceeded at once to the platform and warmed myself up with a description of "The New Heaven and Earth," where there will be no belated trains, nor sleigh-rides in the teeth of a northern blast, and the lecture trip of the Freethought pioneer will be a "thing of beauty and a joy forever."

I found Kent quite an agreeable place. There are about fifty subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in the city and vicinity, and this congregation of Liberals makes one feel at home. I gave three lectures, and the audiences were good despite the extremely cold and unpleasant weather. Their reception of Freethought was most cordial and encouraging.

Mr. Marvin Kent, the owner of the hall where the the lectures were given, is one of the wealthiest citizens of the place, and from his family the town received its name. He is a generous supporter of our cause, contributing on this occasion the use of his large and handsome hall for the first two evenings. He is a genial Freethinker, and is popular with all classes. When our friend, T. C. Heighton, was injured and confined to his bed for months, Mr. Kent was wont to tell the Christian deacons what comfort the Infidel took in the midst of his severest sufferings in looking at the picture of Ingersoll instead or praying to God, and the deacons had nothing to say; they saw the point.

Mr. Joseph Heighton and his brother, T. C. Heighton, and Mr. B. F. Conaway are old-time anti-slavery war-horses, and the blood of reform is in them yet. Their Freethought improves with age, and attains youthful energy with advance of years. Mr. Joseph Heighton has done valiant service for freedom with his violin and song. He has put the vim into many a meeting by his cheering music, and I had the pleasure of being aided by it at my last lecture on "The Glory of Infidelity." All the Heightons, men, women, children, and grandchildren, are of the Liberal order, and they make a splendid company in the advance ranks of humanity. I enjoyed their hospitality, and hope to return again to their pleasant homes.

I enjoyed also the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Marsh and Mr. and Mrs. L. G. Reed, who are enthusiastic and devoted Liberals. Among the many other friends I met are Mr. Morgan, Mr. Chapin, Dr. J. A. Morris, Mr. Swan, Chas. Maloney, G. W. Dean, Jas. France, O. F. Stedman and wife, Wm. Firth, Geo. Ferry, etc.; also Mr. Musson, of Magadon, and Marvin Dean, of Ashtabula county, who is ready to go most any distance in order to hear a Freethought lecture. There was quite a gathering of Freethinkers and so the work will go on.

One of our stanch friends, Mr. Joseph Newham, was sick at the time of the lectures, but his interest was as bright as ever, and his contribution and cheering word were sent.

In connection with the Union here they hav a Liberal Library Association, and quite a number of valuable books hav already been purchased and success is assured. The best of our books are thus exerting a constant influence.

Professor Marsh, who preaches in the Universalist church, is quite a Liberal, and is pretty open in the expression of his thought, and he is doing much to aid the Liberal cause. I quite enjoyed his acquaintance, for he is a learned and able man, and there is but little difference in our ideas. I think, however, he is making a mistake in trying to ride two horses going in different directions. No matter how broad-minded a man may be, this is a quite impossible feat, and my friend, Mr. Marsh, must giv up one or the other of the flying steeds. He cannot liberalize the Christian, and he certainly cannot Christianize the Liberal. I guess he will take the Radical course eventually, and if he does, he will make a brilliant advocate of Secularism.

Marius Heighton, secretary of Kent Secular Union, a teacher in one of the schools, has been doing a good work by insisting upon the abolition of Bible-reading in the town schools, and the board of education has sustained him, and a significant victory has thus been attained.

From Kent, on Thursday, January 13th, I take an early morning ride to Earlville, and speed by railroad to Alliance, where I always find good friends. The Smith Sons, George W. Thornberg, Mr. and Mrs. Rockhill, John Kryder, Emil Tanner, Mr. and Mrs. Bailey, Mr. Barkeley Brosius, Mr. and Mrs. Fitzpatrick, and others are always ready to do their best for the traveler. Somehow it is stormy weather every time I come to Alliance. I don't think this is a fair division. I shall keep on trying Alliance until at least once it and the "summer land" coincide. However, I had a good audience in spite of rain and thaw, and my visit was delightful.

I was pleased to meet friends from a distance, Mr. Enoch Wickersham, and Mr. Eli Taylor of East Rochester, and others. There had been acquaintance for many years through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we greeted as old friends. I intend to go to East Rochester on my return, and with these veterans push the campaign for Freethought at that place.

On Friday I came on to Akron, a lively, bright, and advancing city. I found the Buchtel Hotel a pleasant abiding-place. The first Freethinker I met was Wm. Buchtel, the owner of this handsome building, and one of the foremost citizens of Akron. He and his brother, Mr. John Buchtel, and Mr. Shoemaker, another Liberal, hav done more than any others to build up the city. In the afternoon I visited with Wm. Buchtel the various manufacturing works of Akron, and I found them something wonderful in their way. At the Iron shops I met John Jacques, by whose efforts, with those of Mr. J. D. Thomas, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber and activ Liberal, and Mr. Wm. Buchtel, the lecture was given. Mr. Jacques is a veteran Secularist of the English stock, and it was a pleasure to meet so solid a man without a particle of superstition, and his wife equally devoted to "Universal Mental Liberty," upon which subject I lectured. A fair audience was present in the Universalist church, which was kindly given for the occasion. The Universalists present did not seem to be at all disturbed by my radical utterances, and I guess the church will not feel the bad results of the outright Infidelity which for once baptized its elegant adornments.

Akron, with its curious and many-shaped and deft machineries, givs one a glance into the immensity of human life. In one place they manufacture daily hundreds of thousands of ornamental handles, tops, etc., to brushes, coffee-pots, and such things. It takes hardly a second to make these tiny decorations; and away they go in a constant stream all over the world. The way matches are made, and match boxes, is simply a marvel. The machinery seems to hav hands and feet, eyes, and all, and to move with swift intelligence. In the factory at Akron are made each day 57,600,000 matches. What a devil of a time Lucifer must hav of it over our broad land, with these millions of little brimstone torches let loose every day! The Buckeye Machine Company sends forth from its enormous factory one hundred and ten machines each day. It employs eight hundred men, and they work only eight hours a day, and earn from two to three dollars each—according to skill and celerity.

I also visited Buchtel College, founded by John Buchtel. It is a commanding building, in which are some three hundred students. It is under the Universalist regime, and is somewhat of a shining light on the path of Liberalism.

I leave Akron with bright anticipation of work to be done here in the future. The hospitality of Mr. and Mrs William Buchtel and their son, Mr. John Buchtel, and his wife, who is just from Germany to this fair home in America, was delightful. The good cheer and warm greeting of other friends—Mr. Jacques, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Marble, Mr. H. K. Poole, and John Hendrix, of Canton, and others—make up for all lack of fashion and popularity to our cause, and sweeten labor with the light of hope.

I am now railroading it to Columbus, O., where I guess, as my friend Ralston writes me, I shall hav an "excellent meeting, with everything singing off like music."

After Columbus next week I shall be at Piqua, Mechanicsburgh, and Cincinnati, O. On Sunday, Jan. 23d, I shall be at Rome City, Ind; at Linesville, Pa., Jan. 24th, 25th, 26th; at Chicago, Jan. 29th, 30th; at Nekoma, Ill., Feb. 1, 2; at Ft. Madison, Iowa, Feb. 5th, 6th; at Belton, Mo., Feb. 8th; at Brookville, Kan., Feb. 9th, 10th; at Salina, Kan., Feb. 11th, 12th, 13th; at Bavaria, Feb. 14th, 15th; at Fort Dodge, Feb. 20th; Garden City, Feb. 21st, 22d; at Denver, Col., Feb. 27th, March 6th. I expect to be at Los Angeles and Santa Ana, Cal., March 13th and 20th, and at San Diego between these dates. I wish all Liberal friends at these places to note the dates given and do their best to make a success of the campaign there worthy of the Golden State.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. F. C. REYNOLDS will speak in Pittsburgh, Pa., on Sunday, January 30th, before the Secular Union.

SATURDAY night and Sunday, January 8th and 9th, J. E. Remsburg drove twenty miles through a blinding snow storm and delivered four lectures—one at Ai, O., one at Metamora, and two in the Christian church at Berkey. On the previous Sunday he gave two lectures in the Christian church at Waterloo, Ind.

THE Pittsburgh Secular Society will giv a social on the 29th, the anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine, at Brook's academy, Sixth and Liberty streets, at which there will be vocal and instrumental music. The opening address will be at 8 o'clock sharp. All are cordially invited. The committee of arrangements consists of F. A. Pierce, Roman Staley, G. R. Griffiths, E. Baumbach, H. H. Timby.

FRIENDSHIP LIBERAL LEAGUE of Philadelphia will commemorate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, Jan. 30, 1887, with exercises consisting of lectures, vocal, and instrumental music, recitations, etc. At 2:30 and 7:30 P.M. Charles Watts will lecture. Liberals throughout the state are cordially invited to come and enjoy this intellectual feast. Seats free.

THE Liberals of Linesville, Pa., will observe the anniversary of Paine's birth in an extended manner. The services will occupy January 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, and 26th, closing on the latter evening with a grand ball. The ladies of the Linesville Secular Union will also on that evening serve dinner to the guests. Freethinkers from everywhere are cordially invited to attend this meeting. Some of the speakers will be Samuel P. Putnam, C. Watts, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, Samuel P. Brigham, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, and others. G. W. Baldwin is the secretary of the Linesville Union.

The Decline of Religion in High Society.

The Washington Post notes that in some hundred messages and letters of condolence addressed to Mrs. Logan, which hav been published in the papers, only two had any allusions whatever to the supreme being or to the consolations of religion. The two exceptions are by Stephen A. Douglas and Col. John Hay, both of whom said, "May God comfort and sustain you."

Among the friends who omit the invocation are Frances F. Cleveland, Lucretia R. Garfield, Col. Fred Grant and his wife, Mrs. Senator Vorhees, Mrs. General Black, Senators Plumb, Dawes, Edmunds, Hale, Cameron, Conger, Manderson, McMillan, Harrison, Platt, Miller, and Leland Stanford, Governor Oglesby, Generals Sheridan, Sherman, Sickles, Fairchild, Belknap, Miles, Schofield, and Dodge, Governor Rusk, S. S. Cox, Levi P. Morton, Andrew Shuman, Whitelaw Reid, S. B. Elkins, Attorney-General Garland, Mrs. David Davis, Samuel J. Randall, Postmaster-General Vilas, and forty Grand Army posts. Fifty years ago, adds the Post, it would hav been quite impossible for such omissions to hav occurred, and a century ago a message of condolence that lacked the religious element would hav seemed a mockery.

That Orthodox Fraud.

Having received several letters respecting the "Orthodox Fraud," as revealed in the revised Bible, and asking for more specific information to be furnished through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I add the following items, and suggest to those interested in this, to me, very important question, to procure "The Companion to the Revised Old Testament," and "The Companion to the Revised Version of the New Testament," each volume costing about seventy-five cents. Published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York. It can be furnished through THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

"The whole number of English revisers in 1880 amounted to fifty-two (twenty-seven in the Old Testament company and twenty-five in the New Testament company). More than two-thirds belong to the church of England."

The Independents, the Wesleyans, the Baptists, and the Presbyterian churches of Scotland were well represented in the committee. Among these revisers are several of the ablest and soundest biblical scholars of the age, who would be selected by all competent judges as preëminently fitted for the task.

"In 1871, a committee consisting of about thirty members was formed, that fairly represented the biblical scholarship and leading churches and literary institutions of the United States, to coöperate with them in this work of common interest. It was likewise divided into two companies, which met every month in New York (except in July and August). Ex-President Dr. Woolsey, of New Haven, was president of the New Testament company, and Professor Green, in Princeton, N. J., of the Old Testament company." So says the "Companion to the Revised New Testament."

The American committee represented Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, Reformed, Unitarians, Lutherans, and one Friend or Quaker. They were all reverend D.D.'s or professors of colleges and divinity schools, and most, if not all, of them familiar with Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. The names of the English committee are given in the "Companion to the Old Testament." They were over ten years in completing the revision of the New Testament, and fifteen years at the Old. A contract the committees made with the British publishers of the revisions for a portion of the profits furnished the means of defraying their expenses.

The Revision movement originated in resolutions adopted in 1870 in the Upper House of the Canterbury Convocation, a conclave of bishops and dignitaries of the Episcopal church in England. And the "Companion to the Revised Old Testament" says, "Of all religious bodies in English-speaking Christendom this one was the best-fitted to set on foot a work of so much difficulty, delicacy, and importance. But the committee appointed by the convocation was expressly authorized to invite the coöperation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong. Their work, therefore, cannot bear the stamp of a sect or a party, nor is it colored by the views of any particular school." There is much more testimony to the ability and impartial character of the committees, and of the care taken "to select expert biblical scholars, mostly professors of Greek and Hebrew."

The "Companion" also states further in regard to funds for necessary expenses, that they were in part "cheerfully contributed by liberal donors" interested in the enterprise.

But no adequate conception of the character and importance of the work, and of the dilemma of the revisers, can be formed without a careful reading of these Companions.

Lincoln's Religious Belief Similar to Ingersoll's.

The Louisville, Ky., Times of the 25th ult. contains some interesting reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln, by Judge James Madison Nelson, of Nyack, N. Y. The judge, it will be recollected, is a nativ of Clark county, Ky. His father, Thomas Pope Nelson, was the first United States minister to Turkey, and died while a member of Congress from the Winchester (Ky.) district. His great-grandfather was Thomas Nelson, Jr., one of the Virginia signers of the Declaration of Independence. Judge James Madison Nelson went from Kentucky to Illinois, and later to New York, where he has repeatedly been a member of the legislature and prominent in politics. He knew Abraham Lincoln intimately for a quarter of a century, and was often with him at the White House during the trying times of the war. He is an ardent admirer of the "martyr president," and puts on record quite a number of hitherto unpublished anecdotes and incidents in the life of this great man, from his boyhood to his death. Referring to his theological opinions, he says: "In religion, Mr. Lincoln was about of the same belief as Bob Ingersoll, and there is no account of his ever having changed. He went to church a few times with his family while he was president, but so far as I hav been able to find out he remained an unbeliever. I asked him once about his fervent Thanksgiving message and twitted him with being an unbeliever in what was published. 'Oh,' said he, 'that is some of Seward's nonsense and it pleases the fools.' Mr. Lincoln in his younger days wrote a book, which was published, in which he endeavored to prove the fallacy of the plan of salvation and the divinity of Christ." S. R. S.

Brick Pomeroy and Anthony Comstock.

[Last week's TRUTH SEEKER contained a brief mention of the discharge of a Harlem merchant, arrested by Anthony Comstock for offering a gold watch and chain to the person who should guess nearest as to the number of seeds in a squash displayed in his store window. Brick Pomeroy, in his Democrat, made some humorous remarks about the absurdity of the arrest, and these called out a letter from Comstock, which Pomeroy published, and in which Comstock holds that guessing on the number of seeds in a vegetable is certainly gambling, when done for a prize, and asks Mr. Pomeroy to coöperate with him in saving the youth of the country from that utter destruction of the moral character which would inevitably follow guessing at squash seeds, if not suppressed by the strong arm of the law and the powerful opinion of an aroused public. Mr. Pomeroy reads the letter and then blandly remarks:]

We hav no desire to mislead, misstate, or vilify any one who is doing his duty bravely and right into the teeth of the storm, but we do delight in turning a man's head around so he can see a few things that custom helps him to overlook.

Anthony Comstock does not perform his whole duty.

He cites us to the declaration of the Penal Code of the state of New York and its definition of a lottery. Please read the paragraphs to which he calls our attention.

Now then, Mr. Comstock, come with us. Not to the store of a struggling merchant, who has taxes to pay, but to the rendezvous of a class who pay no taxes on their property, and who are not in want!

We will enter this church, the first one we come to. A church fair is in progress. Do you see the hand bills, the signs, the crowds of people going in and out?

They are Christians! They are the ones who back you up in your war against lotteries!

Come to the back part of the room.

Do you see that here are a dozen or more tables? That the wives and sisters and daughters of the deacons of the congregation are proclaiming with all their voice that they hav various articles of goods to be disposed of by LOTTERY!

Do you see the church-members and their children here, all excitement as they wait to see if their ticket, that was bought and paid for, has drawn the doll-baby, the gold cane, the silver watch, the silver flute, the religious organ, or the ungodly piano?

Do you, can you, will you realize that there are more lotteries held each year in the churches, basements of churches, halls and parlors of church people, for religious purposes, that is, to raise funds to help religious societies, than there are for all other purposes?

And yet this is the truth.

Sister Suydam goes about selling 100 tickets at fifty cents each. The prize is a gold watch of the cheap variety. The place is a church. The deacons all urge the boys and girls to buy a ticket.

They are doing more in one night to encourage the lottery business than we do in a year. They teach their children to gamble, then turn them out into the world, educated to the lottery business, and the moment they run in opposition to the church you step in and, as agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice, grab the ones whom your gilded palaces of religion taught to defy and to break the laws.

Dare you tackle the lottery business that is carried on as above stated in churches?

Is it a sin and a crime to run a lottery in a store, a saloon, or a business office, and a virtue to run a similar one in a church?

You know that lotteries are held in churches. You know that the same plan to dispose of something is carried on in church fairs as in stores.

Then why do you not walk into the dens of saints and ply your vocation, the same as you walk into the places of far more honest persons, because they make no pretensions to lip-service piety?

Dare you walk into the church you are a member of and arrest a person who is there defying the law, trampling upon the constitution, and running a gambling school?

Dare you arrest even one member of a Christian church in this city, who in the church and in church service conducts a lottery scheme?

In your hunt for vice, sin, crime, defiance of law, etc., you should enter the churches once in a while.

Impartial administration of the law is what we contend for.

Yours is not an impartial administration of the law. Therefore it is of itself a fraud and a disgrace that the society which defines your duties and pays you for performing is constantly cognizant of, and therefore responsible for.

We will accompany you almost any night to one or more of the church fairs, religious lotteries going on constantly in this city, and will point out to you bald-headed and adept offenders against the law regarding lotteries, if you will dare to arrest and prosecute.

A reply is requested, as the public will condemn you or the editor of this paper, and we desire to know which one is right.

Mrs. Walker's Determination.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of January 8th you make me contradict myself. You say that you gave the notice of Lillian's release from jail on the "authority of Lucifer itself." If you will refer to the issue of November 26th, you will see that I used this language:

So, then, while I ask no one to help me pay the costs that her captors hav charged against Lillian for their trouble in robbing her of her liberty, if she is not soon released, after her infamous sentence of forty-five days has expired, then I propose to raise from my own scanty earnings the money necessary to purchase her redemption from bondage, if she will consent to be thus released.

The following paper, put into my hands by Lillian herself through the prison bars, givs her reasons for thus refusing to be ransomed:

I want the readers of Lucifer and everyone else to distinctly understand that I, and I only, am responsible for the refusal to pay my half of the costs. My father was determined to pay my "ransom," but I was determined that he should not; and finally, after much argument and pleading, I induced him to consent to leave the matter alone until I shall authorize him to purchase my liberty. But that time shall never come. I will never pay, nor allow to be paid, one cent of the costs of this prosecution, even though in default thereof I shall end my life in a prison cell. Let them do their worst; I will never admit that I hav committed a "crime" by acting as I hav done in this union with Mr. Walker, nor will I beg a favor of them. They can keep me imprisoned all my life, they can kill me by inches; but still I scorn and defy them.

One of the county commissioners informed me this morning that they would keep us in jail until the costs were paid, no matter how long that might be. He also informed me that I would be sent to Topeka or Leavenworth to be kept, and that Mr. Walker would be kept here "until the last day, and that until after supper." So our friends need not be surprised if they hear nothing more of us. But we will still be living and as determined as ever. Imprisonment may ruin our health; it cannot daunt our spirits.

My father came this evening with the intention of paying half the costs and taking me back home. But I will not consent to his doing so. He thinks that he will be blamed for not doing his duty, that people will say that he is an unnatural parent, etc. But it is not true; he has done all he possibly could for my comfort. It is I who refuse to pay costs. Anyone who blames him for my remaining in jail is either ignorant of the facts or, to use plain Anglo-Saxon, a liar!

Oskaloosa, Dec. 7, 1886. LILLIAN HARMAN.

The annexed paragraph, clipped from one of our county papers, shows the position of the court, commissioners, and sheriff in regard to the matter:

Sheriff Housh called on us Wednesday. He says the court issued an order for Walker and Lillian Harman to remain in jail until their fine and costs were paid, and he is willing to take care of them until his time is out, and then he will turn them over to his successor.—Meriden Report.

The prison regulations now enforced against these "anti-marriagists," as they are called, are more arbitrary and severe than ever before known in so-called civilized lands, so far as I hav ever heard. Not only are the prisoners forbidden to write for Lucifer and other papers, but for weeks past all letters, and even postal cards, are forbidden to pass to or from them. And to cap the climax, the order now is that no reading matter whatsoever shall be allowed to reach them. No communication is permitted between Edwin and Lillian in the jail, and for several weeks no chance for an airing outside their respectiv cells has been vouchsafed to them.

A hearing of the case was had on appeal before the supreme court of Kansas at Topeka, on Thursday, the 6th inst., but no decision was reached, and it is not probable that a decision will be promulgated before February 1st. Then, if the decision of the lower court is affirmed, it will mean perpetual imprisonment, in default of payment of costs. If the lower court is not sustained, the case will go back on some technicality for another hearing, with a probability of the same result being reached as before. It is true that it is in the power of the supreme bench to set aside the verdict of the lower court, and declare that there was no ground for prosecution, and thus end the case by ordering the prisoners to be released unconditionally; but as all Kansas judges are electiv, it is scarcely to be expected that the members of the supreme bench will in this case so far sink the politician in the jurist as to giv judgment in accordance with the dictates of justice, to say nothing of considerations of humanity.

Considerable space in THE TRUTH SEEKER has been devoted by correspondents to criticisms on Mr. Walker's course in this affair, none of whom seems to hav sensed the real points at issue between us and our persecutors. Not wishing to take up your valuable space with this discussion, I again offer to send to any address, gratis, back numbers of Lucifer, showing just where we stand in this controversy.

Yours for liberty, equality, and fraternity,

M. HARMAN.

Locksley Hall, the Third.

"Locksley Hall, the First," we all know and love. "Locksley Hall, the Second," has already been criticised with great force and justice by THE TRUTH SEEKER. "Locksley Hall, the Third," is a title I want to substitute in place of that given by Mr. Louis Belrose, Jr., to a poem just published by Brentano, at Washington, and modestly called, "To the Poet-Laureate." Perhaps it might still more properly be termed, "Locksley Hall, the Second." It certainly harmonizes admirably with both its predecessors in melody, while it is far in advance of both of them in sentiment, as may be judged from some extracts:

"Let us hush this cry of forward, till ten thousand years are gone,"
Let us stop the stars that, rising, light the night and bring the dawn.

Science moves but slowly, said you; science moves, and turns not back,
Though we love or though we hate it, what she wills must clear the track.

Though the rebel brute within us writhe in anguish at the sight,
Fact is lord of earth and heaven, fact is truth, and truth is right.

Hopes that hung upon a dream are vanishing, and now we weep;
Look! the glorious sun is shining; shall we turn again to sleep?

Courage, aye, and faith, O poet! Still when first the warm wind blows,
Little birds shall nest in England, hedges bloom and bear the rose.

England still has men and maidens fit for love and firm in need;
England still may find salvation, though she lose both crown and creed.

F. M. HOLLAND.

Our London Letter

It is stated as an incident of the late gale that a seaman, who was rescued with others from a wreck on the east coast, gave considerable trouble to his preservers, being loaded with a large Bible, which was fastened to him, with the result that he was dragged through the raging seas head downward into the lifeboat in an unconscious state, and was with difficulty restored. This would appear to be a very near exemplification of that passage in the blessed book stating that "the letter killeth." Doubtless, in after life this man will relate his adventure as a signal instance of being preserved through having a Bible in his possession, and the tale will be served up in the Christian magazines ad libitum. I know a man who declares, and quite believes, that a piece of parchment inclosed in a bag, and worn under his shirt (which he tells me has been blessed by the pope—the parchment, not the shirt) has saved his life on more than one occasion. I only remember one instance he gave, which was when he was fighting in Egypt; a sword gashed his thigh, and he was considerably shocked when I said I failed to see how the mysterious parchment had saved him. He explained that he might probably hav bled to death if he had not been the possessor of such an invaluable treasure. Fetich-worship is quite as widely spread in so-called Christian communities as in heathendom, and I cannot see how people can be so deluded as to subscribe such enormous sums to heathen missions, merely for the purpose of calling the particular object of worship by another name than that which it already bears.

Judging from present appearances, the bulk of the people in this country will be in a state closely allied to lunacy next year; and if all the proposed schemes are carried out; more money will be wasted than was ever known before in the same space of time. The church-house to be built in honor of the occasion, at a cost of £250,000, has met with great opposition from the minor clergy, who, however, do not object to the money being collected if possible, but think that, instead of building with it, a pro rata division should be made amongst themselves, excluding all the wealthy parsons. No doubt, very many other poor people would approve of a similar arrangement, and if the idea was fully carried out there would be an excellent opportunity of seeing the practical working of Socialism for a short time.

During the present year, now rapidly drawing to a close, Freethought has been making fairly steady progress, though it is not always easy to say how much, as Freethinkers are not very well able to carry on their teaching in the style of the salvationists; and we hav no revival meetings, nor missions, to stimulate the undecided ones, and so be able to boast of crowds being converted all at one time. The work is slow, but sure and steady; new lecturers and writers are coming forward, and the opposition, once so persistent, is to a considerable extent abandoned or modified. The will to persecute is probably just as strong, but the means are not so ready at hand as a few years back, and it has been found of late very expensiv and unprofitable work to interfere with the opponents of supernatural creeds. It is a difficult matter to form Freethought societies on a large scale, as the Atheist must necessarily be a Freethinker in every sense of the term, and out of any hundred of them, perhaps no two think alike on all points; and, besides this, the majority of them here prefer reading, or otherwise occupying themselvs in their own homes; and, having no God to pacify by going to his house every now and again, they will only attend a club or lecture just when the inclination may take them, which may be, and often is, very seldom. Efforts will likely be made next year to consolidate as far as possible the Freethought community, and in a twelve months' time there may be some progress to report in this direction.

Wishing you and your readers all prosperity and happiness in the ensuing year,

J. D.

The Golden Age.

A happy dream is haunting still the earth—
In weary hearts it finds its brightest birth—
When all shall be resplendent 'neath the sun,
And the full harvest of man's soul be won;
When Freedom on its mountain hight shall reign
And Wisdom walk upon the laden plain;
When every home shall be a gracious rest,
And plenty to the lips of toil be pressed;
When truth shall be the monarch of the world,
Its stainless banners o'er fair lands unfurled.
Not backward o'er the struggling past we gaze
To find the human soul's sublimest rays;
Not there the picture of the Golden Age,
Though many a splendid deed adorns its page;
Not there the glad fruition of our dream;
We've only glimpses of its bright fore-gleam
In souls heroic, lofty, pure, and wise,
Whose spirits drank the ardor of the skies.
The ever-broadening way of human thought
Still stretches to the goal for which they wrought;
Like stars they shine upon the night of time,
But pour their splendors into day sublime,
That surely comes with golden promis wide,
Breaking and glittering with full-flowing tide.

We are not born to perish like the swine;
To breathe and hope along our narrow line;
To sink at last into a hopeless grave,
And vanish like the glitter of a wave;
In living link we struggle, each with all:
Bound to the race, with it we rise or fall,
And its sublime career is ours to share;
We claim the fruitage of its crowning fair.
Our life is wrought into the gleaming whole;
We touch the glory of the poet's soul;
We paint the picture, carve the statue fine,
And with the Golden Age our spirits shine.
It is a dream; and yet 'tis real, too,
As are the mountains and the bending blue;
All nature is alive with its glad hour;
The boundless future breathes its ample dower
Upon the toil and struggle of to-day;
Each duty flings its clear, prophetic ray,
And joins us to the highest and the best;
We cannot sink—we triumph with the rest.

Weave, then, the golden future of the race
With heart, hand, hope, and all your action's grace;
The Golden Age is more than poet's fire;
'Tis more than happy thought or bright desire;
It is within the humblest deeds we do;
In faithful work the golden strands we view;
Day after day we make the beauty vast
On farm, in shop, where'er our lot is cast.
The iron rail, as well as roses light,
The sturdy blow, as well as music's flight,
Make beautiful the life of coming years,
Giv glory to the dawning day that cheers
Our whole humanity, from least to great,
With every varied talent and estate.
Each hope, each thought, each living heart and brain,
Unfolds the grandeur of the one vast strain.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Religion—Is It Permanent?

The origin of the word "religion" is in dispute, and the definitions of it are as varied as its forms. A comprehensiv definition of it is, adoration of supernatural powers with expectation of benefit. Religion in this sense is universal, and no people hav yet been discovered who were entirely destitute of it. Universality proves that it is congenial to man's nature, but does not insure its continuance. Smoking, drinking, and war are universal, but total abstainers and peace men look for their extinction. Religion has doubtless been in a measure beneficial, but in the light of present knowledge it appears illogical, unnecessary, harmful, and doomed to extinction.

Religion is illogical. It is based on second-hand revelation. Samuel should worship if God speaks to him and demands it, but Thomas does right to demand a message by "direct wire" to himself. This acceptance of other people's revelations is the root of all religious delusion. Education destroys supernatural belief, and logic demands that the observances that arose from and depend upon that belief should be dropped. Holyoake remarks that speaking of a thing lessens the performance; the enthusiasm goes off in words instead of in acts. Merchants and artists might as well meet and glorify trade and art abstractly, singing hymns to commerce and uttering aspirations to beauty, but it is more logical to put the enthusiasm into the world. Knowledge of nature teaches that prayer is illogical, for the course of events is never arbitrarily interfered with. Effect is always preceded by natural cause.

Religion is unnecessary. Men find they can do without it. Its consolations are not effectiv, nor are its restraints heeded by educated people. A sea captain in a storm said: "There is now no hope but to put our trust in God." An old lady exclaimed: "O Lord! has it come to that?" People now trust in human skill and knowledge. God has never asked for adoration, and cannot need it, and the emotion is more effectiv for man's benefit, if practically applied.

Religion is harmful. It gives supernatural explanations, and keeps people from looking into things. It has opposed all progress of science that conflicted with its "revelations." Claiming divine authority, it is necessarily intolerant; and, logically, can kill, persecute, or malign those who ignore its claims. It prevents interest in this world by teaching that "religion is the chief concern of mortals here below." It considers the building of churches more important than the construction of drains; the maintenance of priests of more consequence than the provision of schoolmasters and health officers; the future welfare of the soul of more moment than the present advantage of the body. It inculcates the study of the Hebrew scriptures and Christian gospels and epistles as divine oracles; thus laying the foundation of sectarianism, and wasting intellect upon the rhapsodies and vagaries of the ancient oriental mind, instead of applying it to the opening of nature's secrets for the advantage of man.

Religion is doomed to extinction. It began in ignorance and fear, and declines coincidently with advance in knowledge of nature. The most ignorant and immoral peoples are the most religious. The degree of intelligence is shown by the distance at which God is placed. The supposed nearness of cause to effect corresponds to the education. The savage believes in immediate divine agency, but knowledge discovers ever new links in the chain of causation. The evolution of religion is shown by Max Muller and other writers to progress through herotheism, polytheism, and monotheism to Atheism. Advance in science is coincident with the demand for a natural explanation of the universe. Progress, therefore, demands the abolition of religion, and the analogy of its past course of development points to its extinction.

Religion may continue in name, and we see a great effort now made to interpret it as "morality," "aspiration to the best," "the consideration of man's relation to the universe," thus preserving its existence and vested interests while abandoning its doctrins. But this is not historic religion, nor is it an honest use of the word. As belief in religious doctrins declines, there is evidence of a union of all Christian denominations to combat Rationalism. They no longer can afford to quarrel among themselvs, and too many know their minor distinctions to be false, but a struggle for existence is impending. It therefore behooves Rationalists to assume open and uncompromising hostility to religion and its forms. There will be enough half-way Liberals to remain in the church and reform it from within. But opposition from without is essential to this reform, and all who see the falsity of supernatural religion should act up to their light. The worship of God absorbs a vast amount of thought, emotion, and means that might be directed more profitably to the consideration of the welfare of man. Every lover of humanity should insist that the welfare of man here and now should henceforth be "the chief concern of mortals here below."

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Some New York Vital Statistics.

In 1886, 12,216 marriages were registered in this city, against 11,716 in 1885. Two grooms and six brides were born at sea; 7,425 grooms and only 6,660 brides were foreign born. The American girls got the odd 765 foreign husbands. Of bridegrooms, 209 were colored, and of brides, 200. Nine negroes married white women. Eight Chinamen and one Japanese also took Caucasian brides.

Widowers had better luck than widows. Of widowers, 1,590, and of widows, 1,245 remarried. The men were ahead on third marriages by a score of 92 grooms to 38 brides, and one man was married for the fourth time, and one for the fifth time, with no women to dispute the record. As to the ages of matrimony, these are the figures:

| | Under 20 | 20 to 30 | 30 to 40 | 40 to 50 | 50 to 55 | 55 to 60 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Brides..... | 2,964 | 7,449 | 1,285 | 364 | 54 | 14 |
| Grooms..... | 215 | 8,355 | 2,610 | 782 | 160 | 101 |

The brides now almost disappear from the record. While there were 42 grooms between 60 and 65, there were but 6 brides, and but half that number between 67 and 70, although there were 24 grooms. Only one bride owned up to being over 70. There were 8 grooms between 70 and 80, and two grooms confessed to being between 80 and 90.

There were 37,330 deaths and 31,319 births, against 35,682 deaths and 30,030 births in 1885. Under 5 years of age 16,151 children died. There were 1,466 violent deaths, of which 207 were from drowning and 222 by suicide. Fifty of the suicides were women. The means of suicide were: Stabbing and cutting, 28; hanging, 38; shooting, 63; jumping from hights, 15; drowning, 16; suffocation by gas, 14; poisoning with paris green, 11; with arsenic in other forms, 6; opium, 14; other poisons, 17.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

Protestant Jesuitism.

We hav before called attention to a society existing in this city for the ostensible purpose of protecting and perpetuating the separation of church and state. It is a society with a few correct principles and a lot of bad habits. Its few correct principles are held as the result of reading the constitutional writings of Infidels like Jefferson. Its bad habits hav been formed from too intimate association with Protestant pensioners upon the state. The statement of the society's objects reads well to the ordinary Protestant. But if the society really meant what its secretary says it does, it would adopt the Nine Demands of Liberalism. That is the best document to adopt to protect and perpetuate the separation of church and state.

The society is just now considering a problem of importance to itself, if to no one else. It is this: Shall the society continue as an independent organization, or leave its work to some other society, "such, perhaps, as the Evangelical Alliance."

In his report to the society, in which this proposition is put, the secretary embodies an argument for the work in hand, and adds a short chapter upon state education. The gist of his argument is that things should be left about where they are now—churches should be exempted, chaplains appointed, Sunday laws passed, the Bible should still be read in the schools. He maintains that the Roman Catholic cry that our schools are Godless is "one easily controverted." In considering state education he advocates, as a basis upon which all should unite, the adoption of the formula of the Hebrew rabbis of this city. The state, he thinks, should teach:

"1. The existence of a God.
"2. The responsibility of every human being to God.
"3. The deathlessness of the human soul.
"4. The reality of a spiritual state beyond the grave, in which condition must be determined by character."

If these are the society's ideas of protecting and perpetuating the separation of church and state—that churches should pay no taxes; that chaplains should parade in hypocritical disguise before our legislatures; that Sunday laws shall limit freedom of action one-seventh of the time; that a barbarous and obscene Bible shall be a rule of conduct for our children; that these children shall be taught the existence of something which the wisest admit they know nothing of; that responsibility to this gigantic myth shall be affirmed; that the young mind shall be loaded down by the state with a belief in a deathless soul—what no man ever has proved; that there is a spiritual sphere beyond this life—if all these constitute the society's ideas of separation of church and state, we think the society will do well to leave its work for the Evangelical Alliance to complete. The "spiritual state, in which condition must be determined by character," is heaven and hell; the other basic principles are Christian dogmas. The whole platform is covered deep with sectarianism. The Evangelical Alliance can do no worse, and has, at least, the merit of being honest in its claims. The Alliance does not sail with the Union flag aloft and skull and crossbones in the locker.

Let the people know just what you want, Mr. Plumb, when you ask their support. Jesuitical organizations do not commend themselvs to Americans.

We Urge a Gentleman to Right Himself.

In the last TRUTH SEEKER we expressed a wish coincident with that of the publisher of the Progressiv Age that our esteemed friend, J. M. Jamison, would "use some method to right himself" as to an unwarranted statement he had previously made in that journal concerning THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Jamison evidently thinks that he has done so in the subjoined from the Progressiv Age of January 8th:

"It seems that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has had his feathers ruffled by my statement that THE TRUTH SEEKER had ceased its utterances about the Chicago Anarchists because of loss of subscribers. The publisher of this paper has since come out in a 'pardon' card disowning any responsibility for my criticism on the position of that otherwise able journal, and trusts that I 'will use some method to right myself.' I hav nothing to 'right' on my part, but felt it a duty to do what I could to 'right' the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as many other well-wishers for the Liberal cause hav done to get him 'right side up with care' on the Anarchist question. I dare correct the errors of even Liberal writers, who sometimes misconstrue Freethought liberties into a license to advocate the destruction of society, law, and order under the flimsy pretext of freedom of speech and action, then ask to be acquitted of the legitimate deathly results that flow from such utterances and acts. I hav no patience with such 'crazy thinkers' and writers, that they write in or edit a 'Freethought paper' to the contrary notwithstanding; and the subscriber who refuses to support a publication that advocates the licensing of murder, the destruction of law, order, and society under the guise of 'Freethought,' does not 'only serve to show that the subscriber made a mistake in supposing that he wanted a Freethought paper,' but it shows that such a subscriber has retained his mental balance and is able to distinguish between Freethought and license for evil.

"Of course I hav it not within my power to state whether subscribers in discontinuing THE TRUTH SEEKER informed the publisher of the reasons for discontinuing the same, but I do know that THE TRUTH SEEKER published various communications from subscribers censuring the editor's course in the strongest terms, and expressing sincere regret. Right on the heels of these, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER must hav been very forcibly informed that the management of that journal had taken a hint (before being completely kicked out) by the very sudden cessation of the disturbing feature, for which THE TRUTH SEEKER columns were so soon conspicuous. I do know that I hav received letters commending the position I took and expressing much regret at the course pursued by THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do know that months ago several TRUTH SEEKER subscribers told me that on this account they should stop the paper as soon as the time for which they had paid expired, with the names of whom I did not then charge my mind. If the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER flatters himself that what I say is untrue, let him write to C. Garwood, Box 858, Baltimore, Md., why he stopped his subscription, and at the same time ask what that gentleman knows of his neighbors who were or are also subscribers. James Bayne, of this city, stopped it for the same reason. When the Anarchist aberration has passed off THE TRUTH SEEKER editor's mind, that journal will doubtless again take its once merited position in the front rank of Freethought journals."

Our friend never made a greater mistake in his life than in printing the foregoing. So far from righting himself, he has wronged himself outrageously.

Granting, for the moment, that the writer is correct about Messrs. Garwood and Bayne, we might offset against them many times their number who hav subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER because, as they put it, they wanted to take a paper that defended freedom and was in favor of fair play even for Anarchists. So that were the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER governed in his utterances by the subscription list (evidently Mr. Jamison's idea of an editor's criterion of principles and conduct) the balance would still be in favor of our judgment. But neither of the gentlemen mentioned assigned any such reason as alleged, and one of them gave an entirely different cause for discontinuing. But allowing that these two did refuse to renew because of the Anarchist affair, and multiplying these many times, measuring by the rule of Cash, we are ahead quite a good deal. And if there was any "very sudden cessation of the disturbing feature" conspicuous in our columns, it was not from the cause assigned, but because we had said all that the occasion demanded. Mr. Jamison should recollect Mr. Ingersoll's advice to Liberal editors not to play too much upon one string, however wonderful the music.

In publishing the first statement, without knowing anything whatever as to the facts, Mr. Jamison began wronging himself. The greatest wrong, however, which J. M. Jamison has done to J. M. Jamison is his misrepresentation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which he crowds upon the line beyond which lie the miasmic fields of dishonesty. Mr. Jamison says:

"I hav nothing to right on my part, but felt it a duty to do what I could to right the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER . . . on the Anarchist question."

And then he continues, referring to us:

"I dare correct the errors of even Liberal writers who sometimes misconstrue Freethought liberties into a license to advocate the destruction of society, law, and order, under the flimsy pretext of freedom of speech and action."

Again, and now referring to our contributors as well as the editor:

"I hav no patience with such crazy thinkers and writers, that they write in or edit a Freethought paper to the contrary notwithstanding."

And now the charge is direct:

"And the subscriber who refuses to support a publication that advocates the licensing of murder, the destruction of law, order, and society, under the guise of Freethought, shows that he has retained his mental balance and is able to distinguish between Freethought and license for evil."

These are gentle charges to make—that we hav misconstrued Freethought liberties into license to advocate the destruction of society, the destruction of law, and the destruction of order; and that THE TRUTH SEEKER has advocated the licensing of murder. Upon what foundation do the charges rest? Upon this, and nothing more: There are seven men in Chicago under sentence of death, convicted for what? Because some unknown man at a meeting threw a bomb which killed several policemen. Two of the convicted men were not at the meeting at all, and there was no evidence, except that of one man, which was impeached, says the Chicago Sentinel, beyond all question, to show that any of the convicted men threw or helped to throw the bomb. The judge who sentenced them officially placed this on record. No one knows who threw the bomb; and how can the court hold men as accessories where there is no principal?

We regarded the trial as unfair, because of the clamor of the press; and the conviction unjust, because of insufficient evidence. We said so. That is all we hav done. Since then a good many others hav said so, some of them prominent Liberals, like Charles Watts—surely an unprejudiced person; Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union; E. A. Stevens, chairman of the Executiv Committee of the Union; J. L. Andrew, and dozens of others. We hav conversed on the case with but one Liberal who thought the men should hang, and he had not read the evidence. Our opinion is now the opinion of all the workingmen's organizations of this and almost every other city. Thousands of names of those who are not generally counted as "workingmen," and do not belong to any organization, hav been signed to a petition for a new trial; and even the Municipal Council of Paris and the Council of the Seine hav deemed the matter grave enough to add their entreaties in a petition to the authorities of Illinois, transmitted to the governor by our embassador to France. Surely, in a matter in which so many agree, there is sufficient merit to base an opinion upon.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has put these things before the public many times. He has stated in the clearest way possible in the English language that he is not an Anarchist. He has devoted time and space to showing why the Anarchistic philosophy is all wrong. He has said that if these men had been fairly and convincingly convicted of murder they should meet the penalty. Yet in the face of all this the absurd sentences of Mr. Jamison are written. With him plain words seem to hav no value whatever, and the statement of an opponent, if not beyond his comprehension, certainly never limits his lurid sentences.

We still desire our friend to right himself. And as he seems to be governed in all things by Cash, we will hold out a reward. We will pay him one hundred dollars for every editorial he can find in THE TRUTH SEEKER advocating the destruction of either law, or order, or society; one hundred dollars for every sentence advocating the licensing of murder. If this sum is not large enough to stimulate him to right himself, the reward will be increased. We are determined that Mr. Jamison shall yet do justice to Mr. Jamison.

Labor and Religion.

Writing of the late candidate for mayor of this city, and the Catholic church, the editor of the New York Herald says:

"And now comes a heavy blow to the workingman's organization. From the capitalists and monopolists? Not at all. From Mr. George himself. The practical result of what he says is that a laborer, if he is a Catholic, must giv up his church and his religion as a first step toward the realization of his ideas.

"Well, the Catholics will not do it. We should hav mighty little respect for them if they did do it. No man has a right to ask them to do it. If Mr. George's theory of social life includes renunciation of a man's religion, then the theory is radically wrong, and the great body of his followers will leave him rather than leave their church. All that is as plain as a pikestaff."

The Herald is looking into the wrong end of the glass. A man may be as religious as Torquemada and still accept Mr. George's theories. It is the religion which refuses to yield; which does not allow its votaries to think a new thought, and which is radically wrong. In fact, both Mr George and the Catholic church may be radically wrong, and yet a man has the unbounded right to believe in either.

The Bakers and the Clergy.

The bakers of New York seem to think the clergy govern the city, or at least hav a powerful "pull" with its inhabitants. Bakers' Union No. 1 has issued an appeal to those Sabbath-desecrating gentlemen who earn their living on the Lord's day. The appeal recites that bakers work exceedingly long hours every day; that many of them are compelled to labor on Sunday; that they hav tried to hav Sunday work abolished, to no avail; "therefore," they say, "we appeal to the clergy of this city for assistance, and beseech you, reverend sirs, to do all in your power to hav this grievance abolished within your respectiv parishes. We believe you can do a great deal of good in this matter; and as your duty as clergymen and humanitarians commands you to see that the Sabbath is not desecrated by toil, we feel satisfied that our appeal to you will not be made in vain."

Poor bakers! Do they not know that every clergyman of a wealthy parish is bound to be against them, and that the real humanitarians among the ministers of this city can almost be counted on the fingers of one hand? Do they not know that the doctrin of Christianity to-day is, "Be contented with the position in which it has pleased God to place you," whether that position is the scorching temperature of bakers' cellars or the freezing front-platform of a street-car? Do they really expect the clergy will tell their customers to eat stale bread and dry cake on Monday that the bakers may rest on Sunday? Do they imagin a single clergyman will speak from his pulpit against their long hours, low wages, and bad treatment? Poor unsophisticated bakers, how little you know of the church! If the slaves of the South had waited for the church to free them, they would be cultivating cotton to-day, with slab-sided pietists from Vermont as overseers.

The clergy, like God, help those who help themselves, and the clergy are never the first to begin.

A Historical Statement.

A correspondent from Kansas, in closing a business-letter, says:

"I believe it to the interest of the cause for you to giv a historical statement for and against the existence of Christ in your paper. The proof must be independent of the Bible."

With every disposition in the world to oblige a friend, we cannot comply. Outside of the Bible there is not one word of historical evidence for the existence of Jesus. And, of course, the historians did not say, in so many words, that he did not liv. Perhaps what will best suit our correspondent is the "Revelations of Antichrist," giving the reasons for supposing the Jesus of the gospels to hav been somebody else. It is a work far too voluminous to reprint in these columns.

Editorial Notes.

COLONEL INGERSOLL is lecturing the people in various sections of the country at $100 a night on the wickedness of accumulating riches.—Yonkers Gazette.

The inaccuracy in the above statement is that not one word of it is true.

THE court at Morristown did not reach Mr. Reynolds's case last Tuesday. The report of the grand jury, the calendaring of some civil cases, and the trial of a murderer took precedence of the blasphemer. The case will probably be reached some time next week.

IF Dr. McGlynn could break the alliance between the Tammany Hall end of the Democratic party of this city and the Fifth avenue cathedral, he would be doing the citizens of this city an inestimable benefit, and more to purify politics than the civil-service reformers of two states.

TWO members of the Young Men's Christian Association of Buffalo had a theatrical manager arrested for running his theater on Sunday, and the manager retaliated by having them arrested for running their oil refineries upon the holy Sabbath. It's a poor law that don't apply to more than one person, says the manager.

HENRY WARD BEECHER says that the Anarchists "are as much outside the pale of humanity as the wolf and bear. It is not culpable to exterminate them." The Winsted Press is logical in adding: "Now, according to the theory on which the seven innocent Anarchists of Chicago are condemned to death, if anybody shall hereafter kill an Anarchist it will be the duty of the state to hang Beecher."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Investigator relates that at a prayer-meeting lately held in the prison at Charlestown, the chaplain had much to say upon the influence of the Christian religion in making people moral. He was replied to by one of the convicts, who said he couldn't indorse that statement, as there were more than fifty murderers and man-slaughterers in the prison, every individual of whom was a Christian. The attention of the Catholic priest of the Connecticut state prison is respectfully called to this incident.

A LABOR paper informs the public that the Clerks' and Salesmen's Union of this city will labor to hav the Penal Code amended so that tradesmen arrested repeatedly for violating the Sunday law shall not get off with $1 fines. When the clerk's get to Albany in their endeavor to enforce eighteenth-century Sunday laws they will run against an opposition beside which a stone wall is soft. There are too many interests in this city which object to the enforcement of Sunday laws for them to accomplish their purpose.

OUT in Oshkosh, Wis., the home of our viril Infidel friend George M. Hare, the pastor of the Lutheran church has set up an excommunicating shop in opposition to the Canadian cardinal. Last week the Rev. I. G. Nuetzel preached a sermon on the Knights of Labor, and announced that if any members of his church belonged to the order, they must resign from it or be expelled from the church. The announcement created a great stir among the Lutherans, and it is predicted that the Knights of Labor will lose a large number of members in consequence of the attitude of the church.

IF the fool-killer of Indiana starts out seriously bent on business, a writer in an Indianapolis journal signing himself "Inter Nos" will be in great peril. That anonymous writer pretends to see great significance in our printing a communication without expressing dissent from the sentiments thereof. This Indiana writer must be very young. If we printed our editorial disagreement every time one of our correspondents says something which goes against our own opinion, the two editorial pages would hav to be expanded into four. It seems to us that a great many people are needlessly worrying over the communications of Mr. Slokum's, and the author's identity. A letter lying on our desk says that Si Slokum is James Redpath, and that Mr. Redpath is trying to get up a revolution through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Another says he is Col. R. J. Hinton. These guesses are all wrong, of course. Mr. Redpath is the managing editor of the North American Review—a valuable publication, by the way—and has not written a line for these columns for years. Colonel Hinton is industriously pursuing his career as a journalist, and is engaged upon the large dailies of this city. His sentiments hav never been expressed in these columns except through the pen of George Macdonald in his wonderful reports of the Liberal Club. To quiet the nerves of those who imagin that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is inaugurating a bloody revolution, we will let out an editorial secret concerning Mr. Slokum's communication. It was first taken to John Swinton. The rotund and rosy-faced proprietor of his own paper read it, and said to the waiting writer, "True enough; but I wouldn't print it for five thousand dollars." As Mr. Slokum couldn't raise any more than that sum, he put the article in his pocket and came here. We read so high-priced an article with curiosity, and said to Mr. Slokum that we didn't think he was within several years' travel of correct, but we would print it, which we did, with results almost appalling. If Mr. Slokum's story in the ANNUAL for 1887 creates as much excitement as his communication, we shall gently lead him to the top of the Brooklyn Bridge tower, and push him off.

A MURDERER hanged on the 13th inst. at Norristown left a confession of his crime and a farewell address, of which eighteen pages were devoted to proving the existence of a God. The about-to-be-deceased gentleman expressed his feelings generally in the following pious paragraph: "I stand upon the brink of a never-ending eternity in terrible disgrace, and, barring the sympathy of a few Christian people, absolutely friendless in America. This, though the saddest, is one of the happiest hours of my life. I hav been born again—converted unto God. I am as humble as a little child. I love him and all his people. A voluntary and true repentance and almost unceasing prayers of faith hav carried the forts of Satan by storm, and the victory (which is the gift of God) is mine."

THE daily papers report that the Rev. William M. Gilbert, of the St. James Methodist Episcopal church of Philadelphia, has become a Rationalist. On Sunday, the 9th, he announced to his congregation that he had for some time been uneasy in his mind, and had finally concluded not to preach what he did not believe. He subsequently said to members of his congregation that he did not believe in the divinity of the Bible, and did not know anything about immortality or whether there was a God. Several of the ministers of Philadelphia expressed great surprise at the defection of Mr. Gilbert, although some said it was nothing more than they expected, as Mr. Gilbert had not been sound in his views for some time. Mr. Gilbert is about forty years of age, and has been in the ministry some twenty years. He had held several important charges in Philadelphia, and was appointed to St. James's church at the meeting of the Philadelphia conference in March last.

ON another page we print a communication from Mr. Harman. If that estimable gentleman will refer to Lucifer of Dec. 3, 1886, top of second editorial column, on second page, he will find this paragraph, by Martha Meadows, and reprinted from the Valley Falls Register of even date with Lucifer:

"On this coming Saturday [Dec. 4th] Miss Harman, of the Walker-Harman anti-marriage jail-birds, can walk out of the door of the steel cage, free. Walker cannot walk out for another thirty days. Great is autonomy."

If Mr. Harman, after reading this, will turn to the last column on the first page, and to the third column of the second page of the same issue of Lucifer, he will find that he commented severely upon this letter of Martha Meadows, but nowhere denied that his daughter would be free the next day. The conclusion, then, was natural that Mrs. Walker would be released. We could not know—what it seems Mr. Harman did not know so late as the day before the expiration of his daughter's sentence—that Mrs. Walker would refuse to be liberated.

Information for Book Buyers.

"GOD and His Book" is the heaviest Iconoclastic broadside that has been fired at the Jewish Jehovah and the Bible by any recent English Freethinker. Christians may get angry at it, but their system of religion cannot escape conviction under the powerful indictment drawn by Mr. Ross.

DEMAS BARNES'S "In Search of Summer Breezes in Northern Europe" is a capital narrrativ, and, what is more, is one of the few books of travel that deal honestly with the church and her history. Mr. Barnes finds Christianity to be at the bottom of much of Europe's misery, and has no hesitation in saying so.

THE Freethinkers' Magazine has been removed by Mr. Green from Salamanca to Buffalo, and comes out in larger type and with an engraved cover. T. B. Wakeman's name appears as associate editor. The leading article in the January number is Mr. Ingersoll's Lay Sermon, reprinted from THE TRUTH SEEKER'S pamphlet. Another and exceedingly good article is by A. B. Bradford on Prohibition. The "Woman Soul," by Courtlandt Palmer, heads the literary department. The magazine is greatly improved in appearance, and should be generally found in the families of Freethinkers.

MR. B. R. TUCKER, of Boston, has undertaken the gigantic task of translating the works of P. J. Proudhon, and issuing them in monthly parts of sixty-four pages each. When a volume is finished, they will be rebound for a small sum. Each volume will contain nearly five hundred pages, and there will be not far from fifty volumes. The monthly parts are twenty-five cents each, or three dollars per annum. Mr. Proudhon was the great French Anarchist, and in his works he covered the fields of political economy, sociology, religion, metaphysics, history, literature, and art. For those who like Anarchistic works Mr. Tucker's scheme possesses great advantages, and perhaps he might be induced toward the close of his labors to hasten the work that its completion may come within the compass of an ordinary lifetime. The parts are admirably printed from large new type upon heavy paper, and when a volume is bound it will indeed be handsome. Mr. Tucker's address is box 3,366, Boston, Mass.

Letters from Friends.

ERIE, PA., Jan. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Papa gave me the little book entitled, "Little Lessons for Little Folks." I am ten years old. I hav read it nearly through. I like it very much, and will show it to my playmates. I think it would be good for every little boy to hav such a nice book. I am very fond of reading, and always keep my books clean and tidy. I will write you a longer letter some other time, for I am getting sleepy, as I always go to bed early.

Yours truly, HARRY STORRS.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Jan. 3, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Let me say a word about "A Truth Seeker Around the World." Mrs. Thorpe says it would take a large farm to buy these volumes from her if she could not get more, and I indorse every word she says. It is without exception the best work of its kind in the world, and there is not a Liberal in America who would be without it if he or she knew its value. I tell you we all feel proud of our Liberal library, and we take solid comfort with it, and a more happy, Infidel family is not to be found in America. Wishing you all good health, long life, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cartoons may never die, we all remain yours for the cause of humanity and truth.

MRS. AND MR. WM. THORPE AND FAMILY.

BELLMORE, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," a 32-page pamphlet, by L. R. Smith, lately published by the Truth Seeker Company. It is neatly gotten-up and decidedly the best thing of its length I hav ever read upon this interesting topic. I regard the work as a valuable contribution to Liberal literature, and a hard thing for the disciples of orthodoxy to meet. Some people talk a great deal and say but little. Not so with the author of this work. He is another kind of individual by a large majority. Every word tells. He strikes straight from the shoulder, and his blows are of the sledge-hammer order. His diction is good, his style superb, and his argument unanswerable. Every Liberal in the land should hav a copy of this "little giant" work. L. HEINE.

P.S.—Inclosed find 25 cents, for which send me this amount in "A Lay Sermon." L. H.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Dec. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4—$3 to renew my subscription, 50 cents for a dozen of Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and 25 cents for Dr. Foote's "Hand-Book." I hav taken your paper a year, but I hav been a Freethinker for over twenty years. I was brought up in the Catholic religion, but I am now an Atheist. I like your paper very well; the pictures are good and interesting.

I pass around the works of Voltaire and Volney to my Catholic neighbors. I knew a priest in Louisiana who ran away with $18,000; it was money subscribed for rebuilding a church. He was a very good priest, and everybody had confidence in him. Another one stole $5 from a poor man. I never knew one honest priest. "The Decay of Christian Morality," by L. K. Washburn, is one of the greatest truths about Christianity ever told. CHARLES LAMBERT.

GARRETT, KAN., Dec. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months from Jan. 1st.

I hav thought for some time of suggesting to you to giv us in THE TRUTH SEEKER a compilation of the doleful and damaging (to Christianity) remarks made by Christian divines and eminent Christian writers who, after having made thorough research into Christian lore and history, hav been compelled to deplore its weaknesses and failures to sustain itself on firm and tenable grounds.

I hav occasionally run across a saying of a Christian writer like the Rev. Albert Barnes, who, it was said, after he had spent many years writing commentaries and works on the Bible, remarked that the matter looked very dark, or words to that effect. I think a chapter of such admissions, and telling where they can be found, from different divines (I think there are a number of them extant), would be a good missionary document. CHARLES GREGG.

[If Mr. Gregg will collect the "doleful remarks," we will cheerfully print them.—ED. T. S.]

NEWPORT, ME., Jan. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want the rich Infidels, Liberals, and Spiritualists to donate one hundred dollars to put in pamphlet form the lecture of S. P. Putnam printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER entitled "The New God." But few workingmen hav read more than I hav in the last forty years, and I can truly say I hav never been so completely electrified and had every drop of my blood so stirred to healthy action, as by reading that sermon.

Are there no others but the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that are to read that grand and able production? Must it lie unread except by comparativly a few, when millions ought to read it?

The world will not progress until it gets a "new God." Every crime that has been committed for thousands of years can be charged to the Christians' Bible God.

No person in the world will know my feelings when I was reading that immensely important sermon. I cried out from the depths of my soul, "Oh, why hav I not the means to send out a million copies of that sermon to open the eyes of the people that they may become free men and women, and be no longer slaves to a blasting, enslaving, degrading belief in an inhuman, monster God?" It ought to be put in cheap pamphlet form and scattered by hundreds of thousands. Never did, nor never will, the people progress and grow into noble men and women, instead of Christians, until the God worshiped by Christians is dead. He has ever stood directly across the highway of life, and prevented the onward march of freedom.

In every grand and noble effort made by reformers to better the world God has stepped on the track, determined to block the way, and only by an immense amount of hard work has he been dragged off. But go he must; die he shall, that humanity may liv. SEWARD MITCHELL.

[Mr. Putnam's lecture, "The New God," will be printed in a neat pamphlet at once, selling for 10 cents. Orders will be filled as soon as the pamphlet is out.—ED. T. S.]

ANSONIA, CONN., Jan. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Reynolds's article in the last TRUTH SEEKER deserves the attention of all Liberals. By all means let us hav a Mutual Aid Association. It will unite and hold Liberals together as nothing else can.

At the last meeting of our local society here the subject was brought up, and without exception all present were in favor of it.

Let every local organization discuss the matter at their meetings. The different views of Liberals can thus be obtained, and at the same time an idea can be formed of the number of persons we can depend upon to join us.

The subject should be thoroughly discussed in the various Freethought journals, and Liberals should present the matter to all their friends who hold Liberal views. There is no reason why a solid and powerful association cannot be formed very soon.

Some of our members think there should be a death benefit, but none for sickness, while others think there should be both.

Let every Liberal make such suggestions as he or she thinks proper. We want all the information we can get. Let us hear from Liberals. GEO. G. GROWER.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS, Jan. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In "Mixed Pickles," December 25th, Si Slokum asks who wrote the lines: "What mortals think they know of God," etc. I hav a few verses I wrote several years ago, and came very near getting in jail for it at Fayette, Mo. Here they are:

What mortals waste through fear of God,
If half was rightly used,
'Twould rend the bands that bind man's brains
For centuries abused.

What mortals think they know of God
A million tomes rehearse.
What mortals do not know of God
O'erflows the universe.

Away with church and Bible Gods,
Make mortals free to speak;
Teach them not under priestly robes
To heaven they can sneak.

Mortals, fear not this fabled god,
But make a god that acts
In harmony with the men and times,
And not with Bible facts.

Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! It reaches me on Monday—I get it from a newsdealer. I don't belong to the Secular Union, for I don't stay in one place long enough. I was a Knight of Labor, but came to the conclusion that Mr. Powderly was working in the interest of the church too much. He is a Catholic, and has not been excommunicated. His orders concerning the Anarchists shook my faith, and I withdrew. I will be subject to no political or church man. I was born in exile in Siberia, and you can judge whether I am posted on slavery or not. A STRANGER.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 4, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Having seen in our latest TRUTH SEEKER extracts from Tennyson's remarkable effort in verse, instructing the Johnny Bull aristocracy, in a sort of circumlocutory way, how to mismanage their national affairs, I was mightily impressed with the notion that many tons of better poetry than Tennyson's went every day into somebody's waste-basket. Alas! poor Tennyson! too much monarchy hath made thee mad. Tennyson should write, like your humble servant, expressly for the waste-basket. For instance, like this:

U. S. RELIGION RUNNING WILD.

What sottish priest can't easily tell
His oft-told tale of heaven and hell?
And prove it in a miuute?
Enough at least to satisfy
The mob that always linger by
T'invest their money in it.

When Jones attends the "Holy Fair,"
The rabble run from everywhere,
Surround him in a minute;
As Sammy flings his logic down,
Their godly yells distract the town.
Sam smiles. There's money in it.

When Brooklyn's foul-tongued apish clown
Performs his antics up and down,
Where fashion's dupes assemble,
He gyrates glib, with ardent soul,
Their madd'ning shouts surpass control,
While roof and rafter tremble.

His ghoulish gaze, his mocking face,
His nine-inch smile and wild grimace,
Cause some of them to wonder.
He sees their fix, he's there in time
To turn the scale. O God sublime!
They shake the house like thunder.

Alas! and did their savior bleed
To giv us all a side-show creed,
To humor Jones and Talmage?
Far better had their God not died.
Had these two cranks been crucified,
There had been little damage.

Now, Mr. Editor, if by any possible miracle these verses should receive favorable notice, I will send my paper containing them to a special Christian friend of mine in Arkansas. I lived there twenty years. They want nothing sentimental. The more uncouth and illiterate the more easily they understand it, and the better they like it. All their great men, poets, statesmen, preachers, politicians, vigilance committees, etc., etc., like mighty easy "readin'."

Yours straight, NELSON HUNT.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: At the meeting of the Newark Liberal League yesterday, Mr. T. B. Wakeman delivered his very able and interesting lecture on "The Scientific Conception of God." The hall was well filled, although the day was stormy. A discussion followed. Other exercises consisted of a reading entitled, "Trying to Convert an Infidel" (from "Peck's Bad Boy"), by Mr. John G. Hunter; the singing of two Secular songs by the audience, and announcements, among which the chairman said that Chas. B. Reynolds would lecture on the next Sunday, and spoke of his trial at Morristown, advising any that could to be present on that occasion.

Since the opening of our lectures in September, we hav had lecturers and lectures about as follows: Henry Nichols, on "Monastic Communism;" J. L. Andrew, "Liberty and Law;" Dr. J. K. Bailey, "Mistakes of Materialism," and a second Sunday on "Immortality; or, The Psychic Powers of Man;" Wm. Hanson, first on "Prohibition Unconstitutional," second Sunday in a discussion on the same subject, worded a little differently, with Dr. E. V. Wright, each occupying fifteen minutes alternately, covering ninety minutes, to a crowded house; Mr. Chas. B. Reynolds, on "What the Bible Really Teaches;" L. K. Washburn, "Criticisms of the Christian Church;" Dr. T. L. Brown, on "Some of the Things and Laws of This Life;" Nelson Gates, "Is the Will Free?" Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, "Reminiscences of the Anti-Slavery Movement;" Dr. Robert A. Gunn, "Truth About Alcohol," and Wm. Hanson on the two Sundays just previous to last, making criticisms on Henry George's theories.

On January 2d occurred our election of officers. Our nomination and election was conducted entirely by ballot. Mr. C. A. Marshall was chosen president; Mr. Geo. Gillin, vice-president; Miss Cora J. Marshall, secretary; Mr. Armand Pionnie, treasurer, and Messrs. H. G. Avery, D. H. S. Holmes, Douglas Withial, and W. W. Morris, council.

Our arrangements are nearly complete for lectures ahead until February. Besides Mr. Reynolds, we shall hav Mr. Wakeman in three lectures; Dr. Gunn, on "Land Taxation;" Samuel Gompers, "Various Phases of the Labor Movement," and James Caffrey, on the "False Teachings of the Liberal Church and the True Teachings of the Christian Church." Our ninth anniversary occurs on the 31st of this month.

GUS.

PROVIDENCE, Dec. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish you a happy New Year, and to do what little I can to make it so I send you three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1887. Please send the ANNUAL as soon as it is issued.

A moral simoon has just swept over this city in the form of a church scandal, and it will be many a day before we will be able to get rid of its evil influences. A minister's wife sues for a divorce upon the ground of adultery. The usual ministerial defense which is in use in such cases was set up, namely, to incriminate some one else, which generally suits the church so long as the parson escapes, and it makes no difference who has to suffer. In this case it was the minister's wife, the one he had sworn to love and cherish, the mother his children, and the last one whose reputation any gentleman, even if he makes no profession of religion, should wish to destroy. But he nor the church had any pity or forgivness in their hearts, so they sacrificed her in hopes to save him. The evidence offered was of the most filthy character, but was intently listened to by the hundreds of females (I will not say ladies), most of whom were members of the three Methodist churches where the minister had held forth during his several years' residence in this city.

The case was held for advisement, and probably will be dismissed, as we hav no judges but those that sympathize with that great moral humbug commonly called religion.

I am sorry to see that you hav so many delinquents upon your books, and hope they may feel it their duty to pay up, even if they hav to go without something else; but I find that most of the Freethinkers are not millionaires, consequently they don't hav much spare change; in fact, most of them help support a superstition half of their lives, which keeps them poor, so that when they get their eyes open to the truth they hav but little money left, and are too old to lay any more away for themselvs or their children, or to spend for luxuries. L. L. NORTHUP.

NEWBURG, N.Y., Jan. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER most of the time since its commencement in Paris, Ill., and perceiving that all of your correspondents hav been literary persons and professors of some kind, and being myself unfortunately only a working man and an untutored pagan, I hav through diffidence refrained from writing until now. I shall make the attempt to giv you a few items of information from this section of the Christians' country, and the more so as I very seldom see in your "Letters from Friends" any correspondence from Orange county, N.Y., although there are said to be many Infidels in Port Jervis, some in Middletown, Goshen and Sloatsburgy.

Newburg, with a population of 20,000 and some fifteen churches, has about one Freethinker (an earnest one) to every church, not counting in any of the members of the small Unitarian congregation, as they are only partially free, and as much inclined to bow the head and worship as the orthodox sects.

THE TRUTH SEEKER was formerly kept on sale at Fielding's, but for the past three or four years at Sansbury's news-store on Broadway, where I buy it regulary every Saturday, and could not exist without it—mostly from the force of habit, I suppose, as there are six or eight other Freethinkers who seem to liv without it, which to me is a mystery.

Of course THE TRUTH SEEKER, as its name implies, is intended primarily for those who are seeking for, but hav not yet found, the truth; but yet there is also much outside of the general information of importance to all who take a lively interest in the advance of Liberal ideas, to interest the advanced thinker and profound reasoner, or one who has progressed beyond the mere setting-up of the myth or mark for the pastime of knocking it down again and again, when the real evil is constantly confronting us and demanding all of our energies to combat it. In the last TRUTH SEEKER, more than in any previous number, is the supreme evil described—first on page 19, by S. P. Putnam, the last half of the first column of said page—and is that malevolent power in nature ever at war with the happiness of man. It may occasionally appear to let up for an instant, as the rackers in the Inquisition after racking the victim would sandwich in a little benevolence only to fortify the victim for fresh torture. So with the infernal power in nature, so admirably described by Cicero, "On the Nature of the Gods," liber 3; by Hume in "Dialogues on Natural Religion," chap. x-xi; by Lucian in "Jupiter Tragedian;" and also by Heston on first and last pages of TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 8th.

H. SPENCER CLARKE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will find herewith $3 for another year of truth-seeking on my part. I never really knew that life was worth living before I came across your paper. I now wish to do a little indorsing:

First, I want to indorse every editorial note I hav yet read in THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially the position held by our editor on the Chicago trial (or rather mock trial). Let those who consider these seven men assassins read their speeches to the court. These speeches are published in pamphlet form.

Next, I want to vote for the cartoons. I believe this to be one of the most popular and effectiv methods of reaching the public mind. If my brother is in the mud, and I try to rescue, him I expect to soil my clothes; but I hope I will never become so awfully refined that, to keep my mental hands clean, I would allow a fellow-mortal to perish in the slough of ignorance.

Now, last, but not least, I want to say a word for our Children's Corner. I am pleased with its management, and can say to the children (large and small), You—that is, we—ought to appreciate so good a friend as Miss Wixon. I know she is good, for I hav seen her. Yes, I had the pleasure of meeting her at her home, in Fall River, last October. I wish the world was full of just such people, who can love and work for the enlightenment of our children.

The Goodell scandal has been settled at last. The Supreme Court of the state found him guilty, and the ecclesiastical conference unanimously declared him innocent. This is explained by one of the Christians. He says two non-praying judges could not be expected to get at the truth as surely as these eight God-ordained prayerful parsons. About a year ago I met Goodell in discussion. He gave me a book to read, and I gave him one or two TRUTH SEEKERS. He says, "Who is this Macdonald? Who ever heard of him? Look at our great Bishop So-and-so," etc. I asked him if Jesus Christ was very popular in his time. Before I left his house he expressed regret at having met me. I understand he is to preach next Sunday from the text, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." That ought to clear him.

W. P. BLYTHE.

LAKE CITY, IA., JAN. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is rather amusing to read Mr. J. G. Malcolm's articles in your late papers, and see with what ease he starts the wheels of our government to running so nice and smooth, without ever jumping a cog or making a single crack; and then how nicely he fences before anyone can strike back. I presume everything appears as clear as mud to Mr. Malcolm. It puts me in mind of building a perpetual motion in my younger days. It was a nice affair, I tell you, until I set it up for business, and then it had just one little fault—the "cussed" thing would not work; and I feel quite positiv the same is true of Mr. Malcolm's land theory, or theory of taxing land only, to raise all taxes required to carry on the government. Though he has not told us (that I hav observed) how a people expect to get possession of the lands of the United States that other people hav honestly bought and paid for, if he expects the owners of property to giv it up to others for the asking, I think he will find he is barking up the wrong sapling. I am an old man, and hav as much of the love of human kindness as the average of men, but if any man was to undertake to enter onto my premises and take forcible possession without paying me the last dollar my property had cost me in solid, hard labor and money, I should be very apt to send him to his long happy hunting-ground. But, says one, the government is going to pay for all these lands. Well, pray, who is the government? The people, of course. Then we are to be taxed for our own lands. Sublime thought! No, there is not a government on the earth able to buy the lands and their improvements; and the improvements would hav to go with the lands, as they would be worthless after a farm was broken up. It is said the most essential part in cooking a hare is to catch it first. Now, will Mr. Malcolm tell us how he expects to catch his hare? I think I am safe in predicting that any man starting out in the next presidential contest with such wild notions on the land question as Mr. Malcolm or Mr. Henry George advocates will be left so far in the background that he will swear after election that he never thought of running for the presidency at all. Mr. Malcolm appears to be a smart man, but if all that he does not know in righting the apparent wrongs of the country was put in one book, I think it would be a large one. As for his money system, I hav nothing to say, only it looks well on paper. I could tell much better after seeing it put into operation. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, and may that good fellow Heston liv forever and die fat.

J. L. TOMPKINS.

BARRE, MASS., Jan. 10, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to congratulate you on your "Happy New Year to All" cartoon. "The Freethought era" opens up grand in THE TRUTH SEEKER for 287 with such a glowing frontispiece to herald it in. I think we ought to get up a donation for Watson Heston, who, I hear, is not in good health, and has a family to provide for. Come, friends, what say you to it? I cannot do much, but I will do a little.

The Christians hav had their week of prayer, and are booming revivals with their usual winter ferocity. Sam Jones and Sam Small were booked for Boston. Am not sure as to the arrival. Andover is now breathing more freely, and the high pressure being removed from Parson Downs's church by the case being non-suited, the curly-haired, fiery-headed, would-be-still-continued preacher must look elsewhere for the $6,000 back salary that he so energetically and hopefully sued for. And here is more interesting religious intelligence from the vicinity of the Hub:

St. Stephen's Catholic church, South Framingham, Mass., by dint of great exertion on the part of its pastor, Father Cullen, has just succeeded in obtaining the necessary amount of money to purchase a bell, and on Sunday, December 12th, six of the holy fathers assembled to "bless" the sacred piece of metal. The ceremonies were ridiculous in the extreme, and the services truly blasphemous were there any god to take note of the proceedings. Said Father Cummings: "The blessing of this bell will impart sanctity in your midst, as from this day forth it will be a sacred thing. Our Lord left us the seven sacraments. . . . By the blessing of this bell it will bring to us certain spiritual and material blessings. It will send out rapturous praises to God, and it becomes the Angelus bell of the parish, and when the funeral train leaves the church, it will toll mournfully and remind you to pray for the dead. It will speak in tones of thunder to the sinner, and it will be a great alarm bell warning men of their forgetfulness to God. This bell is the symbol of the presence of God within this church. The knowledge of God is the only thing that touches the heart of man."

Now, please, what kind of talk is this, right here in enlightened Massachusetts—"pray for the dead!" Ought not such lies, followed by receiving money for such prayers, be an indictable offense for obtaining money under false pretenses?

After the sermon and chanting by the choir, "the ceremony of blessing the bell took place, by Archbishop Williams first washing it with the oil of the dead, and then anointing it with chrism." In the consecration the bell was named "Thomas."

Friends, I hav no language wherewith to express my sadness over such mummery. "Rum, Romanism, and rebellion," and the worst, Romanism!

ELLA E. GIBSON.

KENT, O., Jan. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There seem to be various opinions as to the actual meaning of "free press, free speech," etc., and I wish to giv my opinion—not thinking that anything I can say is going to settle the question, but we get new ideas from each other.

My view is that no such rights or privileges hav ever been, or should be, given man as absolute and unrestricted liberty of speech or press. By the law of nature, we are restricted in everything we do, say, or hav. The birds of the air and beasts of the forest are one and all restricted in their liberties and hav to battle for life with every enemy that surrounds them—must giv battle to the elements, must search and fight for their everyday food. So with man. We are surrounded from without and within with enemies that we must conquer or make a failure of life. We receive our help and education from many sources, not alone from the wisdom of others as taught us in childhood, but can complete our studies only as we learn daily from the school of life those ennobling thoughts that really finish our scholarship on earth. It is from this source that we learn of ourselvs, of man as a whole. No one can know just how to do, to act, to speak, or conduct himself properly, honorably, or justifiably without curtailing his natural desires for doing and thinking wrong. To do this he must bring in the aid of the better and more deliberate judgment and reason it is the privilege of everyone to possess. Happiness should be the most eagerly sought after; envy, the most shunned. The two are antagonistic, and cannot both occupy the same heart at once. In seeking happiness, we cannot envy our neighbors their wealth, their office, their influence, or anything they rightfully possess. We should not attempt to pull others down to build ourselvs up; in doing so, we shall fall beneath their ruins.

It has been said, "The pen of influence is mightier than the sword of battle." This being true, we should guard both tongue and pen, that we shall not deprive others of the liberty and happiness we ourselvs are striving to obtain. A word once spoken can never be recalled. Many a poor man or woman has nought but his or her good name or character to boast of and to make him or her happy. Many a poor girl has been driven to ruin by a slanderous pen or tongue. Many a man has failed in business simply from slanderous reports regarding his financial inabilities. Even the truth should not be uttered at all times.

Every man woman, and child should be protected in their inherent rights to liberty, and no one by tongue or pen should undertake to deprive them of such.

There are many kinds of happiness besides individual happiness. There is happiness of community, of state, of countries and nations, wherein many are happy. Where the majority are happy in any state or nation, the laws by which such are made happy must be the best for all.

Envy is the hideous monster that would break the law of reason, chain the pen of justice, and turn loose the fiends of destruction, only to satisfy the frenzied cravings of desire. It is the duty of every countryman to stand by his country, of every father to stand by his child. He that would sell the prattle of his child is worse than a brute, and deserves not the name of man, much less to use pen or tongue to destroy the happy homes of millions of old and young who are associated together under one government.

Let everyone look to the law of justice, search well into the deep recesses of reason, before trying to pull down the strong to build up the weak. Generals are as essential to conduct an army as privates are to do the fighting. The two are inseparable; neither could win a victory alone. As is our army, so is our government. We need men of able minds, men of experience, at the heads of the different departments, to giv orders to the common soldiers who hav to fight the battles. Everyone cannot be an officer. Many must remain in the ranks. Just so with the more common employments and avocations of man. Nature forces us into the world, through it, and out of it. We know not from whence we came or whither we go. We can only make the best possible use of things as we find them, and while it is our privilege and duty to gain as high an eminence in life as possible, we cannot all get to the top. We must liv in a lower sphere until we can gain a higher. We need the true and happy laborer as much as the man of capital. Each is useful and proper in his sphere. One can do nothing without the other. No pen or tongue should be allowed to crush either. Everyone has the same right to climb the stairs of wealth as far as he can and not interfere with the rights of others.

Ask not what ye would not giv. It is not wealth or position that really brings us happiness, for where there is envy there can be no real happiness. Where there is a desire to use a slanderous tongue or pen to destroy individuals or governments, there can be no enjoyment or content. Happiness is found in the family where is found economy, love, affection, cleanliness, industry, etc., and not where is found envy, strife, dissatisfaction, and immorality. Thus we see that both the tongue and pen are restricted from saying, writing, or publishing that which is a detriment to mankind and for which the author should be held responsible.

Reason, best of heaven's blessings,
Given only to mankind!
Life would scarce be worth possessing
Did not reason rule the mind.
When in state and pomp parading
Kings and presidents we see,
Reason tells us: Envy not them;
They must die as well as we.

AXTELL, KAN., Jan. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not seen anything from here for some time, and it seems right that all should know that we are still in the fight. Our Farmer's Alliance (of which I am president) discussed partially the Sabbath laws, and the pious ones found they were going to get too much, so they adjourned (being in the majority), but they got a good reply in the Axtell Anchor, and everybody has found out that they hav not got the truth on their side. Our Liberal Union has about 400 books and tracts out doing missionary work, and the revival "sky-pilots" are getting nothing here but "water hauls;" they can't get a hand-up for prayers, or for evidence of interest in the meetings. "We hav 'em scared." They got the Rev. Rogers (Universalist) to lecture at the Mason installation, and it was the finest exposition of the Religion of Humanity ever given in the town. He said, "An honest God is the noblest work of man. There is no God except as we perceive him in humanity." He showed up the selfishness of the churches and its members, saying that their chief concern was to save their little souls from hell. I am not a Mason, and cannot say how much Masonry he talked, but I do know that many that heard it would hav left the hall if it had been a Liberal lecturer that had said the same things. We are shaking the dry bones of the old orthodoxy. The Rev. Mr. Kloss, of the Congregational church, recently announced that he would close his course of sermons on the "national evils" by a discourse on Infidelity. I told his members I was going; that if the leading Infidels advocated what, if followed by a large part of the people, would lead to a national evil, I wanted to know it, that I might shun it. I went, and to my surprise he said that Infidelity was a good thing; it acted as a prod to make Christians better; and his sermon all through was kind and courteous. We hav brought about this change by organization. Less than one year ago in this town the religious mouth-piece, Rev. Clagget, said: "Every Infidel is a liar, and Ingersoll is the chief of liars." I "chinned" him up in good shape in a crowd the next day, and went to work to organize; and lo, the change! Before we organized I was a hellion; now I am kindly treated.

Of course the pious will tell me about the faults of some of our members, but I call to their mind the acts of some of their folks, and they are sorry they said anything about it. Catholicism has driven the filthy old Bible from our schools, and we must not forget to giv praise where it is due; but we may look for her to ask that her members pay their tax to the parish schools, so I will not praise her too loudly. I say to the Liberals of every town, village, and city: Organize. That is the only way to command respect. You will find that you are stronger than you think. The main thing is to be Liberal, and the world will find it out.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Sunny Sally.

Such an Old-Fashioned Story.

Sunny Sally lived by the sea,
Seldom a single dollar had she,
Simple the roof her bright head o'er,
Scarcely a wild rose about her door.

Sunny Sally smiled with the sun,
Smiled when the rain-drops pattered down,
Smiled with the storm-king's angry roar,
Smiled when the loud waves beat the shore.

"Strong and stanch is the good ship, 'Gold,'
Strong and true is my sailor bold;
Shines in the north the lover's star,
Showing him home from lands afar.

"'Sooner than summer roses fade
Shall you see me, dear,' his letters said.
'Silks will I bring, and silver store
Sallie shall fish in the sea no more.'"

Summer fled with the birds and flowers;
Sallie smiled through the autumn hours,
So sad a smile one wept to see—
"Sailor, my sailor, come home to me!"

"Strong and stanch was the good ship, 'Gold,'
Strong and true was my sailor bold;
Since Love is good, I will not despair,"
Still white threads shone in the golden hair.

Swallows twittered beneath the eaves,
Soft winds fluttered the fresh young leaves,
Spring stole again o'er the shining sands,
Strange ships came from distant lands.

Sunny Sally wept by the sea,
Such joyful tears one smiled to see;
Safe at home was her sailor bold,
Sunk 'neath the waves the good ship, "Gold."

Safely at home, a true man still,
Safely at home, but a poor man still.
"Savings of years are gone," said he,
"Sunk with the ship in the angry sea.

"Silvery store and silken sheen Shall deck the mermaids' caves, I ween."
"Shall we care for that?" she softly said,
"Since love is left we will work for bread."

The Allen Boys.

That was all true about Rebecca, the story that was told in the Corner, for Rebecca was my great-grandmother, and she often related the incidents of her early days.

When she lived in the family of Governor Belcher, they kept four negro slaves, named Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and they were good, true, and faithful.

After Rebecca married, she lived in Milton, as was told you in her story. Her grandchildren thought everything of her, and those who lived in Boston took "solid comfort" whenever they visited her rural home in Milton. There were Isaac, Henry, and Charles who lived in Boston; and all the neighbors knew it when the Allen boys went out to their grandmother's. Such running and racing over the hills! Such whooping and hurrahing! "Make all the racket you please. Boys are boys, and will never be boys but once," said Grandma Rebecca.

And then such splendid dinners as she used to make for them! She did her cooking usually in a fireplace, as it was called, and you could see the blazing fire all the time on the hearth. There was a crane with pothooks and trammels, on which hung the kettles. When she baked, it was in a kettle, with live coals heaped on top of its cover; and then she had a tin sheet set up before the fire for meal cakes, and an iron spit on which were roasted meat and eels. But once a week she made a fire in the big brick oven, and when it was hot she baked beans, brown bread, pan-dowdy, pumpkin pies, and Indian puddings; and if you never tasted the goodies baked in an old-fashioned brick oven you will never know all you hav missed.

And then, the suet puddings boiled in a bag along with the pork and vegetables—my! how good! The lumps of suet were as big as the top of your thumb, and shone like topaz, or quartz crystals! Flour was not so cheap and plenty as in these days, and a sack of flour at Thanksgiving was made to last a year. A pound of tea held out the year round, and five pounds of sugar went the same length of time. But they had plenty to eat, such as it was, and it was all wholesome and healthy. The Allen boys thought it was splendid, and ate with a relish, and after eating they were ready for play.

One day they captured a rattlesnake in a thicket on one of the Blue Hills. They made a slip-noose out of strong vines and twigs, and managed to get it twisted around the snake's body, which they dragged home in great triumph, the reptil hissing, squirming, writhing, and making the most horrible contortions in his wild efforts to free himself. They got it home at last, and their grandfather dispatched it with an ax. It had twenty-seven rattles.

"Now," said Charley Allen, "if old Adam had just knocked that pesky sarpent in the Garden of Eden in the head, there wouldn't hav been such a fuss about that apple business, would there, grandfather?"

Their grandpa, who had read a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason," and was rather skeptical, laughed heartily and said he guessed Adam was "kinder lacking in mother-wit, or else he wouldn't 'a' been such a tarnal fool as he was, but would hav licked the old sarpent and mauled him on the spot."

Their grandpa had an old white horse and a shay, and when old Whitey was harnessed up, the one-horse shay was looked upon as an elegant equipage, in which the old couple were accustomed to drive into Boston to visit their son and daughter, the Allen boys' parents. When they were all ready to start, Billy, another grandson who lived with them, with his sister Ann, would be called to bring the basket of eggs that they were to carry as a present, and the box of butter, and then he would hav to get the bag of oats for the horse to eat when he arrived in town. Then Billy would jump in and curl up at the feet of the patriarchal couple, and they would jog contentedly along to Boston town.

Gran'ther Allen, as he was called, was an even-tempered man, generally speaking, but sometimes he would let his temper get the best of him, and then he was awful.

He had a little bird that he thought much of, and one day some one left its cage door open. Jimmy, the cat, observing the same, with one bound knocked over the cage and grabbed the bird. In a jiffy there were only a few blood-stained feathers left to show that a bird once lived there. When Gran'ther Allen saw what had been done, he was white with rage. He glanced at Jimmy, who was contentedly licking his paws, and lapping his chops, and merely said, "Old cat, your minutes are numbered," and with one blow of a club Jimmy was as dead as his victim.

"I do not believe," said the old man, "in violent measures generally, but this case comes under the old Mosaic dispensation—an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth."

"Why don't you eat the cat, then," said Billy, "same as he did the bird?"

Gran'ther made no reply, but strode out of the house.

Jimmy had only followed his cat instincts, and was greatly lamented by the Allen boys. He had a noble funeral, however, and was buried with great pomp and ceremony in the garden, Billy acting as undertaker and minister, and the others as chief mourners.

The Allen boys were once invited to Canton to attend the wedding of their cousin. They were on hand early, but getting quite hungry before the ceremony, which took place in the evening, they went around to the pantry window, opened it, and crawled into the room, where they helped themselvs to the three kinds of wedding cake and two kinds of wine. They stuffed themselvs so full of cake and wine that they were found at a late hour, two of them, in the barn in a bewildering state of intoxication, one in the pig-sty, fast asleep with the pigs, and another had crept into the hen-coop. They were so ashamed of this escapade that they never tasted liquor afterward.

They kept their young married cousin well supplied with partridges, quails, rabbits, woodchucks, and squirrels after that, and when not hunting in the woods they made many fishing excursions up and down Charles river for her benefit.

The Revolutionary war had left the country very poor, and money was so scarce that a silver dollar looked as big as the moon, and the Allen boys were early put to work to earn their living. They had one sister, little Sarah, who used to run on errands.

When the boys discovered that Sarah was a favorit with the grocer, and could get, therefore, more candy for one cent than they could for five, they entrusted their pennies to her, and the way she managed their financial affairs, and the candy she procured for them, would hav been a credit to an older head than was hers.

There was a remnant of witchcraft remaining in New England in those days, and the Allen boys looked with wonder upon a woman who lived in Milton who declared she was bewitched, and that she had a dish-kettle in her stomach. She would be very angry when any one disputed it, but the boys laughed and giggled at her vagaries.

The Allen boys grew up and became smart, industrious men. Isaac became a dentist, Henry, a merchant; Charles, a sea-captain, and Billy an actor, which calling much displeased his folks, but he was excellent in his chosen profession. Ann died young, and Sarah married the grocer who gave her so much candy for a cent, and, although they were roguish boys, they all made out well in life and were good and honorable citizens, and honest members of society. MIRIAM.

Correspondence.

LUDLOW, ILL., Jan. 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw so many boys and girls writing, I thought I would write, too. I go to school now. I read in the Third Reader. I like to go to school. I am ten years old. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight years. I like to look at the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, they are so comical. Well, I must close.

Yours truly, DALE NEWKIRK.

Dec. 22, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am eleven years old. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is a very nice paper. There are thirty inhabitants in Cle Elum. I hav a cousin here and he is going to write a letter to you. I hav a horse and he is very intelligent; his name is "Dandy." My sister and I hav a great time roaming about the hills. It is very romantic; tall, towering pine trees reach high into the air. They often make houses out of one tree.

From your friend, IONE KAHLOW.

TORONTO, Dec. 31, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter for my little sister and myself. She is four and I am ten. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. Pa and ma are truth seekers, and they hav lots of fun with Christian visitors. I read the Children's Corner to my sister and look at the pictures; we think they are just fine, especially Mrs. Noah beating the skunks. We hav a dog—he is a water dog. We are going to get a harness for him; he will pull us on the sled. We hav a kitten; it is six months old, and it is the boss of the house. When ma is sweeping the kitten runs after the broom. I must close now. Wishing you a Happy New Year, we are truly your friends,

ALICE AND EMMA CHURCHILL.

P.S.—If you think this is not fit, please do not print it, as it is my first letter.

[We think it a good letter for the first and hope you will write again.—ED. C. C.]

BALSTON SPA, N. Y., Jan. 2, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter for the Corner. I am a little girl ten years old, and study arithmetic, geography, and spelling. I read in Swinton's Second Reader. My father and mother are Freethinkers, and all my brothers and sisters. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and Green's Magazine, and mother takes the Ironclad Age, and we hav lots of Liberal books. We hav the "Story Hour," and mother bought us the "Apples of Gold" a short time ago, and we all love father and mother, for we are so happy together. This is my first letter, and I would like to see it in the Children's Corner. I hope you will excuse my poor writing.

From your little Freethinker friend,

HATTIE THORPE.

P.S.—I hope you had a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. H. T.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixm.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

The Andover Creed.

IN MODERN ENGLISH.

There was a man whose name was Adam,
A woman—Eve—she was his madam;
A crafty, impious imp of evil—
Call him serpent—call him devil—
Induced these folks to eat an apple,
With which they'd been forbid to grapple;
Immortals thus were rendered mortal
And driven forth from Eden's portal!
There is a place of endless terror
Prepared for those who fall in error,
Where fire and death and torture never Cease their work, but rule forever;
Such horrors e'en in wild Ashantee
Were never known nor thought (see Dante).
To this dark cave, for Adam's sin,
Must all his children enter in;
And millions of his poor descendants
Must suffer for his independence.
But the all-merciful creator
Took pity on the fallen traitor,
Prepared a narrow path of pardon
That led to heaven's happy garden;
And, lest mankind prefer to sin,
Predestined some to walk therein.
Ah! Happy souls; your goal is heaven,
Already are your sins forgiven!
But millions still in error languish,
Doomed to death and future anguish,
Who ne'er hav heard of Adam's sin,
Nor of the peril they are in;
Who know not of the way of pardon,
Nor of the fall in Eden's garden;
They hav no promis of election,
No kind decree for their protection.

This, my friends, is the Andover Creed;
Put it aside for the time of need!
In the hour of grief and sorrow
From it consolation borrow;
When your dearest friends are dying,
Read it to the mourners crying—
Read with features stern and solemn
As the massiv granit column!
Teach it to the tender maiden,
To the man with sorrow laden;
Teach it to the timid child,
Watch its look of horror wild—
Note the half-defiant fear,
Flushing cheek, and pitying tear;
Teach it to the broken-hearted,
From their loved ones newly parted;
Show them that their pride and beauty—
Type of love and filial duty—
Filling all their home with brightness
With her form of airy lightness—
This—their darling—whom they cherished,
Has in hell forever perished,
All because of Adam's folly!
'Twill drive away your melancholy
And leave with you, consistent one,
A sense of duty nobly done;
Ah, a wonderful thing is the Andover Creed,
Put it aside for the hour of need!

E. Frank Lintaber, in Puck.

The Law of Property.

Mr. Clark's article, "The People's Share in Wealth," in the North American Review for July,* shows a praiseworthy appreciation of the present muddled and deplorable condition of industry; of the strained relations of classes in the existing system, and of the present uneconomic and inequitable division of the results of industry.

He says: "Present wealth is unutterably selfish, vulgar, and tyrannical. Poverty is growing savage and brutal, and Macaulay's 'Huns and Vandals' are showing their teeth, not from the outside of civilization now, but from the underside;" and more that is equally graphic, timely, and truthful.

But when he comes to the remedy—this, the burning problem of the age—he surely has not given us, nor solved, nor penetrated, nor even touched. For he says, "I trust I hav shown that for the equitable distribution [division] of a people's joint heritate it is wholly unnecessary to disturb the existing tenures of property. These hav grown up as naturally as accretions of coral. They are right." He says the solution and remedy are completely given in the answer to the question, "What is the absolute, underlying law of ownership—all ownership whatsoever?" and its "enforcement" by "the death-rate tax." He cites the theory and practices of England, and the words of our own Declaration of Independence as to life, liberty, pursuit of happiness, etc., and pointing out what they imply, says, "Now this is the same as saying that the people of the world jointly own the world, and that the people of any country jointly own that country while they utilize and maintain it," and "all men are equal in the natural right of access to the world's wealth, but they can improve and enjoy this wealth only in accordance with individual capacity. In the distribution [division] of wealth, therefore, all men are not entitled to an equal share in property, but to an equitable share; and an equitable share is an equal share according to ability, industry, and economy." This, then, he givs as the answer and the "law." And he says of it, "This formula is all there is of democracy; all there is of economics, all there is of social justice;" and if this be so, alas, then, for at least economics—and the question is one chiefly of economics; and so alas, also, for society! And of this he says, "It stands here as ethics," after just stating that it stands for democracy, economics, and justice. "Let us convert it into mathematics." Now he is going to make it stand also for mathematics—this seems to be ignoring due scientific discrimination with unbecoming recklessness. By and through this "conversion" he discovers or works out what he calls his "death-rate tax," which, although he here makes it identical with the "law" itself, is to be used to enforce the "law" "when the people once comprehend the true law of ownership, and the perfect method of enforcing it, through the collection and redistribution of the birthright, death-rate tax," etc. And he says, "The pivot on which this transformation [from ethics to mathematics] turns is the fact of death." "The entire wealth of mankind reverts from one generation to another every fifty years." Well, what of it? He answers: "But now, if a nation's wealth is simply a reversion extending through fifty years, one-fiftieth of that wealth reverts in one year." Well, again, what of it? He answers: "This one-fiftieth is two per cent of the whole value." Still, again, what of it? He answers with the strongest kind of an affirmation, i.e., an interrogativ affirmation: "Is it not perfectly clear, therefore, that an annual tax of two per cent on the value of the property collected by society, and expended for the common good of society, would effect complete democracy of ownership—would giv, with every year, to every child born into the world, an exactly equal share in all the opportunities and all the advantages of life?" To which I reply, with equal emphasis, "No! In fact, not clear at all, and will again ask how would or could it do so?" But instead of immediately answering this time, he thus dogmatically (and may it not be said, arrogantly?) proceeds, "In this tax lies the science of redistribution [redivision], and the true rejection of all spurious or half-baked economics like Socialism or Communism." This suggests the phenomenon of a very drunk man declaring that it is the "other men" who are drunk, and not he; for it does seem to me that it is Mr. Clark's economics which is not even as much as half-baked, and quite spurious. Besides, who ever before heard, or expects to hear again, of such a science as "the science of redistribution?" One would suppose that if we were so fortunate, or might be, as to hav a science of distribution or division, this would, besides being a possibility, answer a far better purpose on the principle, if on no other ground, that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." But Mr. Clark further on does revert to the two per cent death-rate tax, and makes some efforts to state how, combined with more and similar dogmatic affirmations, it is to secure the results above claimed.

But Mr. Clark leaves, and proposes to leave, untouched the present system of competition with all its iniquitous tendencies and characteristics; the evils after they hav been wrought to be palliated only, at most, by taking back from the profit- and mammon-mongers a portion of their "ill-gotten gains." But how, even, is this that's taken back to be made to accrue to the benefit of the people from whom it was in the first place (according to Mr. Clark) exploited? Why, in this way: if they are out of work, or such of them as are, the government is to use this fund, or as much of it as remains after paying its own expenses, to furnish them with work, and "to hav annually, at call, a common fund large enough to break, if they wish, by mere competition, any individual or corporate monopoly the earth can produce."

Impotent conclusion! A mere increase in taxation two per cent instead of one, for I submit in all candor and seriousness that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in this "fact of death," or "average death-rate," or "reversion of wealth every fifty years," having any bearing upon the solution of this great question of economics, viz., How with a minimum expenditure of labor to produce a maximum of results, or as to "the people's share in wealth?"

He says (to conclude), "The indirect result of this tax would be greater than even the direct" by compelling money to go in business instead of lying in bank. But how so? Would not the tax on it be the same in business as out? He adds, "Universal co-operation would be established in one bound." Impossible!

* An epitome of his book, "Man's Birthright; or, The Higher Law of Property." By E. G. Clark. New York. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

A New Work on Spiritualism.

The Gazetteer received from the author, several weeks ago, a book entitled, "Spiritualism Sustained," by John R. Kelso, A. M. The book is a handy volume of 250 pages, and a credit in general appearance to the publishers, the New York Truth Seeker Company, who will supply copies by mail at $1 each. The volume is divided into lectures, as follows:

I. Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible.
II. Spiritualism Sustained by the Christian Church.
III. Spiritualism a Necessity in God's General Government.
IV. Spiritual Mediumship.
V. Objections to Spiritualism Answered.

Col. John Kelso, as a writer, is well known among the "Liberals," having written and published several volumes, presenting the most pronounced Materialistic opinions and arguments. His friends and admirers must hav been astonished when the above book made its appearance, as in many things his opinions hav apparently undergone a radical change. He claims to hav been made a convert to a belief in a life after physical dissolution, by proofs his analytical mind could not resist, and frankly owns that in one thing, at least, he had indulged in a very grave mistake. Those who know the colonel best will giv him credit for his candor, if they do not accept his conclusions.

The book is a remarkable one. It is not, as might be expected, devoted to the presentation of the evidences on which the author bases his conclusions; indeed, he tells his readers he has studiously avoided it, for the reason that second-hand evidence is in reality no evidence—only reports, and reports are not necessarily true. This is a very good rule to adopt in the investigation of phenomena apparently in conflict with universal experience, such as are vulgarly classified as supernatural. But while Colonel Kelso studiously avoids giving his own experience, which, in many instances, might most likely be corroborated by living witnesses, the first two chapters of his book are devoted to proving modern Spiritualism true by the statements of the writers of the Bible and the records of the Christian church! In other words, he treats the testimony of living witnesses as insufficient, but that of those long dead, and in many cases anonymous, as perfectly convincing. He confesses on nearly the first page that he considers the Bible totally unworthy of belief, and follows it up with over forty pages of "proofs" from the Bible that Spiritualism is true! He says he puts the witnesses on the stand unimpeached, and yet in the sentence preceding he declares them totally untruthful, and in prior works has at least made strenuous efforts to impeach them.

In explanation of this apparent inconsistency, it should be stated that Colonel Kelso, though himself an Infidel, says he wrote this book for the purpose of converting Christians, and as they believe, or are presumed to believe, the Bible is an inspired book, and therefore its every teaching strictly true, he has a perfect right to use their witness to sustain his cause. The idea seems to be to leave the character of the witness cited, for veracity, in this discussion, entirely in their hands. From this standpoint—Bible proofs of Spiritualism—we think the colonel has made out his case. We cannot see how an orthodox Christian can deny spirit communion—both good and evil—but we fear few of them will be converted by this book, notwithstanding the formidable array of quotations and ingenious arguments of its logical author. It is not likely many will ever see the book. Christians are not in the habit of going to an Infidel writer for proofs of immortality, or for interpretations of the book which is the basis of their faith. But, as if the author was afraid that some of the more Liberal among them might hav a curiosity to know what he had to say on so recondite a subject, and believe his witnesses, he devotes most of the fourth chapter to proving that these same witnesses are untruthful, and totally unreliable every way. Were it not for the fact that we hav every confidence in the author's sincerity, we would be almost tempted to believe that he wrote this volume to foist his arguments against the authenticity of the Bible upon Christians, rather than to make converts to Spiritualism, for the arguments presented in this chapter are, to our mind, the strongest to be found in the whole volume, and the only ones in fact that appeal to the intellect. The first two chapters are valuable to the student for the amount of matter bearing on the subject, which he has brought together, culled from the Old and New Testaments, and also for the testimony collected from the writings of the Christian fathers and Christian history, not generally accessible. This latter evidence is, however, seriously weakened by the fact that the same witnesses quoted to prove the truth of intercommunication between the living and the dead, also testify to the truth of the most remarkable, and in the light of science utterly incredible, miracles, as being quite common occurrences all along from the middle of the second century, almost, if not quite, up to our own day—such as raising the dead to life, healing the sick and maimed by a word; transportation of human bodies invisibly through the air, changing of one substance to another, incredible wonders performed by holy relics, etc., etc. This is, however, in harmony with the rest of the book—to present what at first glance is convincing evidence only to destroy all confidence in its credibility by subsequent facts and deductions.

To our mind, the portions of the book devoted to explaining how spirits commune with mortals, and the methods to be observed by investigators, is uninteresting, possibly because the previous pages failed to convince us that there are any spirits; possibly because it is not original. The same may be said of the answers to objections to Spiritualism. There is nothing new here. All that is said is familiar to every reader of the literature of Spiritualism; here the tone of the writer is apologetic and leaves an impression upon the reader of mental weakness not characteristic of the author's other writings, or of other portions of this volume, where he lays aside the spiritual for the natural and logical.

As has been stated, the book has its value, but if it ever makes any converts to a belief in modern Spiritualism, we shall be greatly surprised. Its careful perusal ought to awaken to thought and investigation, and if it does this it will not hav been written in vain.—Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Texas.

"PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE."

This is the title of a work by L. R. Smith, which shows much deep thought and clear reasoning, and is well worthy of careful perusal by every earnest seeker after truth. While I cannot agree with the author in all his conclusions, I can fully indorse much that he says, and especially the account given in his preface of the religious ideas prevailing in the section where he lived during his boyhood, and the zeal and persistence with which those ideas were instilled into the minds of the young. I do not think it strange that the promulgation of such dogmas caused untold misery and unhappiness when operating upon the tender minds of the young, and can but rejoice that the author has found the better way, and is endeavoring to lead mankind into the flowery paths of love, virtue, and obedience to duty. He argues truly that we should devote all our energies to the duties of this life, as it is the only one of which we know positivly anything.

On this point, as indeed throughout, the work displays a sound logic and keen perception which should commend it to all. I bespeak for it a generous patronage from the Liberals of this country, and can assure them the perusal of the pamphlet will well repay its trifling cost.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. Givs cheer and hope to the afflicted bysaying and proving that SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., can be cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. No failure in any case.

It is one of Dr. Fellows's valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, by pad and bandage, which cures by absorption, and which is the only reliable method of curing Seminal Weakness and Loss of Sexual Power.

Send five 2-cent stamps for his book "Private Counselor," telling all about the disease, and the external cure, with evidences of success. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

News of the Week.

MEASLES increased in this city last week. There were 641 cases and 72 deaths.

CLUVERIUS, the young Virginian who betrayed and murdered Miss Madison a year ago, was hanged at Richmond on the 14th.

MAYOR HEWITT'S health is slowly improving.

LORD IDDESLEIGH, formerly Sir Stafford Northcote, is dead. He was one of Charles Bradlaugh's most bitter opponents.

OVER 223,000 cubic yards of limestone and slate rock has recently fallen out of the bank of Niagara river, near the falls. The great quantity of accumulated ice caused the break.

ANOTHER priest filled Dr. McGlynn's place in St. Stephen's church last Sunday. The parishioners held an excited meeting in the evening, and resolved to boycott the church henceforth. Dr. McGlynn was a great favorit with his congregation.

THE 3,000 employees of Pierre Lorillard's tobacco works went on strike last week against a reduction of pay. Mr. Lorillard is the broad-minded gentleman who a year or so ago endeavored to put a boycott on the members of the Jobstown Secular Union.

ACCORDING to the Rutland Herald, a Woman Suffrage fair just held in Music Hall, Boston, netted $6,000 for the cause.

GEN. W. B. HAZEN, chief signal officer at Washington, died last Sunday. General Hazen was born in Vermont in 1830.

MISS DODGE and Miss Agnew, the women members of New York's school board, hav entered upon the duties of their office.

EX-ALDERMAN MCQUADE, convicted of receiving a bribe while in office, went to the Sing Sing prison last Monday morning.

SAM JONES, the Tennessee revivalist, preached in Boston last Sunday. As something different from Parson Downs, he was pronounced tolerable.

IN a speech in Newark, N. J., the other night, Mr. Powderly, of the Knights of Labor, denied that he had been in any manner controled by the Catholic church.

FIFTY-ONE persons were arrested in New York for violating the excise law last Sunday. It is probable that one hundred times that number broke the law without being molested by the police.

HENRY B. STANTON died in this city, January 14th, aged eighty-one years. Mr. Stanton was an anti-slavery agitator; a lawyer, a Democrat in politics, and served as Senator of New York. His disease was pneumonia. Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton is in London, and was informed by cable of her husband's death.

A NEW YORK policeman named Rourke was found off duty the other day by a roundsman and was rebuked. He thereupon drew a pistol, and shot and killed his superior officer. Rourke is a ruffian, and has been known to be such for years by the people who hav kept him on the police of the city. Citizens are wondering how many more there are like him among the "finest."

IN the trial of the case of Father Fitzgerald against Archbishop Williams in Boston on the 12th, John C. Kennedy, a lawyer, testified that on June 16, 1884, a conversation took place in the presence of the plaintiff's nieces and others. It was about improper proposals which the plaintiff had made to one of his nieces. One of the nieces accused him of seducing her. The other testimony related to the departure of the nieces from the plaintiff's house in consequence of improper proposals. Father Kennedy declares his innocence of the charges.

THE FIRST "DRUNK AND DISORDERLY."

And he drank of the wine, and was drunken.—Gen. ix, 21.

Odds and Ends.

BY executing murderers on Friday it givs them just about time enough to reach heaven for Sunday.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Now, children, can any of you tell me who Methuselah was?" Small scholar: "He was a chestnut."

THAT was a highly-educated Apache who informed an examiner that there were three elements—earth, air, and firewater.

"YOUNG men believe in nothing nowadays," says Mrs. Ramsbotham, with a deep sigh. "Why, there's my nephew, Tom, who was brought up as a Christian, and now he's an acrostic."

FAITH is sometimes represented by the figure of a drenched female clinging to a sea-washed rock, but a better personification would be a bald-headed man buying a bottle of patent hair-restorer.

"AND what was the disposition of the remains?" was asked of a man who recently lost his mother-in-law. "The disposition of the remains," he replied, with real feeling, "was quiet and peaceful."

A POLITICIAN walking along the street accidentally dropped a lie. A gentleman called after him to tell the politician of his loss. "Oh, it is no consequence," said the latter; "I hav plenty more." This story teaches that even a politician can sometimes speak the truth.

AFTER the clerk had pulled down everything in the store without satisfying his customer, a woman, she asked him if there was anything else he had not shown her. "Yes, ma'am," he said, "the cellar; but if you wish it, I will hav that brought up and shown to you."

MISS BRIDGET O'FLAHERTY, a graduate of a parochial school, and who has just been appointed teacher, has a singular theory in geography, which she teaches. It is that in traveling it is easy to distinguish the different states as you pass through them by their colors, as laid down on the maps.

A MAN went to the priest to hav his friend's soul prayed out of purgatory, and put a shilling on the plate. "Is my friend's soul out?" he asked. The priest said it was. "Quite sure?" the man asked. "Quite sure," replied the priest. "Very well," said the man; "if he is out of purgatory, they won't put him in again—it's a bad shilling."

"WHO is that poor, old ragged-looking man, papa?" "That's an inventor, child; he invents entirely new ways of saving time money, and labor in the production of useful articles." "Who are those gentlemen with big gold chains and diamond studs—they aren't inventors, are they?" "No, dear; they 'improve' the machines the other man's invented."

THERE is said to be but one lawyer in heaven. How he managed to pass St. Peter is not known, but it is conjectured that he passed himself off for an editor and slipped in unexpectedly. When he was discovered the startled angels searched the realms of felicity in all their length and breadth for another lawyer to draw up papers for his ejectment, but they could find none, of course, and he held the fort.

A PRINTER'S devil was pierced to the heart
With the charms of a dear little miss,
Quoth he to the lass, "My dear, ere we part,
Let us seal our love with a kiss."
But the maiden replied, as the imp she eyed,
"Dost think I'd let you revel
Where others before you hav vainly tried?
Nay, nay; I'll not kiss the devil!"

Years passed away, and the sweet little lass
Became an old, sorrowful maid;
Riches she had, but then, alas!
Her beauty had all decayed;
Once again they met, and fain the old maid
Would recall the former issue;
But the devil replied, as the old maid he eyed,
"No; the devil now wouldn't kiss you!"

A COUNTRY parson, in encountering a storm the past season in the voyage across the Atlantic, was reminded of the following: A clergyman was so unfortunate as to be caught in a severe gale in the voyage out. The water was exceedingly rough, and the ship persistently buried her nose in the sea. The rolling was constant, and at last the good man got thoroughly frightened. He believed they were destined for a watery grave. He asked the captain if he could not hav prayers. The captain took him by the arm, and led him down to the forecastle, where the tars were singing and swearing. "There," said he, "when you hear them swearing, you may know there is no danger." He went back feeling better, but the storm increased his alarm. Disconsolate and unassisted, he managed to stagger to the forecastle again. The ancient mariners were swearing as ever. "Mary," he said to his sympathetic wife, as he crawled into his berth after tacking across a wet deck, "Mary, thank God they're swearing yet."

CHAUNCEY BLACK, says the Harrisburgh Telegraph, was booked for a speech in Reading. The meeting was very large, and there had been selected as chairman a good-natured nativ, who didn't know any more than the law allows. He, it seems, had attended a previous Democratic meeting, where Secretary Stenger had orated in his fervid style, and had seen the speaker introduced, consequently he felt it to be his duty to introduce Mr. Black in a few remarks. Taking the chair, he thanked the meeting for the honor, and then commended the candidates and democracy, winding up by saying: "And now, fellow-citizens, I introduce to you the honorable Mr. Lieutenant-Governor Black, who will show you that the Democracy is a cloud of smoke by day and a pillar of cloud by night." Immense cheering followed, during which Mr. Black was seen to be struggling hard to suppress his emotions. The next morning a number of Reading Democrats went to the station to see Mr. Black off. Among them was the chairman of the meeting. He looked as if something troubled him, and he finally drew Mr. Black to one side and whispered: "Governor, I'm not quite clear about that pillar of cloud business, but I got it from Stenger." And Mr. Black laughed all the way home to York.

Gems of Thought.

THE divinity of Christianity is strongly claimed upon the ground of its prevalence in the world and the large numbers who acknowledge it as the true faith. If this criterion is the true one, several other systems are equally divine, and some of them far more so.—D. M. Bennett.

AN Agnostic is one who says, respecting God, "I don't know." He does not deny, neither does he affirm. He simply says, "I don't know." Perhaps he would like to believe, but cannot, as he sees, or thinks he sees, no reason for it. Suppose you try to convince him. You ask him if it is conceivable that all this wonderful world should exist without a God who created it. He replies that it is indeed a wonderful world, but it does not clear up, but rather deepens, the mystery to suppose "a God" created it; for you hav then two mysteries, the origin of the world and the origin of God, too, to account for. To him it appears the simpler assumption that the world, the substance of it, is self-existent and eternal.—W. H. Spencer.

ONE world at a time is my doctrin. It is said in this Testament, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and I say, Sufficient unto each world is the evil thereof. And suppose, after all, death does end all. Next to eternal joy, next to being forever with those we love and those who hav loved us, next to that is to be wrapped in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace. Next to eternal life is eternal sleep. Upon the shadowy shore of death the sea of trouble casts no wave. Eyes that hav been curtained by the everlasting dark will never know again the burning touch of tears. Lips touched by eternal silence will never speak again the broken words of grief. Hearts of dust do not break. The dead do not weep. Within the tomb no veiled and weeping sorrow sits, and in the rayless gloom is crouched no shuddering fear.—R. G. Ingersoll.

ABBOT. Ashes are on my head, and on my lip
Sackcloth, and in my breast a heaviness
And weariness of life, that makes me ready
To say to the dead abbots under us,
"Make room for me!" Only I see the dusk
Of evening twilight coming, and hav not Completed half my task; and so at times
The thought of my shortcomings in this life
Falls like a shadow on the life to come.
Prince Henry. We must all die, and not the old alone;
The young hav no exemption from that doom.
Abbot. Ah, yes! the young may die, but the old must!
That is the difference.
—Longfellow's Golden Legend.

I SAY unto you that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man . . . take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain (Matt. v, 38-41). Put up thy sword, for all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword (Matt. xxvi, 52). Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. v, 5). The doctrin of non-resistance would mean nothing but the destruction of the gentler and finer races, and the rampant tyranny of the stronger; the reign of violence, not of peace; the triumph of Satan, not of Christ; in a word, the suicide of all meek and truly Christian peoples. . . . Christ's exhortations are a guide to the spirit we must cherish, not to the conduct we must pursue. We must cultivate the temper which will effectually prevent us from being quick to resent or prone to retaliate or severe to punish; but without abnegating these natural instincts, which are sometimes our safest guides, or ceasing to maintain that firm attitude of self-protection which, under the governance of good feeling and good sense, is the best antagonist to the prevalence of violence upon earth.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half-willing, half-reluctant to be led,
And leaves his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them from the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
So nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings, one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently that we go,
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being to full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know. —Longfellow.

CONSIDER the seed dropped into ground. It swells with germinating energy, bursts its integuments, sends upward a delicate shoot, which grows into a stem, putting forth in due season its leaves and flowers. And yet all these processes are operations of matter, for it is not thought necessary to assume an immaterial or spiritual plant which affects its purposes through the agency of the material structure which we observe.—Dr. Henry Maudsley.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Boston Herald claims that if Professor Smyth is found guilty, there will be no probation for the poor heathen after death.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL Teacher: "Now, children, what happened on Christmas; can't you remember?" Wee Scholar (in great delight): "It snowed."—Youth's Companion.

GLADSTONE wrote an article for the Nineteenth Century on Tennyson's "New Locksley Hall." The proprietors of the publication paid Mr. Gladstone $1,250 for the article.

THERE is a manufacturer in Cleveland who runs a religious annex to his factory on business principles. The Appeal says that "he makes great pretenses to being a Christian. He is in the habit of calling the girls into his office occasionally and holding a prayer-meeting. Then this pious fraud charges the girls for the time thus lost."

AT the regular Monday meeting of the Methodist ministers of Baltimore, there was a long and heated discussion over the following resolution: "Having read in the daily papers that some ladies of the city are making arrangements for a charity ball, to raise funds for the poor; therefore, be it resolved, that we hereby decidedly condemn such methods, and hope the ladies will hereafter abandon them." After much talk this resolution was defeated, and a much milder one was substituted, stating that the meeting was opposed to balls and dances, and requesting the ministers to ask their members not to take part in any held in the name of charity.

JOHN SWINTON'S protest against Henry George's "attempt to drag religious controversy into the arena of labor," the Winsted Press answers: "Fudge, John! It is just as important that the laboring man should be free from superstition as from poverty. Piety and poverty, begging and priestcraft, go hand in hand everywhere, and it is worse than useless to put dollars in a man's hand to be given to the clergy to erect temples of dishonor in which to preach subjection of the masses to the kings of earth and heaven."

THE postal law makes it larceny to take a newspaper and refuse to pay for it. A newspaper in Illinois recently brought suit against forty-three men who would not pay their subscriptions, and obtained judgment in each for the full amount of the claim. Of these, twenty-eight men made affidavit that they owned no more property than the law allowed them, thus preventing attachments. Then they, under the decision of the Supreme Court, were arrested for petty larceny, and bound over in the sum of $300 each. All but six gave bonds, while six went to jail.

THE Buffalo Courier tells of a four-year-old citizen of that place who, having been naughty, was reprimanded by her mother and told that the Lord knew every act of her life. In a half-repentant frame of mind she walked into the front parlor, and was pensivly regarding the fire in the grate when the cat came alorg and tried to work into her good graces by purring and rubbing against her ankles. Even that did not please her, and at last her mother heard her snap out: "Go way, pussy! It's bad enough to hav God watching me, 'thout having you tagging me around."

"I WANT a Bible," said a tall, gaunt woman, stepping into a bookstore on Woodward avenue. "Do you wish the revised edition?" inquired the clerk civilly. "I ain't pertikeler. I jes want one in the house so I'll hav a safe place to keep my specs in. A family Bible that won't never be meddled with is the kind, I reckon." She got it.—Detroit Free Press.

LATELY a clergyman from Oberlin set forth before the Congregational Club of Cleveland the principles of heredity, maintaining their correctness by records and statistics, and inferentially intimated that the charitable work the churches were advocating and practicing was doing harm instead of good by keeping in existence poverty, disease, and crime, which is the result of the inexorable law of heredity, and which it would be for the general benefit to let die out. The tendency of the position taken was that the law of "the survival of the fittest" is a fact, and it is questionable whether its course ought to be interfered with.

IN a recent lecture in London, Frederic Harrison, the Positivist, said: "When Socialists of the type of Mr. Henry George or of Karl Marx strove to prove that the land of a country, or the machinery and factories, were all by rights the property of society, not of individuals, and should all be administered in the name of and for the benefit of society, the Positivist objection was that they did not go half far enough. Why stop short at land, railways, machinery, and factories? All products, movable or immovable, lands, houses, furniture, food, even clothes and tools, were all equally products of society, and should all be enjoyed or used in the name of society and to the benefit of society. The Positivists, who professed the only complete, consistent, and practicable Socialism, were the only Socialists who were not afraid of their own doctrins; for even the noisiest Anarchist at an open-air meeting thought he had a right of property in his own boots and his own shirt, to say nothing of his own tongue."

MUNKACSY'S "Christ," now on exhibition in New York city, is attracting great attention, and notably so from the Jewish journals of that metropolis. It is pronounced "a wonderful painting," says a Jewish contemporary; "it is this Jesus of history whom Munkacsy has portrayed upon his canvas, not the Jesus whom St. Paul embodied in his theological system, and whom St. John transfigured for the admiration of future worshipers." We hav not seen the artist's work, but hav read many accounts or descriptions of it. This "Christ" of Munkacsy is the work of the imagination, the face is not the face of a Jew, the landmarks are obliterated, and hence the painting lacks the element of truth, which is the essential element in a historical work of the kind. Behold the Jesus as portrayed by the immortal painters of the Roman Catholic faith. Do they typify a Jew? Does the portrait of the Virgin Mary typify a Jewess? Go into any Catholic church and observe the types there exhibited. They are modeled after the highest forms of ancient Greek manhood and womanhood, hence as works of art they are false, both in conception and coloring. The church was too cunning to paint on canvas a typical Jew for worship and adoration while the living typical Jew was in the Ghetto degraded and enslaved by the church. —Jewish Times.

Communications.

A Liberal paper should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH.—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Christian Absurdities.

I do not expect in one essay to show all the absurdities of the Christian religion—just enough to set one's thinker at work. When one cheek is smitten, where is the Christian who will turn the other to receive another blow? Where is the rich Christian who will sell all he has and give it to the poor? Let the church show one thrifty Christian who takes no thought of the morrow. How many rich Christians can be found who invite in only the poor when they make a feast. I would like to see the talented minister who would leave a big salary and a fat position and wander up and down through the earth without "staff," or "scrip," or "purse," to preach the gospel. These are all Christian rules, but let them be strictly enforced, and men and women would leave the church as rats desert a sinking ship. Let these rules be enforced, and who will enter the courts of heaven. Even Talmage would not be allowed to enter the back-yard. There never were any such Christians, and there never will be.

If you refer the Christian to the tortures of the Inquisition, or to the ignorance and brutality of the Dark Ages, he will exclaim, "Oh, that was not owing to Christianity, but rather to the want of it;" and will tell you that Christianity has outgrown her superstition and her cruelty. Thus what is Christianity and humanity in one generation is superstition and brutality in the next.

While the church claims to give tone to the morals of the people, and to be shaping the destinies of the world, all unknown to herself there is an advancing civilization which is constantly molding and modifying her creeds and beliefs, and to which she yields as unerringly as the wax to the seal. Some day the people will outgrow the idea of God-written books and God-inspired men, and consign the prophets, saviors, angels, and ghosts to the limbo of the impossible, and come down to the solid conclusion that there is nothing above the natural.

The Christian is willing to have you hold up the other saviors, Christna, Zoroaster, Quexalcote, and a half-dozen others, before the world as impostors, if you will only except his "only begotten." He believes that there was some deception in regard to the other saviors, but is perfectly sure that his particular redeemer is an emanation from God. I wonder if it ever occurred to the mind of the Christian that the followers of the other saviors were equally sanguine.

If Christ was celestially begotten, what business had his biographers, Matthew and Luke, with the lineage of Joseph? They might have traced the lineage of any other man with as much propriety, if he was not the father of Jesus. Is it possible that Matthew and Luke could know better about the circumstances of the conception than Mary herself? It is said that Joseph was informed in regard to the matter in a dream. But should a dream be taken before the testimony of this mother of Christ? When Joseph and Mary had been looking for the boy (Christ), and found him in the temple, what was her language—"I and 'God,'" or "I and the 'Holy Ghost' have been looking for you?" Not exactly; but "I and thy father [Joseph] have sought thee sorrowing." Had not Mary a right to know who the boy's father was? The whole story of the divinity of Christ has no better foundation than a dream. And even the dream is contradicted by the direct testimony of the mother of Christ.

Now, if the New Testament is an inspired book, the part which declares that Joseph was the father of Christ is just as much inspired as any other part of it, and away goes the divinity of Christ. If it be contended that there are other parts of the New Testament which declare differently, then away goes the validity of the book.

Beecher says, "That Christ should be the center and active cause of such stupendous imposture on the supposition that miracles were but deceptions, shocks the moral feelings of those even who disbelieve his divinity." Now, I would like to ask Mr. Beecher, and Christians generally, if the miracles of Christna establish his divinity; if the miracles of Zoroaster establish his divinity; if the miracles of Apollonius and Simon Magus establish their divinity. Mr. Beecher further says, "Even Infidelity would feel bereaved in the destruction of Christ's moral character. But to save that, and yet explain away the miracles which he wrought, has put ingenuity to ludicrous shifts." Now, Mr. Beecher, I defy you to prove that Christna, Buddha, Zoroaster, Apollonius, and Simon Magus were other than good men. Do you therefore accept the miracles, which it is claimed they wrought, as genuine? The Christian is so much taken up with his savior that he calls him the "savior of the world." Nothing would astonish him more than to learn that Thibet, Mexico, Greece and Rome, India, Egypt, and Persia have all had their saviors and virgin mothers. Mayence, Shing-Mou, Alemene, Prudence, Minerva, Semile, Chimalmen, Maia, and Celestine were all virgin mothers, while Sakia, Christna, Zulis, Quexalcote, Bacchus, Hercules, Alcides, Yu, and Hesus were either gods or god-begotten saviors, regarded by their respective worshipers with as much veneration as Christ is by Christians, and their mothers were regarded as pure and spotless virgins, like Mary, the mother of Christ.

Now, my Christian friend, when history informs us that there have been more than a dozen saviors who have been crucified for the sins of the world, don't it begin to look as if this savior business had been a little overdone? With all of these saviors, one would reasonably expect that such men as Ingersoll, Putnam, and Palmer would go to heaven. If they don't, what will become of poor Talmage and the two Sams?

Is it not a little strange that the gods have taken such a liking to young virgins? All who will take the trouble to consult Josephus, book xviii, chap. 4, third paragraph, will get a clearer idea of virgin-born gods. It may not be out of place briefly to state the circumstances. There was a beautiful woman of high standing, whose name was Paulina. Decius Mundus, also rich, fell in love with her, and offered her a vast sum of money to comply with his desires. She was deaf to his entreaties, and scorned his gifts. Mundus resolved to starve himself to death on account of Paulina's refusal.

A freed woman told Mundus that for so much money she would pledge herself that his desires should be gratified. The money being paid, she made an arrangement with a priest to tell Paulina that the god Anubis wanted her to meet him in the temple. So she went to the temple, and when the hour of sleep came the lights were put out, and the temple closed. Mundus, who was concealed in the temple, leaped out, and Paulina thought it was the god Anubis. Here is the key to the secret of all the gods and saviors that were ever born of women, and they have all been begotten in the same way. All through the eastern world the belief was common that the gods could and did hold commerce with women. In the case above cited, all will see that Paulina could not have been imposed upon unless such belief had been common. This ought to prove an eye-opener to all Christians. But I honestly believe that there are thousands of Christians who would still shout and sing and pray if they knew the whole thing to be a farce.

In recent times, heavenly messengers or angels are represented in books and tracts as beautiful women with wings. Anciently they were young men, and it is to be hoped for the peace of society that the sex will not be changed again. We prefer the gentler sex; they are far less mischievous.

It beats all how many beautiful young virgins have been visited first and last by heavenly messengers, and what a deal of mischief has been wrought thereby. If so many young women had not been deceived by these amorous messengers from the celestial regions, as Paulina was by Mundus, believing him to be a god, some of the saviors would have been just common babies.

Nearly all of these virgin-born gods had stars to mark the place of their birth. So, too, they had wise men come to worship them. All trace their lineage to some royal personage. Nearly all were born on the twenty-fifth day of December, and all had similar titles. Christna, the savior of the Hindoos, was called "God, the most high," more than a thousand years before the birth of Christ. Adonis was called "God Supreme," and Osiris, "the Lord of Life." "Holy Living God," and "the Son of God" were titles common in the East centuries before the dawn of Christianity. The Christians have their "Lamb of God." The Hindoos have their "Holy Lamb of God;" the ancient Mexicans, their "Ram of God;" the Celts, their "Heifer of God;" and the Egyptians, their "Bull of God." While these saviors have done little good in the world, it is demonstrated that they have done much harm. Men have been taught that they could stain their garments with crime, and then shift the consequences of their iniquity on these saviors. A more pernicious doctrine was never taught among the children of men.

It is easy to see why priests and ministers are so anxious to keep their adherents ignorant of other saviors and older systems of religion. The similarity is so great as to leave no doubt in the mind of the most obtuse Christian concerning the borrowed character of his religion.

There is in the British Museum a representation of the crucified savior, Christna, corresponding almost exactly with pictures of Christ on the cross as seen in religious books and tracts. In different parts of India may be found figures of the same crucified savior chiseled in the solid granite, antedating the crucifixion of Christ hundreds and hundreds of years.

When a gentleman first discovered these facts, and declared his intention of publishing them, he was visited by prominent Christians, who tried to dissuade him from his purpose for fear it would have a tendency to unsettle the minds of many as to the genuineness and the originality of the story of Christ. Moreover, when the British Parliament sent a deputation to India to investigate the sculptures and monuments and sacred books, a Christian bishop of Calcutta got hold of the report, and so defaced it that it could scarcely be called the same report. Everything pertaining to the Hindoo savior, Christna, had been entirely erased.

Christian writers have expressed their fears that the enemies of their religion might seize these facts and hold them up before the world, and if generally known the people would be led to believe that the whole story of Christ had been borrowed from this original.

No matter whether the story of Christ is borrowed or original, no matter whether it originated among the Jews or Hindoos, it is too ridiculous for sober consideration.

The idea of a child having a ghost for a father is so absurd that one would be led to think that no intelligent mind had ever given the subject a serious thought. Calling the father of a child a holy ghost does not help the matter a mite. It is as impossible for a holy ghost to be a father as it is for an unholy one. But what benefit have all these saviors been to human kind, anyway? What benefit to the starving poor to believe that some time in the future they will have a pair of wings, and twang a golden harp?

Priests and ministers have so warped and muddled the minds of men and women that thousands who are suffering for the common comforts of life, instead of studying and laboring to better their condition here, give all their thoughts to the hereafter.

Don't be afraid that with our best effort, and that by devoting our entire thought and energy to the bettering of our condition here, we shall render this earth such a blissful abode that we will be unable to appreciate the joys of heaven, if we ever get there. The first step toward heaven is happiness here. Let us strive to banish hell from the minds of men, and to let them know that the gods will never interfere with our affairs on earth. For eighteen hundred years the minds of men have been turned toward gods, saviors, and Christianity. Now let us have as much time devoted to the cause of humanity, and if the world is "the better for it," as I believe it will be, will there be any less joy in heaven, or will the gods fare any worse? Set the dogs on a man who is willing to be miserable all his life because he believes he is going to be happy in heaven. No man shall outdo me in being happy in heaven if I can help it, and I believe I can endure good food, a comfortable home, and any amount of happiness here.

Instead of teaching the young to devote their lives to the service of God, let us teach them that there are sublimer duties to perform, inasmuch as men are above myths. Priests and ministers have led the youthful mind astray long enough. I would like to have every priest and minister in the land stand up while I tell them something. When you teach children that they must live for the service of God, be kind enough to explain what good they can do him. Would it not be better to teach them to help the aged and the feeble, and to make the world look bright and happy all around them? Would not such teaching have a more practical bearing?

If hell is to be the reward for trying to make the race happy, give me the hottest corner of it. If, as the ministers say, "hell is paved with good deeds," let us keep right on paving until we fill it up entirely. If noble and heroic actions are going to set hell to sputtering, then the meanest actions will by the same rule secure heaven, and Talmage and the two Sams may came out ahead yet. Mr. Minister, you have been a teacher a long time, and a little wholesome advice will do you good. Don't worry too much about your savior. Try to be a savior yourself, and induce others to act as such. Do not bother your brain about the blood of the lamb. See that the hungry have something to eat. Do not speculate too much about the plan of redemption, but see how many you can redeem from squalor and want. Do not shift burdens upon the shoulders of others which you ought to bear yourself, and never take pay for services which are of no benefit to anybody.

Do not build costly churches as long as the poor are without decent homes. Heaven is too far off; we can't afford to wait; start one right here. Earth is the best location for a heaven that I know of. Besides, the heaven here will be a reality; the heaven promised by Christians is just a little misty. "What is hit is history, and what is missed is mystery." Do not be too selfish—get interested in the welfare of every human being. This world was made for the accommodation of the whole human family, not exclusivly for Christians. If there is anything which can make "a dying bed as soft as downy pillows are," it is the consciousness of having lived good and useful lives.

My clerical friends, is not this better than to go through the world looking as if you were struck wit death, and with a puritanical face long enough to drink out of a churn? What kind of a god do you worship, anyway? Is he going to punish you for trying to have a little sunshine, and for making other hearts glad as far as you are able? Will a virtuous life, made up of generous and noble acts, unfit you for the enjoyments of another state of existence? When you compare this life to a "vale of tears," and say that it is a "dark and stormy desert," "a wilderness of woe," that you are only a "pilgrim and a stranger," that "this world is not your home," you fill this life with gall and aconite, and, as far as your influence can go, banish all the joys of earth, and spread only gloom and sorrow. You may think such a course in life will fit you for another world, and the sooner you start the better it will be for this.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

I do not remember at what age I learned the astounding lesson that in this so-called Republican country there were several millions of human beings who were bought and sold like the beasts of the field; but it must hav been almost in my babyhood, for I well remember being taught the cradle song by my mother, who died when I was five years of age. Let me giv a few verses of this song, which Christian mothers taught their children:

I thank the goodness and the grace
That on my birth hath smiled,
And made me in these Christian days
A happy English child.

I was not born, as thousands are,
Where God was never known,
And taught to pray a useless prayer
To blocks of wood and stone.

I was not born a little slave
To labor in the sun,
And wish I were but in my grave,
And all my labor done.

I think my pious mother must hav been sorely puzzled to answer satisfactorily to herself the questions which I was almost constantly asking her: "Why did God let children be slaves? and if God made little children, why did he make them black? if that were the reason they were slaves? and was God good?" and many others of the same nature. This being a slave seemed to me, even at that time, the worst of all calamities, save one, that could befall anybody, and that other was the going to hell to be burnt forever in actual fire.

My poor little brain was so excited, in trying to find answers to these many questions, that I wonder that I did not entirely lose my senses and become idiotic. Perhaps the death of my mother, and the changes that naturally followed in the family, served to take my mind from this particular problem in theology.

About this time, from 1824 to 1830, there swept over New England what was called a "revival of religion." As I looked back upon it, it seems like some scourge or plague, so great was the sorrow that followed in its wake. Protracted meetings were everywhere the order of the day; sensational ministers were sought for, and employed to preach, with all the effect possible, the coming of the day of judgment and the sure doom of the impenitent.

Here was another problem to be solved—of what use was preaching or praying for those who were elected from the foundation of the world to be saved? And how worse than useless to try by any means to avert the doom of those who were foreordained to destruction! My queries, no matter to whom addressed, always received the same answer: "Child, Satan desires to hav you, and so he is putting such questions into your head. Answer him, as did the savior, 'Get thee behind me;' and remember it is very wicked to reason upon the ways of God. You hav the holy Bible; read that and accept it; it is God's word." At last, in despair, I began to read the Bible, consecutivly, chapter by chapter; but, alas! I found it wholly inexplicable; and when I went to my good Christian aunt (who was in the place of mother to me) and begged her to tell me what such things meant, and why God used such filthy words, and what was the good of such laws, and why women were required to do things that were wrong in the nature of things, the only answer she could giv me was, "I don't know; put away the Bible till you are older; read now the Psalms and the New Testament."

Such was the mental food given to children to digest sixty and seventy years ago. Is it better to-day? Liberalism has so permeated thought that, like homeopathy in medicin (all pathies being so much afflicted by it that no respectable doctor salivates with calomel, or denies to a patient burning up with fever cold water), so the Protestant religion in all its different creeds is a mild mixture compared to what it was at the time of which I am writing. Perhaps for the reason that its hideousness is so nicely covered there is more need that Liberals be on the alert. Christianity demands entire subjection to its edicts; no matter that it keeps in the background the damnation of infants in another world, if it shall continue, as to-day, to teach, not only in Sunday-schools, but in public schools, supported by the entire public, the doctrins of the Bible. Until the majority of the people are allowed mental liberty, we are not safe. To-day, in this year 287 since Bruno gave his life in defense of liberty of thought, a citizen of New York is under arrest in the state of New Jersey for ridiculing the idea of the God of the universe being born of a woman and subject to all the ailments of babyhood. It is to be hoped that the jury will fail to convict, but the intelligence of a New Jersey juryman is, at the least, questionable. Freethinkers everywhere should use their utmost efforts to cause the removal from our statute-books of laws that make free speaking a crime. Within three years three persons hav suffered imprisonment in England for caricaturing the God of the Established Church of that realm. Christians of this country and of England do not hesitate to go into foreign countries, decry their gods, and demolish the representativs of such gods, and if the nations object the sword soon settles the matter.

At the time when Mr. Garrison first published his demand for the immediate and unconditional emancipation of the slave, all respectable people considered themselvs Christians. The different sects denied the name to each other, but each sect assumed the name for themselvs. The Presbyterian, who was at that time Christian par excellence, refused to fellowship the Unitarian, because the Unitarian denied that Jesus of Nazareth was the real God—he made him out a strange being, hardly intelligible to himself perhaps, but surely not God. Presbyterians and Unitarians alike denied the Christian name to Universalists, though the Universalist took excellent care of the son of God, making him not exactly equal to the Father God, but of great importance in the godhead to the human family, in that he had "willingly suffered death for every individual, and in so doing had paid to his Father (the principal God) the debt which Adam and Eve had entailed upon all their descendants forever and forever." This debt once paid, the Universalist persistently taught, had "destroyed death and hell, and even him that had the power of death—the devil." And so they were denied the Christian name, for of what use was a creed without a burning hell and a devil to so tempt human beings that few only could escape the eternal flames?

There lived at this time a lady in western Massachusetts somewhat famed as a writer, who left the Presbyterian church and joined the Unitarian. This lady was a great favorit with an aunt of hers, who considered this new heresy a sin fatal to salvation, but she was so warmly attached to this very sinful niece that she could not deny herself the pleasure of frequently visiting her. One day, when taking leave of the niece after a pleasant day's visit, the aunt embraced her friend very warmly, and, with the tears falling profusely, said to her: "Oh, do come and see me very often while we liv, as you know when we die we shall be separated forever." Such was the assurance with which a certain class of Christians were endowed that they could with great certainty fix the eternal state of themselvs and others.

Has Christianity Benefited Woman?—III.

Our own country is probably in advance on the question of equal rights of the sexes, and yet with us there are many prejudices to overcome. There is the general impression that the woman who has the audacity to enter any of the learned professions is not a genuin lady. They hav to meet the calumnies and slanders of the bigoted and envious. In our own country, at Baltimore, in 1829, the first girl passed an examination in geometry, and a howl of indignation went up all over the country. And of the three hundred and eleven institutions of learning in the United States that bear the name of colleges, only one hundred and seventy admit both sexes on equal terms, and five admit women only. In countries where the ecclesiastical spirit is yet strong women hav the fewest privileges. Compare the condition of women in Spain, Ireland, and Russia, with the skeptical countries of France, England, and the United States. In Germany, though the intellectual class is thoroughly skeptical, yet the government is as thoroughly orthodox, and the masses are superstitious. It is thought good for the safety of society to degrade annually several thousand girls. In Berlin there are ten thousand licensed women, and in order to carry on their business they hav to furnish a certificate from a clergyman showing that they are regular attendants at church, and that they partake of the sacrament, thereby putting both church and state sanction on the vilest practice to which a woman can be subjected. She is considered simply a creature for the gratification of the lowest passions of men. And the more ignorant and orthodox a people, the more is this cursed idea entertained. In Russia it is yet, in many places, considered a disgrace for a woman to sing in the church, and the soprano is supplied by small boys. In England, though recently woman has been making much progress, yet it has not been long since that in some of the old Swiss cantons women were led to the market with a halter around their necks to be sold to the highest bidder. In 1877, four professors in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, resigned because some women were admitted to the college, and they received the thanks of the London populace. And in 1869 four women were mobbed at the Christian University in Edinburgh when they were admitted to the college of physicians and surgeons. There are now several medical colleges whose doors are open to females, but female students are not given equal clinical advantages with male students.

Woman certainly does not owe her present elevated condition to Christianity, but to the secular movement that has been slowly but surely undermining the church, and if it were not for the reverence many people hav for the wisdom of Moses and St. Paul, the women of the United States would be the political and social equals of men; but on this question the church imposes her indomitable No.

Why, then, should women cling so tenaciously to the church?

She is the untiring beggar for its support, and without her influence the church would long ago hav sunk into oblivion.

The church is a great social organization, and woman loves society more than man; she dreads the social ostracism to which she would be subjected by withdrawing her support from the church, and her education has never been as practical as man's, and consequently she is not so much of an inquiring mind. Then, woman from her sensitiv nature loves the excitable emotions furnished by religion. Her whole thought has been trained in that direction, and by taking advantage of her constancy and tender emotions the priests can play a winning card.

But, thanks to a few brave, heroic souls, woman is being gradually led from the bondage of superstition. She begins to read and think for herself, and will soon be the equal of her lord and master. She is beginning to learn that the clergy hav too often proved a treacherous enemy, and that the church has not always been the truest guardian of her sacred rights. The veil is being drawn from the face of Christianity, and instead of the beautiful system woman once thought it to be, she sees a superstition, the features of which are far more horrid than Zelica saw when the veil was drawn from the face of the prophet of Khorassan.

From the Independent Pulpit.

The fourth year of the Religious and Benevolent Association was completed on the 12th of December, 1886, and a suitable anniversary was held that evening in Liberal Hall. The work of the fourth year, like the three preceding it, was very satisfactory, and the prospects for future success were never more encouraging. When, four years ago, this association commenced to hold its meetings in the Court House, every one predicted for it a brief career. Six months was the longest time it was expected to continue, and many said it would go to pieces in three. A little later on they gave it a year, then two years, when finally all prophesying ceased, and everyone came to regard it as one of the permanent institutions of the city. It speaks well for the Liberal people here that they hav conducted their affairs with so much regularity and order. During the past four years their meetings hav been as regular as those of the churches, and although they were the last in the field out of the twelve or more white congregations in the city, not more than three of them can boast of a larger average attendance. During this time we [J. D. Shaw] hav been their regular lecturer, and in no instance hav we ever had an inattentiv audience, or been disturbed by anyone. The affairs of the association hav been conducted with great harmony, and in no way has that harmony been disturbed by any bickering or strife. The work of the fourth year reveals a healthy state of the association. One change from former years ought to be mentioned here, and that is the increased number of young people now in attendance. During the earlier years of our work they seemed to stand aloof from us, and our congregations were mainly made up of old people. Now we hav many young people, and a more orderly, well-behaved, and attentiv company would be hard to find. All in all, we hav much to encourage us in our ethical work, and the association enters upon its fifth year with renewed zeal and buoyant prospects of continued success.

News and Notes.

Columbus is a big, handsome city of about seventy-five thousand inhabitants, with a somewhat gloomy capitol building, and buggy factories that seem to tower to the very heavens. Twelve thousand buggies are made here every year. What a buggy procession! almost equal to a New York bedstead. How many rides this delightful city affords! What is the use of walking when so many buggies are made every year? Columbus is reckoned the richest city according to its inhabitants, next to Hartford, on the continent. Most of its people are well-to-do, and millionaires abound.

I found a splendid Liberal element, with the glory of youth and stalwart age. I felt as if I was in the very blaze of morning's fire amid these forward ranks. The hall was crowded on Sunday afternoon, about four hundred being present. An organization was formed, and nearly fifty ladies and gentlemen united with it. The following officers are elected: James Williams, president; F. S. Montgomery, vice-president; R. H. Ralston, secretary; Dr. P. E. Blesch, treasurer; Dr. J. B. Schueller, Samuel Goodman as executiv committee with these officers. I hav the highest hopes of the success of this organization in the capital of the great state of Ohio. The Liberal element has been advancing here for years and the hour is now ripe for a decisiv movement. Those who take lead in the matter represent the best moral and intelligent forces in the community.

Dr. Schueller is president of the Humboldt Society, which was organized here some years ago, and is a very Liberal influence. I attended its Sunday evening meeting, listened to a pleasant address by Captain Lee on German life and manners, to music, and enjoyed the free-and-easy sociability for which our German friends hav such a delightful genius.

Mr. Ralston, Mr. Montgomery, Samuel Goodman, Charles Augustus and wife, Dr. J. M. Stewart, L. H. Webster, Frank Kochne, W. H. Moore, C. G. Voght, Mrs. H. M. Lyndoll, J. B. Cochrane, Mrs. H. S. Seville, A. Synold, J. S. Cleman, and many others, make a noble list of Freethinkers in this beautiful city, who will be more than a roll of names, a power indeed for universal mental liberty. I do not believe our banners here will ever touch the dust. My heart is full of hope as I bid farewell to these excellent allies.

Monday I came to Piqua, Ohio, a lively town of ten thousand inhabitants, quite historic in its associations. It was once a famous Indian encampment. Nearly five thousand Indians were congregated here in the last century—the Piqua tribe. Piqua means "the man from ashes," and the legend is that this tribe originated in an ash-heap. Considerable lie in those ashes, I guess. The mound-builders were once here, and the country about is covered with innumerable relics, all sorts of war implements, inscriptions, skulls, etc. The English and the French had a big fight here for possession of the great West. A fort was built, and this is one of the first settlements in the country.

Piqua is a difficult place. I did not hav a single ladr at my lectures, and that is something that I don't like. The crust of orthodoxy here is pretty firm. However, we will not be discouraged. A Secular Union was formed, and the work will be pushed. J. D. Kruschke has plenty of backbone, with Mr. H. C. Maag, T. C. Willtheis, and others, and our flag will be flung to the breeze. I expect to strike here again on my return, and also Bradford, about nine miles away, where there is a lively set of Freethinkers, who came, some of them, spite of cold and ice, to the lectures, and made our camp-fires brighter—Mr. J. W. Smith, Charles Lambert, H. W. Smith, W. W. Bosserman, and Robert Campbell. Mr. W. C. Baker, of Montra, came twenty-five miles to join our company. So I don't feel a bit discouraged. This picket line will not disband, but keep on harassing the enemy.

A round-about journey, trains belated as usual, and just at dusk Wednesday I arrived at Mechanicsburgh, a pretty town, on a gentle declivity, of two thousand inhabitants. Here I find plenty of good cheer. Veterans of freedom who bate no jot of heart or hope, S. S. Staley, J. C. Vanness, George B. Vanness, Milton Chaney and family, Ellis McCarty, George Freeman, H. Baley, O. F. Boulton, John Paschal, Van Davis, Thomas Martin, Mr. Bowen, Mr. S. Kingsley, Asa Bates, Wm. Howard, John Rhodabaugh, Mr. Taylor, and others. The lecture was well attended. I hope to return here and organize our friends for permanent work. Near by is Springfield, Ohio, a rattling city of about thirty thousand inhabitants, and there must be some Liberals in it, and I purpose eventually to lecture there. This part of Ohio affords favorable fields for our labors.

Early Thursday morning I go dashing down to Cincinnati on the "Flying Dutchman" express, which spins along with glorious velocity. Our brilliant Materialistic, philosophic, phrenologic friend, Beall, who knows a man by his build almost with mathematical accuracy, was ready with a good handshake, the prelude to the cheering company which this Rhine of America (pork rind) always affords—a solid, substantial, slow, comfortable city, where music fills the air, and mud the streets; where the sidewalks are so uneven that one needs to be drunk in order to walk straight. If he is sober and is in a hurry, he is liable to be arrested for intoxication. But Cincinnati folk are never in a hurry. They go stately by. They do business as if all eternity were before them; and if you are a stranger, they always look at you askance, and wonder why you ever came to town.

Cincinnati, however, is a delightful residence city. It is devoted to art culture, good living, and elegance. Its suburbs are among the most magnificent in the world.

The thermometer leaped from zero up to sixty-two and a rainy evening set in, but about four hundred gathered together to listen to the lecture. The audience was most responsiv and speech was easy.

Friends came over from Covington, and I expect to lecture there sometime on my return. I was pleased to meet my old and tried friend, Dr. Hallowell, who is a stalwart Liberal, and has been in the brunt of the battle for years. He was at Lexington, Ky., when I lectured there, and his home was mine. He now livs in Covington, and is still ready to do and dare for Freethought. His wife is thoroughly devoted in spirit to the same cause.

I spent a few moments with William Winter, who was not able to attend the lecture on account of sickness. He is recovering, however, and at eighty years of age is bright and sturdy as ever. We hope to carry on the work to which this "grave and reverend signior" has consecrated so many years. A good greeting with Warren, who is the backbone of our finances. Others may fail, but, like charity, this generous Liberal never fails.

Edgar C. Beall is like an electric battery, and does more than any other man to put intellectual life into Cincinnati.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Walter Maxwell at Palace Hotel. The entertainment was royal, and Mr. Maxwell is one of our brightest thinkers as well as a genial host.

John A. Geeting, of Washington, Ind., came one hundred and seventy-five miles on purpose to hear the lecture. A pretty good Liberal that. Mr. Geeting has been for years an open advocate of our cause, and he has done much in his county, where he occupies an honorable political position, to advance Liberalism. I shall lecture at Washington, Ind., on my return, and look for a successful campaign at that point. So Cincinnati has been a bright spot, with happy associations and brilliant promis.

This bright Saturday morning, almost like spring, with beautiful blue skies, and fleecy clouds, and shimmering woods and fields, and flashing waters, and white villages coming and going, I am on my way to Rome City, where I lecture to-morrow, Sunday, afternoon. Next week I go to Linesville, Pa., to a Paine celebration; to Chicago Paine festival Jan. 29th and 30th (appointment at Nekoma is adjourned). I shall be at Fort Madison, Feb. 5th and 6th; at Belton, Mo., Feb. 8th; at Bavaria, Kansas, Feb. 9th and 10th; at Salina, 11th, 12th, and 13th; at Brookville, 14th and 15th; at Ft. Dodge, Feb. 20th; Garden City, 21st, 22d; at Denver, Feb. 27th and March 6th; at Tulare, Los Angeles, San Diego, Santa Ana, March 13th to 31st; at San Francisco and Oakland, the first two Sundays in April. I expect to be in California through April and May. Will friends in California please arrange for lectures at every possible point? SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Sunday Law of Massachusetts.

A pamphlet with this title, written by an eminent lawyer, has just been published by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston. It givs not only all the statutes, including that passed a year ago in favor of bakers, but all the decisions under them; for instance, that by which corn is not to be hoed on Sunday; that by which fraud committed on that day goes unpunished, and that by which notes signed then are null and void. So much information can be found nowhere else so easily. The unwillingness of the people to hav these statutes either repealed or enforced is compared to Artemas Ward's position—in favor of the Maine liquor law, but against its enforcement. The plan recommended is to hav a day of rest secured by laws, arranged for the practical good of the community, with no reference to religious interests, and with full provision for all "rational wants," including "travel, recreation, social intercourse, or whatever other pastimes be of good report, and any labor necessary to assure for the hour the reasonable personal comfort of himself or family, or for the saving of actual waste his own property and that of his neighbor."

This pamphlet is known to hav been read by Governor Ames; and its good effect may be seen in his recommendations to the legislature "that the whole body of the Sunday laws should be thoroughly and carefully revised." I know of nothing likely to hav a better influence on the members, and hope their attention will be called to it by the friends of liberty. Now is the time for vigorous effort against the day of tyranny and persecution.

The Liberal Club.

If any one had dropped into the German Masonic Temple at 220 East Fifteenth street on the evening of Friday, January 21st, at fifteen minutes before 8 o'clock, he would hav thought that the 431st regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club had been adjourned to some other place. No one was present. A little while later an audience which comfortably filled the hall had arrived. The man with the badge-pin took observations, and he noticed that many who came in alone sat alone. They did not seem to be acquainted. They were unsocial. They did not bunch themselvs together and discuss the characters and affairs of those who had not yet arrived. This feature, which some hold must be cultivated before Liberal societies can expect to attract members of the churches, seemed to be entirely wanting here. By a flagrant violation of society etiquet, each individual kept his own counsel and attended to his own business. Such is the disorganizing and disintegrating influence of unbelief.

At ten minutes past eight, the Chair said that, the first secretary being absent, the secretary's son, who was the second secretary, would come forward and read the minutes. The second secretary referred the Chair to the official report of the previous meeting printed in last week's TRUTH SEEKER. The Chair then introduced the speaker of the evening, William L. Snyder, Esq., who spoke upon "The Land Grant System and its Abuses." Mr. Snyder took his hearers back to the days of the feudal system and discussed the matter of alods and feuds and fiefs and serfs and vassals and villains, and aids, and reliefs, and wardships, and the jus primis noctis, and escheat, and some of the other peculiarities of the age of chivalry. It was in this age that our present system of land grants had its inception. The granting by the government of tremendous stretches of land in this country to foreign syndicates and railroad corporations was what the lecturer especially objected to, and the extent of these grants was given in a bewildering array of figures. Mr. Snyder held that the government had no right to grant away the people's land.

The Chair announced that the floor was open for discussion in speeches of ten minutes each, members of the club having the call.

Mr. Sutherland denied the accuracy of the lecturer's figures. He pointed out that the land grant system had had beneficial results, impeached the legal acumen of Mr. Snyder, and made other remarks calculated to lessen the force of that gentleman's arguments.

Dr. Weeks maintained that the previous speaker had corroborated the lecturer rather than otherwise. He had noticed that Mr. Sutherland often made good speeches without knowing it. The land grant system had its merits, but these were greatly overshadowed by its evils. The railroads do some good. The same might be said of the devil. He didn't believe in total depravity even in the devil and railroad directors.

Mr. Henry opened a ten-minute address with the somewhat superfluous remark that his father and mother were Irish. In a very polished and guarded manner he then proceeded to develop the fact that he was an Anarchist. People who will be slaves, he said, deserve to be slaves. Those who don't take their rights hav no reason to complain. The true idea of freedom has dawned upon only a few men, and they are under sentence of death. All the evils we hav in this republic came through the ballot, and the ballot can only make them worse, not cure them.

Mrs. Leonard said that we women would confiscate every scrap of land granted to railroads unless the railroads kept their agreements, which they hav not done. It is the duty of the roads to be public carriers between producer and consumer, yet in the West people are burning corn which the people of the East are starving for. Giv women the government, and if they make as big a botch of it as the men hav, there will be some reason then in calling them the weaker sex.

After further discussion and some closing words by Mr. Snyder, the Chair said that, provided Dr. Eccles would consent to postpone his lecture on "Evolution" until next month, of which there was no doubt, the next meeting would be a celebration of the birthday of Thomas Paine. This is right, for, in the language of Mr. Wakeman, whene'er through liberty and law a temple shall arise, the grandest mortals ever saw thrown upward to the skies; whereon by love shall be engraved the names of men of deed who labored for a world enslaved by tyrant and by creed, above them all, in bold relief, immortal, without stain, shall shine his name who was their chief —the glorious name of Paine.

A Liberal paper should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH.—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Pioneer Pith.

What men need nowadays is pith—the marrow, kernel, substance, bottom fact, bed-rock truth. Knowledge is so vast that its essence must be presented to the masses of humanity. The multitude need condensed thought. Learned specialists must master every detail in their several departments of knowledge, but the pith of all must be extracted and furnished to men at large, if general intelligence is to prevail. The day of rhetorical utterance and diffusiv expansion of ideas is past, and what men want is concise, clear, logical demonstration of fundamental truths. Esthetic tastes may still delight in descriptions of imaginativ excursions into "supernal realms of ethereal bliss," in strolls through "umbrageous woods" and meanderings by "the shimmering sheen of the creaming waves," but practical men now see beauty and fitness and crave knowledge of the underlying facts of nature, told in plain words with solid proofs.

The facts to be first presented should be the pioneer truths, which, as the word signifies, must go before to remove obstructions and prepare the way for human advance in the path of progress. A right conception of the order of the universe is essential to efficient action. Religion has presented erroneous conceptions of the universe, which now hinder man's development, and nowhere does the sentimental, vague, visionary, rhetorical element more prevail than in the presentation of its theories. To deliver men from bondage to the ideas of supernatural religion and from subjection to those who liv by their perpetuation, they must be given the pith of radical ideas, what Professor Clifford called "organized common sense."

The pith of Rationalism is the fact that the universe is controled by natural laws, and develops by uninterrupted successions of cause and effect; no arbitrary supernatural will ever interferes. Once grasp the idea,

> Nature never nods,
> Nor leaves her work to gods, and all the dogmas of theology will be cast off. Teach men that connected causes produce all results, and the ground is cleared of the rubbish of faith and is ready for the plowshare of reason and the seed of knowledge. Whatever happens,

> The only cause
> Is nature's laws.

Nobody knows how nature's laws originated, or, if they had a beginning, who started them. But, if there was a starter, there is no evidence that he ever interferes with their working, and science has proved that orderly evolution is the law of the universe. It therefore follows that this world was not made suddenly by the word of a God, nor was man made out of the dust; no serpent tempted man to fall, and he needs no atonement; no revelation was ever given by a being superior to man, but all knowledge has been gained by man's own study of nature; no miracle ever happened, and no prayer to supernatural powers was ever answered; no savior was born of a virgin; no one ever rose from the dead.

Put this pith of natural law into every man's mind and slavery will cease. No longer will man be the victim of beliefs about gods, angels, and devils, and be the prey of those who thrive by his bondage. All the elaborate structures of religion will crumble, the mazes of theology will be made straight, the multifarious creeds will be abandoned, and the emancipated Christian will adopt

THE PITHY CREED OF RATIONALISM.

> Jehovah ranks with Jupiter;
> The Bible's Hebrew lit'ratur';
> Confucius, Jesus, both were men;
> A future life's beyond our ken.
> A miracle do not expect;
> Seek nature's cause for each effect.
> From man hav come all gods and creeds;
> Your only savior is your deeds.

Elevating Mr. George.

From the Cincinnati Sun.

Yesterday the Sun encountered a member of the Henry George Club, and the latter made this astonishing and sensational charge:

"The Roman Catholic church is using the leaders of the Knights of Labor to destroy the Henry George land movement, believing that if Henry George's theories are not crushed they will result in the overthrow of the church. When the Knights of Labor met in Richmond there was a conference of Roman Catholic bishops in Baltimore. These resolved that if Powderly should fail of reëlection the influence and power of the church would be turned against the order. Powderly is a Catholic; and used to carry the red card which entitled him to admission to all the labor organizations of all kinds and degrees. During the Henry George campaign he made a speech for him, but in another speech at Philadelphia he said he was sorry he had, and advised all Knights to keep out of politics. This was the beginning of a gradual change. Now, couple the suspension of Dr. McGlynn with the reasons given by Vicar-General Preston. It indicates that Mr. George's theory of the abolition of private property in land has received the censure of the church, and that she is using Mr. Powderly to make use of his position as general master workman to overthrow the land movement, notwithstanding the fact that the creed of the Knights of Labor is composed of planks of political significance referring to the land question.

"A prominent K. of L. shows his prominence by the methods he adopts to injure the most prominent political movement of the day, and displays the domination under which he dissembles in the duplicity with which in the same breath he pretends friendship for a cause he is endeavoring to stab in a most vital spot by appealing to a popular prejudice he well knows is based on falsehood and misrepresentation, and says, referring to the George club: 'It looks as if it was a regular anarchical organ under a new and deceiving name.'"

"Do the rank and file of the K. of L. know what is going on?"

"Most assuredly not. They are in sympathy with Henry George, and are liable to adopt his ideas at next Sunday's convention. The leaders alone are working the scheme. They are acting under instructions from the East, and are careful to conceal the real purposes of the order. They intend to build up a separate political party, but they are in danger of being knocked out by Henry George's ideas. Notice how sudden they hav concluded to drop politics. It is only when they fear the triumph of the land theory and the disintegration of the church that they conclude to go out of politics. It is, indeed, a fact that the fiat has gone forth from the Catholic church to destroy Henry George. They intend to use the church's firm and faithful follower, Mr. Powderly, and he in turn has indorsed the move against George."

Prof. E. L. Youmans Dead.

From the Sun of Jan. 19th.

Professor Edward Livingston Youmans, editor of the Popular Science Monthly, died suddenly yesterday at the Knickerbocker Apartment House, 247 Fifth avenue, of catarrhal fibroid consumption. He had an attack of pneumonia two years ago, from which he never entirely recovered. He went South a year ago, but his feebleness increased, and he has not been at his office in the publishing house of D. Appleton & Co. for six months. The vivacity and flow of Professor Youmans's spirits continued almost to the day he died. His father, who is over ninety years old, and his mother, who has nearly reached ninety, liv in Mount Vernon, Westchester county.

Professor Youmans will be remembered chiefly for the fact that he found, or created, for Herbert Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall an audience in America before they had one in England. He was the most enthusiastic of writers and lecturers in America on scientific subjects. Born at Coeymans, N. Y., on June 3, 1821, his parents removed to Saratoga while he was a child, and when thirteen years of age he was attacked by ophthalmia, and for several years he was totally blind. His eyesight troubled him all his life. While he was blind he invented a machine, as did Prescott, the blind historian, by which he was able to write. He was assisted by his sister, Miss Anne Eliza Youmans, who is a well-known writer on botany for children. Professor Youmans's earliest studies were chemistry and physics. His first publication was a chemical chart with illustrated chemical changes by colored diagrams. His first book was a Classbook of Chemistry, published by D. Appleton & Co., and from that time, in 1852, until his death he was in some way connected with the same publishing firm.

He married a widow of a member of the cabinet of the king of the Sandwich Islands. When King Kalakaua visited New York over ten years ago he dined with Professor and Mrs. Youmans. Professor Youmans's title was given to him by Antioch College, in which he became professor of chemistry in 1866. The University of Vermont made him a physician, but he never practiced medicin.

It is said that it was through a conversation Mr. William H. Appleton had with Professor Youmans, who had entered the store as a stranger to buy books, that Professor Youmans began his connection with the firm.

Some of the books Professor Youmans wrote are "Alcohol and the Constitution of Man," "Handbook of Household Science," "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces," and "The Culture Demanded by Modern Life." It was through Professor Youmans's close friendship with Herbert Spencer that he came to found the Popular Science Monthly. He early exerted himself for the reproduction in America of the works of Spencer, Darwin, Mill, Bain, Huxley, Lecky, Tyndall, Maudsley, Carpenter, and others, and arranged with D. Appleton & Co. to pay foreign authors as American authors are paid. In 1871 he took up the copyright question and visited England several times to organize the International Scientific Series on the basis of a simultaneous publication in different countries of scientific books. The series hav been published simultaneously in London, New York, Paris, Leipsic, Milan, and St. Petersburg. Fifty-seven volumes hav been printed. In 1872 Professor Youmans started the Popular Science Monthly in order that he might print chapters of Herbert Spencer's "Study of Sociology" for the series, as no magazine publishers in this country would print them. Professor Youmans was assisted by his brother, Dr. W. J. Youmans, in his editorial work.

Editorial Notes.

C. B. REYNOLDS's trial for defending the Christian deity from the blasphemous imputations of the holy scriptures is set down for Tuesday, February 1st. The proceedings will be at Morristown, N. J., as previously intimated.

JAMES PARTON has an article in the Forum for February, on "Outgrown City Government," showing the inevitable mischief of political methods in municipal affairs, and advocating the necessity of a strong centralized administration, with ample powers and a long term of office.

THERE seems to be a disposition just at present among the Liberal journals to giv each other sly stabs under the ribs. It is an epidemic of ill-nature which we cannot account for, and which we regret to see among our esteemed contemporaries. Let the editors use all their energies in making good and brilliant journals, and they will hav no time for qucrulous fault-finding.

THIS is all the sympathy Dr. McGlynn gets from the Christian at Work: "Father McGlynn's deposition from the pastorate of St. Stephen's church, this city, is but a natural consequence of his disloyalty to his church authorities. Dr. McGlynn is popular and magnetic; but popularity and magnetism in the Roman Catholic church are poor substitutes for obedience and loyalty."

A SUBSCRIBER in Toronto, who asks concerning the Sinaloa coöperativ scheme, is referred to the report of the Liberal Club in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 27, 1886. If the statements in that report are true, Sinaloa is about the last place in the world a man should go to, for the walking back is very wet and rough. The prospectus of the company can be obtained by addressing Edward Howland, Hammonton, N. J. The other side of the story cannot be had until some coöperativ individual returns from Sinaloa.

THE late Judge Black possessed one level-headed idea. He hated the Pilgrim fathers for their arrant pharisaical hypocrisy. The feeling crops out in a number of his letters and speeches, and it cropped out continually in his conversation. "I remember the last time I saw him alive," said a resident of Pennsylvania to a Record reporter; "he put his hand on my shoulder and said in his expressiv manner: 'Young man, I hav been young, and now am old. I hav read many things; I hav seen many things; I hav heard many things; and I say to you that since the fall of Adam, nothing, nothing worse has happened in this world than the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock.'"

THE authorities of the Chattanooga Methodist University, an institution under the control of the Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist church, hav rejected the application for admission of two young men on the ground that the applicants are negroes. Some of the religious papers condemn this action, but others sustain the authorities. In the discussion over the matter, it leaks out that "niggers" are not yet men and brethren to the good Christians of the Methodist church South, but it does seem a little queer that the institution managed by the society organized to care for liberated colored persons should slam the door in their faces. But Southern Methodist sentiment is still against the social equality of its former slaves. The Rev. Mr. King, of Birmingham, Ala., publishes a card saying that his church is "for white persons exclusivly, and colored persons are not invited or expected to attend." Some time will yet be required to civilize the Southern Christians.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL is arranging for missionary work in Illinois, Indiana, aud Michigan.

THE success of the Denver Secular meetings is shown by the following from the daily Republican: "Prof. W. F. Jamieson lectured at Unity church last evening on another phase of the 'Does Death End All?' series, entitled, 'Modern Spiritualism.' The church was crowded, and many extra seats had to be provided for the use of those present. Professor Jamieson simply gave a synopsis of the more exhaustiv lecture on Spiritualism he will deliver next Sunday evening. He has studied the subject of Spiritualism for twenty-five years, and will giv his audience the benefit of his investigations." At the close of the lecture, Spiritualists came forward and shook hands with the lecturer, expressing their gratification with his fairness in handling the subject. He will be absent on a several weeks' lecture trip through Nebraska, and will then return to Denver and remain until summer. After his engagements in Minden, Central City, Osceola, Stromsburg, Neb., he is to deliver three lectures in Wilber, Neb., February 11th, 12th, and 13th. He can be addressed at Wilber, Neb., care of John N. Gouff.

The Age of Man.

The Bible givs the age of man on the earth as somewhat less than six thousand years. This result is arrived at by adding together the ages of the descendants of Adam down to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham, and from Abraham to Jesus, making a total from Adam to the Christian era of 4004 years, and from the birth of Christ to the present time a total of 5890. Of late there has been a disposition on the part of the clergy and certain so-called scientific defenders of the Mosaic account of the creation of the world and of man to twist and distort the plain declarations of the Bible into a statement that the world "may hav" been created millions, nay, æons and æons, of ages ago, and that man "may hav" existed on the earth much longer than the orthodox chronology seems to allow for. In order to test the accuracy of the Bible theory, it is only necessary to compare its statements with the ascertained facts of modern science, and to display the same fair spirit of inquiry that we would in the investigation of any other subject that was brought under our consideration, omitting no facts that are material in assisting us to an honest and sound judgment. In asking the question, What is the age of man on the earth? we may say that our answer must be principally derived from the results of the investigations of scientific men in such fields of research as astronomy, geology, paleontology, anthropology, morphology.

Taking the earth as we know it to-day, we find it inhabited by a variety of kinds of wild and some few domesticated animals, and by various races of men differing in color, type, tongue, and in many other respects. Some parts of the earth we find inhabited by civilized men, others by barbarians; and the question naturally arises, Were all men originally savages, and hav the civilized developed from these, or were some men, or, at least, was one man, originally created with organization and faculties suiting him for civilized life, and are savages and civilized human beings alike his offspring?

By reference to the writings and works of the various civilized races, we are enabled to determin their age as a civilized people, and with some degree of certainty trace them back to a semi-civilized, or even a savage, condition.

Records of the Greeks and Romans show these two great empires to hav been inhabited by civilized people as far back as 800 B.C.; by the aid of tradition the Aryan peoples may be traced back from 1500 to 1800 B.C.; the Chinese may be found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and government, as far back as 2500 B.C.; while, according to such eminent authorities as Lepsius and Bunsen, the Egyptians hav a history that carries us back more than 4000 years B.C. Now, if this be true, and men did not build cities in a day or a year, or make a language in a century, then we hav to consider how long man existed on the earth previous to this, and how many years he would take to reach this stage of existence.

If it could be demonstrated that the earth was not in a condition to be inhabited more than six thousand years ago, of course that would settle the question; for it would be readily granted that the earth must be in a fit condition for man to liv upon it before he could make his appearance.

Now, to us matter and force appear to be alike indestructible; the study of chemistry has demonstrated pretty clearly that not one atom of matter is ever lost in the universe, and what is true of matter is equally true of force, for matter cannot exist without force, and force without matter is a mere abstraction. But if matter and force are imperishable, indestructible, it would seem to follow of necessity that that which cannot be destroyed could never hav begun. Therefore matter and force are eternal.

And not only are matter and force imperishable—they are also infinit. Buchner (page 94, Force and Matter) says: "If matter be infinit in time, i. e., immortal, it is also without beginning or end in space; our usual notions of time and space cannot be applied to it. Whether we investigate the extension of matter in its magnitude or minuteness, we never come to an end or an ultimate form of it." No atom is so small that a smaller is not conceivable, and vice versa; nor can we by any possibility scale the hights nor fathom the depths of nature. Matter seems to be everywhere.

To this statement, however, theologians demur.

They acknowledge that matter and force are indestructible now, but they declare that deity "might hav" given them this quality at their creation.

But, in whatever manner this earth came into existence, it is admitted on all hands that it has not existed in its present condition always.

Men of science believe that this earth is an offshoot from the sun; that it once was a molten mass, and that it took ages to cool down sufficiently to allow of life existing upon it.

On the other hand, some theologians think that it was created in much its present condition a few thousand years ago, and that all forms of life appeared upon it a few days after its formation. Some divines, however, are prepared to admit that the earth was created thousands of years before living beings. Briefly stated, the view of men of science is that there are good grounds for believing that all the particles of matter which compose the solar system were once in a gaseous condition; but that in the course of numberless ages, through loss of heat the particles of matter were drawn closer together and formed into one huge burning mass, which went spinning along in the universe. This mass was what we call our sun, and from it were thrown off, at various intervals, huge masses of molten matter, which continued the spinning process, and ultimately by loss of heat the outer portion of each of these smaller masses became solid; and thus the various planets in our system were formed.

This is the accepted theory of men of science. But whether it is true or false, it is certain that the earth has not always been in its present condition; the shape which it assumes being the result of its spinning motion, and the rocks forming part of the outer portion of it, giving evidence of having been fused together by fire, thus demonstrating that the earth was once a burning mass upon which no form of life could possibly exist.

Sir William Thompson is of opinion that at least four hundred million years would be required for the earth to cool down so as to allow of life existing upon it at all, while some scientists regard this immense period of time as altogether insufficient. When, however, we turn to the study of geology we find ourselvs in the possession of better data to assist us in arriving at some approximate date in reference to the probable age of the earth and of man.

In the crust of the earth and various rock formations upon it we hav ample evidence of numerous changes which hav taken place at various epochs of the world's existence, while periodical volcanic eruptions and earthquakes go to show the great force of heat still existing beneath the surface of the earth; moreover, a diligent study of geology reveals the fact that what was once a portion of the earth's surface is now submerged beneath sea or ocean. To estimate the age of the earth we then hav to look at the rock strata and calculate how long they would take to form. We know that the chalk beds which are to be found in various parts of the earth are made up of the shells of minute animalculæ that pass their whole existence in the water. These shells are driven by the sea's waves into certain positions, and in the course of hundreds of thousands of years a great bed of chalk may be built up. But if it has taken hundreds of thousands of years to deposit the chalk formation, who can say what vast periods are required to account for the great granit and other rocks that existed in geological periods long antecedent to the chalk? The truth is, no figures can adequately convey to the human mind the vast period of time required for the formation of these strata. But, though we can giv no definit time to represent the duration of the earth's existence, we might, nevertheless, venture to giv some approximate date to the period at which it is likely that man—as man—first made his appearance.

Paleontology is the science which most assists us in determining within certain limits the age of man.

Geology shows us how the earth has undergone numerous changes, and what these changes are, while paleontology, which means a study of the fossil remains discovered in the earth, helps us to understand the probable age of man.

As a science, paleontology is only of recent birth—being about twenty years of age. But in these few years it has made immense progress. In all the civilized nations of the world, men of science hav labored diligently, and their industry and perseverance hav been rewarded by discoveries of great importance to all lovers of truth.

Nature's rule undoubtedly is to destroy and leave no trace of the beings that hav existed upon the earth; but there are exceptions to this rule, and it is the province of this young science to deal with these exceptions. Millions of living creatures hav played their part in the world's great drama and passed away, but the remains of some few hav become in some way or other imbedded in rock, or sand, or chalk, and these few remain to tell the story of man's greatest antiquity. Where, then, shall we find these remains?

A skeleton was found some time ago at New Orleans, sixteen feet below the surface, beneath the roots of a cypress-tree, with four fossil forests above it. Humboldt supposed a tree of this kind to be 6,000 years old, yet above these human remains are four fossil forests of trees, which gives us 24,000 years, at least, as the time that these human remains must hav lain in the earth. (See Samuel Eadon, M.A., M.D, on "Antiquity of Man.") Then we hav the opinion of Sir John Lubbock, who says: "If one account, given by William A. Koch to the Academy of Science at St. Louis, be true—but there is no reason for disbelieving it so far as I am aware, except that it proves the Genesis story to be false—then at some remote prehistoric period man had hunted the mastodon in the Mississippi valley, for the bones of the mastodon, and the arrowheads used by the primitiv hunters, were found mingled together at Gasconade county, in Missouri" (Prehistoric Times, page 934). This opinion is strengthened by that of Sir Charles Lyell, in his "Antiquity of Man," page 204; by Agassiz, in his "Types of Mankind," page 352; and by Carl Vogt, and numerous other eminent authorities.

In 1823 a skeleton was found in the loess of the Rhine. The eminent French scientist, Cuvier, pronounced the remains to be human and of vast antiquity. Next in importance to finding the human remains is to find the tools or weapons employed by man in past ages, or the bones of animals which had been of service to man. Of these there hav been many discoveries which are of the greatest importance. In a cave at Wurfort, and another at Engihoul, and at various caves in Belgium, were found the bones of human beings mixed up with those of the bear, the hyena, the dog, and other animals, in addition to pottery, which was found imbedded in the mud of limestone to a great depth.

In other caves were found human remains intermingled with those of extinct animals. According to Quatrefages, M. Lartet proves, in his account of the remains found in the grotto of Aurignac, "that man lived in the midst of the quaternary fauna, which he used as food, including the rhinoceros, and was followed by the hyena of this epoch, who finished the remains of his meals."

Quatrefages further says that in 1858, in the valley of Vézène, near the station of the village of Les Eyzies, the engineers discovered the cave of Cro-Magnon, which "has given us a type of one of the best characterized fossil races."

That most eminent authority, William Taylor (Anthropology, chapter i), says: In Assyria, Palestine, Egypt, as in other lands, one may find sharp clipped flints, which show that here also tribes in the stone age once lived, before the use of metal brought in higher civilization.

Then we hav the discovery of human remains in Kent's cavern, which was made known by William Pengelly, who claims 300,000 years as the lowest estimate for man's existence in England. When to this is added the testimony of so cautious and accurate an observer as Sir Charles Lyell, who givs the sanction of his authority to M. Lartet's discovery in 1860 of seventeen human skeletons; in addition, the bones of cave-deer, cave-hyena, cave-lion, polecat, wild-cat, horse, stag, etc., which carry us back at least a hundred thousand years. Yet even here we find man in a fairly advanced stage of existence, and we should be required to add several thousands of years to account for this advanced condition.

Anthropological science is equally strong in its proof of the vast antiquity of man. Further, it reveals the important fact that man is not of one type nor one race, but that there are at least eight realms with distinct types of man, and accompanying fauna and flora.

These are as follows:

1st. The Arctic, with the Esquimaux.
2d. The Mongol, with the Chinaman.
3d. The European, with the Caucasian.
4th. The American, with the Indian.
5th. The African, with the Negro.
6th. The Hottentot, with the Bushman.
7th. The East Indian, with the Malay.
8th. The Australian, with the Papuan.

Now, if man were less than six thousand years old, we should hav to suppose that all these races, so diverse in type and characteristics, hav all developed from Adam, or rather, to be more accurate, and supposing the story of the flood to be true, we hav to suppose all these races to hav developed from the family of Noah. Is not this a preposterous supposition?

To the Aryan races we are indebted for almost all our science and literature; while all the Semitic peoples may lay claim to having founded three of the most important religions of the world, viz., Christianity, Judaism, and Mohammedanism.

No student of anthropology, however, would think of regarding the Semitic races as the lineal descendants of the Aryan, or vice versa. These races are so distinct, their characteristics so marked, that they are not to be confused. Having shown that the Semitic races are descended from the Negroid type, and the Aryan from the Turanian, the late Professor J. W. Jackson, in an article in the Anthropological Review of 1869 (see "Freethinkers' Text-Book," Part I., page 57, by C. Bradlaugh) dealing with the Caucasian race, says: "What, then, is this Caucasian?

And we reply, the highest type to which man has yet attained. He presents us with that form of humanity in which cerebration and respiration are most powerful in proportion to alimentation and reproduction. He is the most effectually developed type of man; the one in whom the functions that are specially human are most powerful in proportion to those which are also bestial."

This, of course, implies an organic structure adapted as an instrument for the efficient discharge of these higher duties.

And, accordingly, we find that his brain is equal in volume to that of the Turanian, while it is superior in form and finer in quality; thus conducing, through intensity and activity, not only to greater mental power, but also to a power of a higher order. His thoughts are more logically concatenated, and his conceptions are more beautiful and artistic. His special superiority to the Turanian is, however, in the moral sentiments. He is better developed coronally, and hence is more amenable to the influence of "faith, hope, and charity," and we may add, justice. Thus, in a sense, it may be said that he unites the excellences of the two inferior races without the defects of either. He has the breadth of the Turanian without his coarseness, and the altitude of the negro without his narrowness, while in temperament he immeasurably transcends them both. Of course, with such a brain, so powerful in structure, so fine in quality, so complex in its convolutions, and so intense in its functions, there must be a face to correspond; that is, with features distinctly marked and delicately chiseled, and susceptible, in duly cultured individualities, of all the varying shades of intellectual expression:

But this high caste Caucasian, this man of civilization, is organically, lingually, and theologically, divisible into two well-marked families, Aryans and Semites, or Indo-Europeans and Arabians; the former especially located in Europe, and the latter in Asia, although the first are the predominant population of Persia and India, and the last extend throughout all northern Africa. It may thus be said that the Caucasian occupies the temperate zone of the world from India to Britain, with the Negroid races to the South and the Turanian to the North, the Semites resting on and through Moors, Tuaricks, Nubians, and Abyssinians, gradually shading off the former; while the Aryans rest on and through the Slavons, Muscovites, the Cossacks gradually shade off into the latter. Thus, whether whether we regard their geographical position, their mental constitution, or their organic specialties, we shall find that the Semites are allied as flower and root to the Negroid type of the South, and the Aryans to the Turanian type of the North.

It is too late in the day to attempt to prove that climatic conditions or congenital accidents will account for all the varieties of mankind having descended from one pair.

No one ever saw a negro or Indian child born of white parents, or a white child born of negro or Indian parents. With slight modifications, the Egyptian mummy displays the same type as the Egyptian of the present day; and for more than four thousand years the Chinese type has undergone no very important changes. And, if this be true, how can it be pretended that all the races of mankind hav developed from one pair of individuals less than six thousand years ago?

And, while the study of geology demonstrates the great age of the earth; paleontology, the vast antiquity of living forms, and anthropology shows us distinct types of man; comparativ anatomy, or, rather, what Haeckel calls ontogeny, reveals to us the history of the development by a study of the individual in the embryo.

The history of the individual in the embryo is really an epitomized history of the race.

And if we are to take the data relied upon by almost all scientific evolutionists, we shall be lead irresistibly to the conclusion that man is an evolution from lower forms; that there was a time in the remote past when he so nearly resembled the catarrhini apes that the name "man" would be a scarcely an appropriate term by which to describe him; and that by slow and gradual stages he developed from the very lowest form up to his present position.

And, taking this theory as the only reliable hypothesis, we find that we hav not to answer the question of the age of man as man, but are driven back and back through a long series of changes from man to the ape, from the ape to the amphioxus, from the amphioxus to the ascidian, and from the ascidian to the moneron; and with this vast field before us we scornfully throw aside the Biblical six thousand years, and cleave to the scientific view that man's origin and development are not to be measured by thousands of years, but by vast periods of time which the human mind is altogether unable to realize or understand.

A Difficult Task.

From the Christian at Work.

The church must proclaim to the Socialists, "What you need, what you ignorantly seek after, can only be found in the light of the gospel." And they must be able to demonstrate that it can be found there. Just now this is not a very easy task. If the victories of to-day are Christian victories, the failures are the failures of a professedly Christian people. The oppressions of large corporations with the indifference manifested towards individual right and the public welfare, and the insensate, heartless greed for gain are the fruits of corporate action directed by professedly Christian men.

A Liberal paper should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH.—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The "Lucifer Match."

I hav arisen while the stars are still visible, unable to sleep for thinking of the abominable outrage that in the name of justice has been and is being perpetrated upon E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman, who are still incarcerated in a prison cell and subjected to severities greater than those usually visited upon the most atrocious criminal. And for what? Every Liberal should pause and ask this question. Is it because they chose to make their own marriage contract? The Quakers do that, and it is recognized as legal. Why does the law, which winks at prostitution, the business of procurers, and all manner of outrages upon decency, on every hand seem to become so incensed, and wreak it dire vengeance upon this special couple, victimizing them in the most cruel manner? It is for this reason: Mr. Walker has been for years engaged in vigorous attacks upon the church, and its outrages upon the people, both by voice and pen, and these attacks are, if possible, to be stopped.

The church is wise enough to perceive, if some Liberals are not, that in no way can she continue to hold her power over the people, except by keeping woman in continued bondage, and thus, through the law of heredity, perpetuate a race of slaves.

It is only through the enslavement of woman in marriage that, in this age, a race can be begotten that will submit to the fetters forged by church and state. And a contract such as theirs, which guarantees to woman a "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," must not be tolerated. Here is the contract:

E. C. Walker, as one of the contracting parties, made the following statement:

"This is a time for clear, frank statement. While regarding ALL public marital ceremonies as essentially and ineradicably indelicate, a pandering to the morbid, vicious, and meddlesome element in human nature, I consider this form the least objectionable.

"I abdicate in advance all the so-called 'marital rights' with which this public acknowledgment of our relationship may invest me. Lillian is and will continue to be as free to repulse any and all advances of mine as she has been heretofore. In joining with me in this love and labor union, she has not alienated a single natural right. She remains sovereign of herself, as I of myself, and we severally and together repudiate all powers legally conferred upon husbands and wives.

"In legal marriage, woman surrenders herself to the law and her husband, and becomes a vassal. Here it is different. Lillian is now made free.

"In brief, and in addition: I cheerfully and distinctly recognize this woman's right to the control of her own person; her right and duty to retain her own name; her right to the possession of all property inherited, earned, or otherwise justly gained by her; her equality with me in this copartnership; my responsibility to her as regards the care of offspring, if any, and her paramount right to the custody thereof should any unfortunate fate dissolve this union. And now, friends, a few words especially to you. This wholly private compact is here announced, not because I recognize that you, or society at large, or the state hav any right to inquire into or determin our relations to each other, but simply as a guarantee to Lillian of my good faith toward her. And to this I pledge my honor."

Lillian Harman then responded as follows:

"I do not care to say much; actions speak more clearly than words, often. I enter into this union with Mr. Walker of my own free will and choice, and I agree with the views of my father and of Mr. Walker, as just expressed. I make no promises that it may become impossible or immoral for me to fulfil, but retain the right to act, always, as my conscience and best judgment shall dictate. I retain also my full maiden name, as I am sure it is my duty to do so.

"With this understanding I giv to him my hand in token of my trust in him and of the fidelity to truth and honor of my intentions toward him."

Then M. Harman said:

"As the father and natural guardian of Lillian Harman I hereby giv my consent to this union. I do not 'giv away the bride,' as I wish her always to be the owner of her person, and to be free always to act according to her truest and purest impulses, and as her highest judgment may dictate."

Then followed the usual congratulations.

Who was injured by this method? No one. And I hesitate not to affirm that, could the principles of that contract be actualized in the sex relations of men and women, it would take but few generations to produce a race of people that would be incapable of enslaving or being enslaved.

I am glad these two heroic souls refuse to pay any fines imposed upon them by their persecutors, thus refusing to recognize themselvs as criminals.

In the old Abolition days Foster, when arrested, would refuse to aid his captors in their injustice by even walking, and they were obliged to carry him. (See Parker Pillsbury's "Acts of the Antislavery Apostles.") I feel anxious all Liberals should realize the animus of these persecutions, and raise their protests against them.

Had Mr. Walker been some obscure individual, no notice would hav been taken of this affair, but with his influence against church domination in all affairs of life he must be suppressed

Our marriage system is based upon the church-idea of women's inferiority—is orthodoxy crystallized into law—and should be protested against by every Liberal who has brains enough to perceive it, the law of mutual contract being amply sufficient. What is the importance of the taxation of church property when compared with this continued sex slavery of women, and its effects upon offspring, producing, as it does, every species of crime, not excepting murder?

To giv an idea of the outrages perpetrated upon these two innocent persons, I will quote a part of a letter just received from Mrs. Lillian Harman:

We hav not been allowed to send out or receive letters for quite a while. It has been three weeks since I hav seen Edwin, and Housh has ordered the other prisoners to pass no notes between our cells. But if they think they can make us change our minds by such a course, they are mistaken. It simply strengthens our determination to endure to the last. Papa suffers more than I do, and I feel so sorry for him. It was hard to decide whether it was my duty to go with him or stay here, but I decided that the fine should not be paid. I hav chosen my course, and shall not depart from it. But my conscience troubles me when I look through the bars and see his eyes filling with tears as he talks to me, telling me he cannot sleep for thinking of me. But had I gone, it would hav been surrender, and I could never hav forgiven myself for my cowardice. In last Lucifer papa says that if he and Ed could hav known how the people were going to act, the union would not hav taken place in this state. But had I known it, I would hav been willing to take my part. I am glad that I did, and I would not do otherwise, could I recall the past. We send and receive letters when papa comes.

Thus this brave, heroic girl endures for conscience' sake week after week, with no prospect of an end, this awful imprisonment. She writes further: "Our case comes before the Supreme Court the 6th of January, but the decision will not be given, except by mere chance, until February. There is not more than one chance in ten that Judge Crozier's decision will be reversed."

And these things occur in the state of Kansas, a state that at one time we fought so earnestly to save from the clutches of a slave oligarchy, at the present time in the hands of an equally cruel and oppressiv power; a state that now deserves the contempt of all right-minded persons; a state that hunts fugitiv wives, and whose citizens pay, as I saw a short time since reported in the papers, a reward of fifty dollars for the return of a run-away wife to her owner, her husband. O Kansas, blush for shame at your degradation!

Let every lover of liberty keep out of Kansas, where freedom of speech and of the press is not respected, where the right of contract is denied, where fugitiv wives are hunted and returned for a ransom to their sexual bondage, where prohibition, with its war upon individuality and its cultivation of hypocrisy, is the law, and where church power rules triumphant, which always means persecution and intolerance, if not the rack and gibbet.

Progress in Missionary and Revival Work.

Pious Tourist: "Well, John, I suppose you are now a good Christian?" Converted Chinaman: "Me one good Chlistman? Ya-a-s. Me cuss, me lie, me git dlunk, all same Melican man; me no work on Sunday. 'F me steal, Chlist love me, Chlist pay—oh, you bet me damn good Chlistyan!"

SABINA, OHIO, December 25th.—Mrs. Robert Johnson, wife of a prominent farmer, was adjudged insane to-day. She became a raving maniac after attending a protracted meeting at Dakin's Chapel, conducted by Rev. Guilford, the Adventist, of Clyde, Ohio. She will be taken to the Dayton Asylum.

ADRIAN, Jan. 12th.—At the Second Baptist church last night, during a revival meeting, Mrs. Susan Brown, a colored member, was "taken with the power," and, springing to her feet, she shouted, "Glory, hallelujah!" The next instant she fell to the floor dead. A scene of great excitement, amounting almost to a panic, followed, and several women were seriously injured.

A Boston lady prominently identified with Sunday-school work, and who is much interested in bringing our Chinese residents within the pale of Christian influence, called the other day upon one of her celestial protegés. John welcomed her visit to his laundry with evident pleasure, and when the greetings were over the Mongolian, in response to her inquiry, gave her to understand that he enjoyed very much attending the Sunday-school, information that was exceedingly gratifying. Anxious, however, to receive more practical demonstration of the influence of the school upon him, she asked him if he did not think it did him good. "Yi, yi!" came the convincing response, "washee fol le whole conglegation."

The New York Sun reports: "Mr. Moody's recent meetings in Auburn, N. Y., hav been largely attended, and hav been of great profit to many citizens of that town. One of them is reported as saying: 'I will giv $10, and my partner will do the same, I know, to keep these meetings up a week longer. Mr. Moody draws people to the town who hav money to spend. They come into our store with their Auburn friends, see some of our fine goods, and perhaps goods they hav not seen at home, and we catch them for anywhere from $5 to $100. If they did not come with the intention of buying, and hav not funds, we ship the goods. The sale is sure, for in every instance we hav received a draft two or three days afterward. The trade brought by a circus doesn't compare with what we are having now.'"

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

A Useless Protest.

This is the objection of John Swinton's Paper—a journal to which the workingmen are more indebted for their organizations than to any other force—to the McGlynn fight:

"We protest most energetically against the recent attempt to drag religious controversy into the arena of labor. Nothing could be more disastrous to the great movement now in progress for the elevation of the working classes, and in which men of every race and creed, as well as men without creed, are beginning to take part. The work has been prosecuted hitherto without trenching upon any man's conscience, and thus only can it be carried to success—clearing the way as we advance, and overcoming the stumbling-blocks as they are met. We hav dreaded all along that the enemy would precipitate some ecclesiastical obstacle across our lines, behind which our forces would fall to fighting each other—thus confounding the forward march, and blasting the glorious hopes which hav been nursed and guarded with so much care. Woe betide the man who serves the enemy's purposes by raising distractions that must prove fatal to the unity of organized labor! Better, infinitly better, were it that good Father McGlynn had never left his altar than that he should be used as the agent for precipitating the obstacle upon which our united ranks are to be broken, in the warfare against social and industrial wrong."

Mr. Swinton has rather sharper eyes than are usually found in editorial sanctums, but he does not see very far in this business.

The suspension of Dr. McGlynn is not of itself a cause of war. It is only an incident, or the accident which may bring on the struggle inevitable between the church and labor. Catholicism is a vast repressiv force in society. The organization of labor is a vast expansiv force. When the two come in contact, something must crack. The evolution of society is not going to stop because the pope declines to get up out of his chair. Bulls against comets, and papal decrees against round worlds, never shortened a comet's tail nor put a corner on the earth.

Let the fight go on!

Religion in Prisons.

The Roman Catholic chaplain of the Connecticut state prison has published a report of his doings in the prison, and the claims he makes are interesting, because, if true, they show that the best raw material for Christians is found in prisons, and is composed of that too large class of people who are not, never were, and in all human probability never will be honest.

The chaplain reports that his prison parishioners attend mass numerously, that at Christmas and Easter Sunday they become possessed of an overwhelming desire to partake of the sacrament, "thus giving evidence of good will, an earnest perseverance in good, and the best proof of a lively practical Catholicity." The grace of God, adds the optimistic chaplain, "through the ministrations of his ministers, reconciles them to their fate, enables them to exercise self-control, and renders them docil and submissiv to the rules of the institution. It schools them so effectually to govern themselvs that when they return to the outer world, they, with few exceptions, liv as respectable law-abiding citizens."

If this priest could only be believed, that portion of the public out of jail might take heart, and look forward to the time when prisons would be comparativly uninhabited. But facts compel us to say that the priest is mistaken. Religion, so far, has never been a restraining force of sufficient power to deter its professors from committing crime. No profession turns out so large a proportion of rascals as the ministerial profession. The worst defaulters of the times hav been noted for the zeal with which they prosecuted their church-work. And the men who liv in state prisons—the common run of them—hav had a more or less perfect education in religion. The men who are complimented by this chaplain for their burning desire to partake of the sacraments, hav, most of them, been attendants upon church services before their incarceration. If religion in prison is so beneficent, why is it so unavailing out of prison? That it is valueless to prevent crime we know from the enormously large percentage of prisoners who hav had religious training previous to their downfall. And most of them are of the persuasion of our cheerful chaplain.

That religion renders convicts docil and submissiv is a matter of doubt. Remove the force of keepers from any one of our large penal institutions, and, even though the criminals attend mass regularly, and evince the liveliest interest in the sacramental proceedings, we think the jail would soon be a pandemonium. The most pious of them would not feel called to remain and expiate his crime, and if the prison were cleared without further felonies it would be a marvel. Catholic priests and Protestant ministers, who imagin that their ministrations are honestly loved by the rough element to whom they preach, do but delude themselvs. Every prison is full of Uriah Heeps, who think to curry favor with the authorities, to obtain concessions, and to secure a pardon, perhaps, by their outward appearance of religious fervor. Chapel, too, is a relief from the monotony of a cell, and, while there, it is no hard matter to feel religious. They believe thoroughly in Christianity—they were taught it when young—and nothing would be more natural than for a person doing enforced penance to feel contrition.

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be,
When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

But the contrite feelings produced by the more or less pathetic sermons of the chaplains do not last. It is easy for men to be good when they cannot be bad. But moral feelings produced by stone walls, armed keepers, and an appeal to religious sentiment, are like houses built on sand. The first wave of temptation washes clear over the sandbar, and sweeps away the flimsy structures. Prison reports show that a very large proportion of the men and women in state prisons are serving their second or third term. The Rogue's Gallery is a list of persons who liv in crime, notwithstanding the ministrations of the ministers they hav been forced to listen to while temporarily restrained from plying their trade. No matter how zealous they may hav been to feast upon the blood and body of Christ, or how frequent their attendance upon mass, as soon as they possess physical freedom they ignore the promised other world punishments, and go back to their evil ways. Hell is too far off to be a potent force for practical righteousness.

It is one of the demands of Liberalism that the employment by the state of chaplains for prisons shall cease. Aside from the injustice of compelling those who do not believe in Christianity to pay for teaching it to criminals, there is the strongest possible reason for discontinuing the practice—and that is its inutility. It does no good. It is absurd to deal out to prisoners the same religious platitudes that hav proved so lamentably insufficient upon the very same persons when out of prison. As well might a perverse doctor continue to dose a patient with a medicin that has been found by experiment to be useless or worse. A change of treatment is absolutely necessary. And the treatment which will be found best for those who are morally sick will be education. Most of the state prison inhabitants are ignorant. For learned rascals there is little hope of reformation. But ignorant criminals, unless inheriting the predilection for crime, can often be made useful citizens. From the reformatory in this state, where education is made absolutely compulsory, and diligence in study (and progress according to the capacity of the prisoner) is made a condition of release from durance, there are annually paroled and discharged scores of men to fill useful positions in society who, had they been confined in state prison with no instruction but such as Protestant or Catholic chaplains deal out, would instead become professional criminals and a source of trouble and expense to the community. These men are taught practical secular knowledge, the three R's, and the higher branches, and those best fitted such trades as telegraphy, stenography, carpentry, and other specific industries. Practical morality is a study diligently pursued; and in this the teachings of Socrates are of as high authority as those of Jesus. The mind, the body, the moral nature, are simultaneously educated. Religion plays a very subordinate part, and is taught in the most general way. Sectarianism is carefully excluded. The result is a good percentage of permanently reformed men.

In state prisons the opposit system is pursued—hard labor, no education, and plenty of sectarian Christianity, the Protestant and Catholic teachers taking turns at the unfortunate men. As a consequence, most of the prisoners go out only to shortly return to their cell, to labor, to mass and the sacraments. A "state prison bird" who has been given theology as his only moral food, the fear of hell and an angry God as his only incentiv to do right, and yet reforms, is the exception and not the rule. And any Catholic priest who for his own glory reports to the contrary reports what is not so.

Is it Hopeless?

Under the heading of "Not Peace, but a Sword," the New York Sun says:

"Of all the delusiv and misleading talk that is now bestowed on the public by various statesmen, we should say that this sentence from the inaugural address of Governor Green of New Jersey, belongs at the top: 'There is no natural conflict between labor and capital.'

"This might be true in such a world as ideal Christian reformers would like to see, but it is not true in the world we hav.

"In the nature of things the conflict between capital and labor is perpetual. On one side it may be waged with wisdom and benevolence, or with merciless oppression; and on the other side with patience, with resignation, or with resentment and violence; but it goes on constantly. The conflict between capital and labor is the perennial conflict between buyer and seller, and we can see no reason why it should not continue until the time comes when the precepts of Christ are brought into genuin, unqualified, and universal practice, when all men will strive not to see how much they can get for themselvs, but how much they can do for their neighbors."

What is the use of talking about the precepts of Christ, when the facts recited are staring everybody in the face? The world had ideal Christianity —that is, a lot of crackbrained vagabonds, helping each other to be miserable—for three centuries, since when it has had worldly Christianity for fifteen more bloody and dreary centuries. There is no healing balm in the gospels for the sores of society, and if the world must wait for the Christian millennium for labor and capital to harmonize, then truly is the conflict perennial.

But supposing we see what science and humanity can do before settling down into incurable pessimists. The Gods hav failed; let man try his hand.

The Dilemma of Mr. Walker's Friends.

So far as the law has been quoted, the judge who sentenced E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman was wrong. His decision that the two persons were married legally, and that a further contract of the same kind by either party would render him or her liable to the law against bigamy, makes the punishment inflicted legal tyranny, for no law was cited punishing parties who are really married, but who hav neglected some prescribed form. Bonafide marriage is what the state demands, and that it had in the self-performed ceremony by which E. C. Walker took Miss Harman for better or for worse. The question whether legal marriage is a good or bad thing does not enter into this case. Mr. Walker and Miss Harman claim to be married; a marriage vow was the intention of the ceremony, and the judge decides that they are married. That settles the question so far, and clears the ground for another look ahead.

The two prisoners are now confined in jail, the one because his sentence is unexpired, the other because she will not pay the costs of her trial. Everyone admits that the sentences are unjust for the reasons given above. They are simply being punished for marrying in their own way, when the law does not prescribe such punishment, but does declare such contracts legal. The decision of the trial judge was asinin. However, Mr. Walker and his wife are in jail, and what shall they do about it?

The first feeling of every one suffering an injustice is to fight. The feeling is natural and commendable. People ought to fight injustice much more than they do. But there is reason in all things. No man could be blamed for joining the Catholic church when the screws were on his thumbs. The dungeon was too much for the fortitude of even Galileo. Mr. Walker and Miss Ha man hav suffered enough, and hav done all that honest and consistent adherence to principle requires. Longer self-incarceration might be misconstrued into obstinacy. A jail is no place for a pure woman and an honest man. There is no principle demanding the sacrifice. Nothing is to be gained. The supreme court has the case, and its decision can be rendered without their further imprisonment. If people are seeking to reform any law or custom, it can usually be better done out of jail than in. There is no dishonor in surrendering to brute force—no sacrifice of principle—and there is no common sense in biting one's nose off to spite the face. Supposing that in Mr. Reynolds's case the jury convict, and the court fines him. Is there any sacrifice of Liberalism in paying that fine, and getting out of the clutches of men who persecute for opinion's sake? Mr. Reynolds can spread Liberalism faster by lecturing than by contracting rheumatism from damp prison walls. The nineteenth century has had its martyrs to principle, and may hav others, but there is little sense in voluntarily staying in jail to convert a lot of fools who havn't brains enough to appreciate the act.

If the supreme court does not reverse the rulings of the lower court, then Mr. Walker's friends should appeal to the governor to remit the costs, if that is legal. But if no other way opens, the costs should be paid. Especially should the imprisoned girl be released. Mr. Walker is of mature mind, and can better judge whether he is likely to advance his cause faster confined at Oskaloosa or free to go where he pleases. At any rate, Mrs. Walker's and Mr. Walker's friends might assume the responsibility of freeing them, as did Mr. B. R. Tucker's friends when he heroically defied his great bugaboo, the state, by refusing to pay taxes. Mrs. Severance calls loudly for Liberals to do something for the imprisoned; but what can they do? They cannot tear down the Oskaloosa jail. They cannot reverse the decision of the court. They cannot force the supreme court to free him. Mr. Walker is fighting for the right to marry himself. Some Liberals agree with him; the majority are quite content to hav the ceremony performed by a civil officer in whose forms there is no superstition. The only point upon which they can agree is the injustice done the Walkers in imprisoning them after the decision that in marrying themselvs they kept within their legal rights.

The most sensible course, then, is to submit to the extortion and get out of jail. When free, they can renew the warfare for whatever principle is dearest to them. But whichever way Mr. Walker decides is best for himself, he should insist upon his wife's liberation. His advice would probably hav weight with her.

A Liberal paper should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH.—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Row in the Catholic Church.

The fight over Dr. McGlynn continues. Another priest has taken charge of the parish, and the parishioners hav resolved not to support in any manner their new spiritual director. The labor unions hav held a mass meeting and denounced Archbishop Corrigan with language lurid and energetic. Henry George has printed another number of his paper, and uses over one-eighth of it in considering the case. Mr. George now hates the Romish hierarchy as ardently as he loved Catholic voters before election.

The efforts of his friends, however, will not avail Dr. McGlynn. We are much mistaken if even the most devoted of his parishoners does not weaken in his allegiance when the authorities put the ecclesiastical screws upon the lay thumb. A refusal of church privileges—confession, absolution, sacraments, burial rites—to be followed by excommunication, will bring most of the Catholics of St. Stephen's parish to their knees. The new priest, noted as a strict disciplinarian, will not hesitate to use this measure if necessary to subdue the teapot tempest. Martin Luthers are not abundant around Twenty-eighth street, and a few months, probably, will see St. Stephen's filled again with superstitious worshipers.

For the vehement rebuke Mr. Corrigan received from the leaders of the labor unions, he will care little. Still less will the pope care for the abuse that incidentally falls upon him. The hierarchy has a purpose and it is not to be easily turned aside. If the Catholic flock cannot be ruled, it is of no practical value to the church authorities, and might as well be ruined. The Labor leaders wasted their breath in trying to save Dr. McGlynn.

Henry George's assault is not with new weapons, but it would prove a serious blow to the church if the Protestants of this city could be induced to believe him, and to act upon their belief. Mr. George charges that Archbishop Corrigan acted at the instance of Tammany Hall; that for a long series of years the church has been in alliance with this corrupt organization, and for votes given has received large grants of public land at nominal prices, and a lavish appropriation of public money; that it is highly significant that Corrigan never interfered with Dr. McGlynn until a new party arose which threatened to defeat Tammany; that the vicar-general of this diocese was permitted to issue a pronunciamento against the workingmen's candidate, which was distributed at the church doors; that priests were permitted to speak against the Labor party from their altars; and that the power of the confessional and the threat of the refusal of absolution were used against the party which opposed the Tammany ring.

As we said, these are not practices of the Romish church now for the first time brought to light. Henry George is but going over a well traveled road—and one over which THE TRUTH SEEKER has gone so often as to wear a path for itself. We hope, however, that because of his well known piety Mr. George will be more successful than we hav been in arousing public sentiment. But we doubt it. The Methodist official organ applauds the declination of Bourbon Romanists to attend social gatherings where Henry George is invited, and evidently sympathizes with the Romish church authorities in their efforts to maintain disciplin in the priestly ranks. "Prudence," says the organ, "appears to be a quality which Mr. George has yet to acquire," and "there is one thing Protestants can learn from Roman Catholics—to be true to their religion." Should the other Protestants follow this lead, Mr. George will find himself between the devil and the deep sea, and will hav to take to the woods. Protestant hierarchies, as well as Roman Catholic, hav authority to maintain.

There is one person prominently connected with this conflict who deserves a crown. Dr. McGlynn is a moral hero. We hav seen nothing to indicate that he believes less in the Catholic faith than at any previous period of his life, but his correspondence with Archbishop Corrigan shows him to be possessed of an independent spirit. When Dr. McGlynn was handed the telegram ordering him to Rome, he said simply, "No reply." When, a few days later, the archbishop addressed him requesting a reply to the message, Dr. McGlynn wrote, refusing to go, and added: "My doctrin about the land has been made clear in speeches, in reported interviews, and in published articles, and I repeat it here. I hav taught and I shall continue to teach, in speeches and writings, as long as I liv, that land is rightfully the property of the people in common, and that private ownership of land is against natural justice, no matter by what civil or ecclesiastical laws it may be sanctioned, and I would bring about instantly, if I could, such change of laws all the world over as would confiscate private property in land, without one penny of compensation to the miscalled owners." The italicizing is by the archbishop, who makes the correspondence public. Again was Dr. McGlynn summoned from Rome, and the archbishop invited him to come to see him and read the summons. Dr. McGlynn's reply was, "I will not come to see you," and, "I will not go to Rome."

Though disagreeing with his political and religious opinions, one cannot help admiring the independent attitude of the rebellious priest. He has no use for the ecclesiastical despot of Madison avenue and no fear of the other despot at Rome. Of course Dr. McGlynn will suffer ecclesiastical degradation, and his career as a priest is probably ended forever, but he has preserved his manhood and the independence of an American citizen.

Summed up, this row teaches one lesson that the Labor party, and all connected with it, may well take to heart: That any movement of the masses toward cutting loose from old associations and forming new ones with the purpose of leveling existing social inequalities, will hav the opposition of all Christian churches. A few heretically inclined preachers like Newton—who has abandoned about everything of Christianity but the salary—may come out for the new order, but the churches as a body will be against it always and forever, until forced to swing around by the flood of public opinion. The American churches were the bulwark of American chattel slavery, and they will be the bulwark of American industrial slavery until a revolution in public sentiment shall take place. The leaders of any new movement must therefore address themselvs to the people regardless of churches. Especially is this true of Labor leaders. Almost every Protestant minister is the paid attorney of wealth. Every priest is an oath-bound soldier in an army sworn to conquer the Western world, and to gain as much of the Eastern world as is possible. The churches want the earth, and they are not over-particular how they get it. There is no bond of union between them and poverty. Their charity is doled out with pharisaical humility to help their own chances for heaven. Their asylums shelter the poor in the same spirit that a jailer throws a crust to a prisoner. Individual Christians may be humane and good people, but the official utterance of every powerful church is on the side of tyranny. There is no exception that we know of. If those who conceive themselvs wronged are going to right themselvs, they must expect to fight Christendom, or, at least, that portion of it which is Christian.

The cause of the wrong that labor has suffered from the church lies deeper than any Labor orator or writer has yet sounded. The fault is in the system of religion, not in the men who administer it. The late Labor candidate for mayor of New York would do well to make a note of this.

Letters from Friends.

A Liberal paper should be perfectly kind and candid. In discussion there is no place for hatred, no opportunity for slander. A personality is always out of place. An angry man can neither reason himself nor perceive the reason of what another says.

Above all, and over all, a Liberal paper should teach the absolute freedom of the mind, the utter independence of the individual, the PERFECT LIBERTY OF SPEECH.—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

HANOVER JUNCTION, PA., Jan. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see from the tab on my paper that my time is up; and as I cannot do without the dear old paper, I must renew again. So here goes for two more years. May she ever liv to keep her readers in remembrance of her founder. JAMES B. DENTON.

ABILENE, KAN., Dec. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER from Feb. 20, 1887, to Feb. 20, 1888.

I would rather do without one meal a day than do without the grand and welcome TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you all the success imaginable in your work for humanity,

J. BEETEM WISE.

DAYTON, O., Jan. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Liberal, having preached seven years, and ceased in 1845, and lectured one year on the constitution of man. I went into the war and lost my health, and am now a twelve-dollar pensioner. I was admitted to the National Soldiers' Home near Dayton, Ohio, and began preaching Liberal views to the inmates, four or five thousand in number. That was in the fall of '75; the chaplain of the home was then getting eighteen hundred dollars per year for preaching endless hell and damnation doctrins. SEVEN RECORDS.

DUCK LAKE, Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 20, 1886, is an article written by C. D. Wallace entitled, "Earthquakes and Volcanoes," in which he refers to the volcano Skaptar Jokul. I would like to know where the volcano is. In what country is it? I hav looked thoroughly for it, but fail to find it. I never heard of the volcano before, and wish he would tell us through the columns of your paper where I will find it, and oblige an earnest INQUIRER.

[To save time and space we may say that Skaptar Jokul is a volcanic mountain in Southeast Iceland. It is sometimes written Skapta Jökul—jökul being the Icelandic word for glacier.—ED. T. S.]

MT. VERNON, MO., Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.75, to be applied as per inclosed list.

We are cast in a land of sky-pilots. There are five gospel mills in our town, and they grind the year round. We get along handsomely, however; they let us severely alone; havn't had a spat for a long while. But we still need the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and expect to take it as long as the necessary funds can be had.

We hope all your delinquents will pay up (or cease to call themselvs Liberals) and make this the most prosperous year the "king of papers" has ever had. Hurrah for Heston and the cartoons! they are just immense. Z. C. DENNEY.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Jan. 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday Samuel P. Putnam lectured before the Pittsburgh Secular Society on "The New God." This lecture is one of Brother Putnam's best, which ought to be praise enough, but it is so original, and I may add so radical, that I desire to call special attention to it in hopes that your readers may call for it frequently.

At 8 P.M. Mr. Putnam lectured in Wilson's Hall, in Allegheny City, on "True Democracy." This lecture was a masterly defense of individual liberty as opposed to monopolistic aggression, and gave general satisfaction.

Brother Putnam is alive all over, and if he does not set the prairies on fire (figurativly) it will not be his fault.

Yours truly, HARRY HOOVER.

LONGMONT, COL., Jan. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading Colonel Kelso's book, "Spiritualism Sustained," and I find it the most complete cutting from under of the prevailing orthodox beliefs that it has been my privilege to peruse. How the ordinary Christian can read this book and remain such is more than I can comprehend. It seems to me that anyone whose occiput is mounted with an intellect must, after analyzing Mr. Kelso's arguments, become a Spiritualist or a sadducee believing in neither angel nor spirit—to wit, a Materialist; and in either case there is an advantage to Liberalism.

I am somewhat surprised to find some of our friends criticising the colonel because he has not advanced what would be proof to them of the truth of Spiritualism, when he expressly states that the work was not written for any such purpose, but to make the churches accept the logic of their own book or reject the book itself; the latter alternativ being what no Liberal would object to. The colonel does not depend upon the truth or falsity of the writings he introduces in evidence for his belief in Spiritualism, but he is taking the writings upon which the churches rely to confound them. That he may some day giv to the readers of your paper his reasons for becoming a Spiritualist is not impossible, but knowing how long and how persistently he held on to his Materialistic belief, he may doubt the expediency of so doing; besides, as he is pretty certain that Materialists will be on the right side of the practical questions of this life, it doesn't so much matter what they believe as to another so that they are truly Liberal.

By all means buy and read Colonel Kelso's book; read it and lend it to your neighbors, is my advice to the readers of your valuable paper. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

MCLOUTH, KAN., Jan. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Within please find money order to pay for the most valuable paper published in America—a paper whose value cannot be computed in dollars and cents. The illustrations are all that any of the friends of mental liberty hav claimed for them. I hav tried hard for two months to raise a club for your paper, but the two names within are all that I can send you at present. Hard times, high price of paper, and fear of ostracism are the reasons for failure to forward names. The fear of hell, and the frowns of the pious saints who are running the new Jerusalem, the awful dread of being called an Infidel, the knowledge that when once branded as a Freethinker you will forever be shunned by all the heavenly hosts on their happy journey to heaven, is a sufficient terror to make the ordinary mortal tremble.

J. F. WILLITS.

CRITTENDEN, ARIZ., Jan. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: When I last sent in my subscription, I desired the paper should be promptly stopped at expiration of subscription. In bidding you adieu for the present, I wish to bear testimony to the general excellence the paper has attained the last year. I also wish to thank you for the brave and noble defense you made for the rights of the Anarchists. It does not take much moral courage to stand up for the popular; but for the unpopular, there's the rub. It looks as though you would not only hav to publish a diagram of an idea, but the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States also, with a commentary on the same. Strange those orthodox Liberals can't see that if free speech is broken down a free press will be the next object of attack; but they are not wholly to blame, as the Associated Press dispatches hav deceived them by lying "late, early, and often." F. A. LAMONT.

EATON, O., Jan. 2, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—$2.50 for a new subscriber. Your Letters from Friends column has always been a great source of enjoyment to me. They (the letters) cultivate a feeling of brotherly love among the scattered forces of the Liberal army, a feeling necessary to the success of the many objects in view.

Freethought is a dormant element in this section of the state. The church has been so long the molder of opinion that it seems almost impossible to break her shackles. However, we hav a few scattered brethren, a number large enough to form a nice little union, if we only had a Remsburg or a Putnam to giv us a few lectures and organize us. No one here seems to want to take the lead on account of the anthemas he would most assuredly receive, but the ice once broken the followers would be forthcoming regardless of public opinion, or the venom of the sky-pilots.

F. R. CHRISTMAN.

BIG STONE CITY, DAK., Jan. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This is my first attempt at addressing you, and I presume the last, as I am quite an old man, of sixty-three years, and in quite poor health. I inclose $5. I wish you to send me the new year's ALMANAC, credit $3 on old year's account, and send paper for balance as far as it goes.

Our country is bankrupt owing to mismanagement of our officers supported by our churches. We hav a goodly number of Liberals here—some able men, all honorable. We hav had no lectures here but by Mr. E. C. Walker. He was well received, and kept his new "ism" in the background. I am glad he did so, as we are carrying too many improvements at present to succeed. It don't answer to approach the public too harshly on new subjects; still, I feel like giving the dishonest ones "hell" at times, but I hav only to look back a few years to see myself standing shoulder to shoulder with them, fighting the (to me) battles of the Lord, so I hav charity for them, as I wish them to hav for me.

Your pictures are wonderful; keep them up.

R. JONES.

MT. ALTON, PA., Jan. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper has become an indispensable necessity in our household, but No. 50, Dec. 11th, came crumpled and torn, and the front page, containing Remsburg's glorious, instructiv, and convincing "Fathers of Our Republic," was missing. Probably it passed through the hands of the same loving Christian mail-agent who opened a package of pen-work for us about that time and robbed it of two Catholic Lord's Prayers.

Three years ago a young lady renounced her church (Catholic) and proclaimed her Infidelity, and great was her persecution ever after. One pious, good soul said to her, "Don't, for God's sake, reveal the confession, as it will injure the holy mother church." Another dear, angelic damsel made it her precious duty to inform the young woman that it was the duty of her parents to make way with her at once, for she is doing great damage to the church revealing their holy secrets. Another sweet-tempered creature said, "Shure, if the church could hav her own way, they would burn that heretic to the stake." Another chimed in her beautiful voice, "Ah, to be shure, she's a divvel and she ought to hav a rope tied around her and dragged through the streets until she is dead; then burn her, so the witch cannot liv!"

Last June a woman rumseller (selling without license) who lived in this vicinity, being very religiously inclined, cherished a pious thought that she would rank higher in the eternal realm and wear a brighter crown were she to perform one great duty her savior revealed to her—if she would remove a great stumbling-block to Christianity, a notorious Infidel. To prepare for the glorious cause she imbibed freely of the holy spirits (in which she dealt) with prayer and praise upon her lips. She was prepared for the sacrifice of the Infidel and his family to the Lord. It was a clear, calm night when the angel of mercy crept stealthily along until she reached the door of the blasphemer, and there she halted for prayer. She thought a match and a few combustibles were sufficient to relieve the world of one great drawback. To her consternation, she found the Lord in the enemy's ranks. She was detected. Her present headquarters is Canada. And, instead of removing the notorious Infidel, the town was rid of a notorious den of infamy. MRS. E. A. FAIROHILD.

BARTRAM, DAKOTA TER.

MR. EDITOR: As many of your letters from friends giv their opinions of the cartoons, I will giv mine. I think the question should not be what we like best ourselvs, but how to exert the greatest influence for good on our friends. Many of us stand almost alone among our relativs. We know how to prize the glorious light of Freethought, reason, and common sense, while our friends are still in the darkness of superstition. We know how to sympathize with them, for we hav been there ourselvs. Now, it seems to me that sound arguments, like those of John Peck, Watts, and others, will set more people to thinking than ridicule, which is considered by most Christians as a sort of martyrdom. If all Freethinkers would stand up for their principles, and do as Christians do, preach the gospel of common sense to every creature, priestcraft and superstition would soon be no more. I am sure if all young persons could hav a chance to investigate both sides before they are gobbled up by the church, the church would never get them, or, at least, very few. Giv us plenty of good common sense tracts and lectures for free distribution, and we will make converts to Liberalism.

C. STRATTON.

DENVER, IOWA, Jan. 8, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav sent you a Happy New Year before, but "better late than never;" so you will find $5 inclosed (if some post-office pirate does not jay-hawk it) to pay my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year and next. Should I be under the sod or over the river before the time expires, send the paper along, for somebody else will get it. I am in my sixty-fifth year, but can well enjoy Brother Heston's delineations. I am sorry, however, that he didn't hav Noah and his family feeding the animals in the ark, or cleaning out the stalls, and throwing the filth out of that little window.

I see there is occasionally one, even among your readers, who has not yet evoluted out of illiberality, but can still apologize for Jeffrey judges and aristocratic domination. Before the Rebellion we warned the people of the coming storm, but little attention was paid to it, and for the wrong to four million black slaves one million lives were sacrificed. What sacrifice shall atone for fifty million white slaves? Bear in mind that between liberty and aristocracy there is an eternal and irrepressible conflict—an enmity that can only be satisfied with the destruction of one or the other. Their final grapple will be a death grapple. A billion dollars' worth of church property untaxed; $346,000,000 greenbacks, and a still greater amount of so-called national currency untaxed, thus throwing the burden of taxation upon the laboring classes, and also compelling them to pay large dividends on hundreds of millions of watered stocks, to make the rich still richer. With legislativ bodies bought like hogs and sheep in the market, with the press a ring, courts in chains, judges and juries bribed, what means hav the people to reform and correct wrongs and abuses but by revolution? If by peaceable means the great wrongs which are crushing the producing classes are to be righted, it must be done quickly. Another "impending crisis" is at hand—another great storm approaches. Tyranny cannot avert it, but will only hasten and aggravate it. When the laboring classes can no longer endure the burdens so wrongly imposed upon them, like the Israelites, they will march through the Red Sea.

Truly yours, M. FARRINGTON.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., Jan. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just completed a scrap-book and named it the "Crimes of Preachers." It is made up from clippings taken from the daily papers during the past year. I hav the names of seventy-three of God's chosen leaders who hav fallen from grace during the year 1886, and hav one for every other day for this year. Out of the seventy-three names, the church to which fifty-five of them belonged is given. Catholics come first, and number sixteen; Methodists second, and number fifteen; Baptists third, and number eight, and the balance are divided up between the different denominations. It is not supposed that I hav collected over ten per cent of the crimes published, or that even that number of their crimes ever found their way into the papers. What class of men can make a better showing than those chosen by God? I am a Liberal, and, what is more, I am a Spiritualist; but I hav no more use for a God, hell, devil, Christianity, or old orthodoxy than I had when I was an Infidel. I am a Spiritualist after years of investigating, and during the past four years one of the members of my own family has been a medium, and my chances for investigating the phenomena hav been unsurpassed; no conditions required; no darkened rooms and no money ever received, therefore deception is at a discount and fraud impossible. My wife and I are the only outspoken Liberals in this place that we know of, and it is a city of thirty thousand inhabitants. We never force our views upon any one, but when we are asked for our opinion or our views we always express them without fear. A few Sunday evening's ago we were asked our opinion by some member of the church in the parlor of the hotel where we are living. While no one in the place has more friends than we had, I am sure they all think more of us after hearing us express our views, and this is the way we gave it to them: We believed this world would be incomplete without Ingersoll, and thought he was a better man than Jesus Christ, and a great deal smarter. We loved the name of Paine, and had not these men lived we would not hav dared to express our opinions as we had just done. We did not believe in a God, hell, devil, Jesus, or the Bible.

To say they were surprised would not half express it. They all said they had never heard any one express such views before. THE TRUTH SEEKER, with several Spiritual papers, is read every week, and they are always mailed or passed around among our orthodox friends. Some say they are afraid to read them for fear it will cause them to think, and that they are afraid to think for fear of losing their faith in Jesus. This part of the country is as far behind the North, East, and West in Liberal thought as it is in manufacturing and agricultural pursuits. S. M. BIDDISON.

LYNDON, ILL., Jan. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In Professor Denslow's reply to George Dyrenforth's criticism, TRUTH SEEKER, Jan. 1st, he uses this language: "The value of land is due to the demand of society, and not mainly to any labor done upon it by its owner. But so are all values, whether of goods or of labor itself, due to the social demand for them, not to the expenditure of force or effort in producing them."

In your comments in the same issue you use the following: "It is true that the books are the product of Mr. George's genius, but it often requires as much genius to buy land judiciously as to write a book, and the value of either depends, as Professor Denslow says, on the demand of society."

Is this true? Does the value of either or both depend on the demand of society? As far as the land is concerned, this is true, I will admit. And it is true for the same reason that the Russian edition of the Nihilistic romance, "What's To Be Done?" is worth $600, while the translated American edition is worth $1 in cloth. With this difference, society can get along without the romance, but cannot exist without land. The Russian edition of this romance is under ban. In other words, limited to that which has already been published, and the demand of society advanced the price to $600, because limited. And so the same way with land. Humanity or society being unlimited, land being limited, there is a continual increasing demand for land, and thus to the means of subsistence. But surely this cannot apply to Mr. George's books, because they are being published, as it were, to an unlimited extent, or as the demands of society require; and the price or value does not depend upon the demands of society, for his books can be bought at just as low a price as they ever could, although to-day the demand for them is probably a thousandfold greater than when first published. I use the word "price," as I infer that is what Professor Denslow and THE TRUTH SEEKER mean in using the word "value," as the word "value," when applied to land, or books, or commodities, may hav two meanings.

Professor Denslow further says, "Value originates in demand." Then daily papers must be of great value, as they are in great demand. So they are of great value, but not as far as price is concerned. I will giv you a definition of values, which can be applied either to land, labor, or commodities: The value of a thing depends upon the demand of society correlativ with the facts, whether the thing demanded can be furnished in limited or unlimited quantities, and the labor required to acquire the right to appropriate the thing demanded.

Thus it will follow, Can the thing demanded be furnished in unlimited quantities? Labor will be the greatest factor in giving it value. Can it be furnished only in limited quantities? The demand will be the greater factor in giving it value. And so it is—land being limited, the demand for it continually increasing with the increase of society and its desires, must necessarily depend for its value (under present conditions) upon the demand; whereas, books and other commodities usually to be furnished in unlimited quantities, must depend for their value, to greatest extent, upon the labor value in their production. O. H. BARTHEL.

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday evening Mr. Charles Watts, of Toronto, Canada, was in our city and gave a lecture on "Morals and Religion" at the People's Theater. The audience was a small one consisting of one hundred or one hundred and fifty people of both sexes. Why was this? The weather was all right, and nothing else of any importance was going on in the city. The admission was of no account—10, 20, and 30 cents—so that many people could hav been there if they only could hav known it. The reason that there was such a poor audience, and the reason that the Freethinkers' societies of our Forest City don't amount to much, I will endeavor, with your kind permission, to explain in your valuable paper.

But first, about Mr. Watts's lecture: Why was there such a small audience? Because there had been no advertisment about it that would amount to something. I myself did not know before last Sunday that Mr. Watts was in the city; also, the People's Theater is, in my opinion, no place at all to lecture. It is badly located and dangerous in case of fire; ugly and commonly furnished, and during the week it is visited mostly by people of the lower class and dudes and dudesses. But, nevertheless, if Mr. Watts had done more to announce his intention to lecture to the people through the city papers, I am certain he would hav had a full house. Mr. Watts's lecture was a very good one, and if we would only hav lectures like his a little more often in our city I am sure that it would not only be to the benefit of members of our Union, but the lecturer too. It is very seldom that we hear a Secularist in Cleveland, and we notice with regret that Mr. S. P. Putnam is not coming to our town. The organization of Freethinkers in Cleveland is not the best one. The Liberal League has not met for the last five weeks, and so of the Secular Union too. Very little you hear from them. This is not a good record for a city with two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, where surely are ten thousand Freethinkers who could be organized if the members of the League and Union would be a little more activ.

In opposition to this, look at the religious people of Cleveland and see how hard they are working to increase their membership; and they are successful too. A week ago last Sunday, for information, I attended one meeting of the Methodist church at the New Music Hall, and was surprised to see the Sunday-school filled up to the last place. The minister, after a long sermon full of nonsense, asked every Christian in the audience to rise. The remaining ones he called out, and spoke to them about hell and heaven and all the good things they would get if they would join his congregation. He was successful with every one of them except myself, and after leaving the church I gave one of the members who accosted me such a piece of my mind about himself and his companion that he couldn't say another word, but promised he would pray for me.

Well, nevertheless, it is hard to see how the chuch is successful with lies and nonsense, where we with the truth can't do anything because we are too helpless and not organized enough. Lecturers like Mr. Ingersoll and Watts or Mr. Putnam are what we need, and a little more free distribution of our principles and we will be more successful than the church. Why should it not be possible, even in Cleveland, with its hundreds of churches and not one hall for the Freethinkers and Secularists? If our Liberal League would be a little more activ, to-day we would hav one of the finest Union sections in the country. FRED L. HOFFMAN.

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We are pleased to inform our Liberal friends that our meeting has been a success. We engaged Mr. S. P. Putnam to deliver his lecture on "Universal Mental Liberty," and did considerable advertising, and to our surprise had an audience of from three hundred to three hundred and fifty, and, in the opinion of some, four hundred.

This was gratifying. To see the smiles of the Liberals that happened in late, as their eyes were greeted by a finely filled house of pleasant-looking people, was indeed a pleasure. The lecture was followed by the poem, pathetic and beautiful, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand.?"

After the lecture came a few remarks relativ to the intentions and designs of the society and the means used, with a reading of our Liberal platform, and after that again the names were taken of different persons wishing to become members, which we take pleasure in sending you. We learned that many did not giv us their names, fearing that the same were to be published in the news columns, but we still think that there are numbers enough to please the officials of our organization with a feeling that Columbus will be a star in a free country yet.

A few TRUTH SEEKERS distributed along on the seats of the hall were grasped up with the eagerness that follows a famin, and not only read but smiled over, and many more were called for than could be furnished. The Liberal publications offered at the desk in front were surrounded by a crowd of both ladies and gentlemen, who purchased a goodly number.

One pleasant feature, and one that we wish to do all that we can to continue, was the large proportion of ladies that we were thankful to see out. Not only was the proportion large, but their enthusiasm was cheering. Women are wearying of the lullaby of "inspiration" without really knowing what it is that wearies them. They want to say something about their right to cast a ballot, and as many Christians are with them, they think it is "Christian" to enlighten them and do not believe that the scripture says—in the New Testament, too—"Suffer not a woman to teach," "Let her learn in silence," and teaches her humility in other ways, much too embarrassing for intelligence.

A scientific course of lectures was announced to follow the lecture of Mr. Putnam, beginning January 23d, on the subject of either astronomy or geology. Music is to be added to the attraction.

We take this means of thanking the evening Dispatch for its just and favorable notice of the event, as well as the Ohio State Journal, and any other paper extending the hand of fairness; also to the Liberal Odd Fellows, who were so kind as to lay aside their difference of opinion and grant us their elegant hall for the purpose of our lecture for the 16th. Gentlemen, take new zeal, and receive our assurance that you will find more friends after some advertising than you had thought would be in your whole community.

Very respectfully, R. H. RALSTON.

WORCESTER, MASS., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Living away off here in Massachusetts, I had labored under the idea that Kansas was a free state, but it seems as though I was mistaken, as many a better and wiser man has been before. My attention has been called very forcibly to the fact by reading the continued persecution and imprisonment on the part of the state authorities of our sister state toward Mr. Walker and his noble companion. Ah, but, says one, they broke the laws of the state. Well, what of that? Show me a man or woman that does not. Why, out here in staid, Puritanic old Massachusetts one would not liv over eight hours if he obeyed all the laws on our statute books. Many, very many, of our judges do not even know them. I saw a lawyer win a case in the Central District Court of Worcester, only last week, owing to the ignorance of the judge and opposing counsel. But standing at this distance and viewing the case, it seems as though there was an under-current at work in the case of these two grand reformers. Being co-workers and partners in one of the most outspoken and fearless papers of the age, ever helping the weak and downtrodden, battling with all the forces at its command against bigotry and superstition, the champion of woman in her endeavors to gain her just rights, what wonder that the hirelings of the church should seek to strike a blow at freedom by striving to chain the master minds that guided that noble sheet! Shame on you, cowards, hypocrits, minions of a yet more despicable master! Tear the scales of justice from off your court-houses, and place in their stead a jug of whisky and a Bible. Trail your eagle in the dust, and let an owl surmount your statue of Liberty. Liberty! why, your fathers would blush in their graves to hear your definition of the word. Liberty! ah, many a century must come and go ere she shall dare to rest in her weary flight on your borders. What was their crime, that ye thus persecute these two brave, fearless souls? Was the love they bore each other too pure? Who gave one of these drones, called clergymen, the right to step in and leave the damning magnetism of his useless life to shadow the beauty and harmony of theirs? "Get out of my sunshine," was the reply of a teacher in the centuries agone, and we repeat it to-day. I would giv much to know what per cent of the officials of Kansas bear pure and unstained lives. What nice row of state officers the governor of Kansas could muster, Mr. Editor, at his capitol, that had never broken the laws of their nativ state! Why, the whole superstructure law is founded in hypocrisy and deceit. I am glad the Free thinkers all over our land are awakening to the gross injustice that is being forced upon us by the church and its spectable minions. It is time that we claimed a voice in the councils of the land that our fathers hav given to the world Paine, Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, and our own Ingersoll toiled for a free, untrammeled country. Let us watch well that the heritage they gave shall not become a "mess pottage." If we hav those among us who need legislation and an iron band to keep them together, even as we hav these who must needs hav a burning hell to keep them within the bounds of decency, let them hav it; but we demand "that souls that hav become a law unto themselvs" shall be let alone by their more ignorant neighbors.

Yours for liberty, FRED L. HILDRETH.

MAHONING, O., Jan. 4, 1887.

TO SI SLOKUM: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 4, 1886, I find an article entitled "The Impending Revolution" with your name attached. Now, assuming that you are sincere in believing that a revolution of labor against capital is near at hand, and should be precipitated, will you allow me to ask you some questions?

1. Except in St. Domingo, has there ever been a successful revolution of the laboring classes against capital, even in Rome, where the slaves were ten to one, and captivs taken in war at that, although there were revolts?

2. Then assume that your "million minute" men could and did spring to arms, where are the arms and money? Wealth could take wings, you know? Could they steal and pillage, say you? How was it at Pittsburgh? While the mob destroyed the property of the railroad, the citizens looked on; but when the mob undertook to pillage the town, everyone had something to lose, and the citizens armed themselvs and beat the mob off. But if we could suppose (so absurd a thing) that for a time the mob might triumph, and the government was powerless to quell them, could not the governments of Europe be induced to send over their trained soldiers to restore order? The cause of law and order is one the world over.

3. But assume that they could overturn the government, what could they do? They might steal and divide the wealth of the country. But without a monopoly of wealth, manufacturing, mining, railroading, and other industries, could not be carried on, and there would be poor inducement for such enterprises, if mobs might seize on property at any time. That article was so exceedingly foolish, if the writer was sincere, that it is utterly unworthy of notice only for this: from the formation of the Greenback party up to this there hav been the most inflammatory writings and addresses, inciting labor against capital.

Now nothing is easier than to persuade poor men that they are wronged by the rich, and these constant appeals to them has driven them almost to madness. Even Ingersoll must draw a vivid picture of want and wealth without suggesting any remedy but voting, when he admits that law can do but little for them. Now for twenty years this agitation has been going on. Only discontent and unhappiness hav been the result. And happiness is the thing desired. Is it not, Ingersoll? Now, allow me to submit to Denslow, or any man with clear, strong, and cultured intellect, whether capital and labor must not work together for their mutual benefit; whether monopolies or combined wealth must not exist in order to manufacture, mine, build railroads, etc., and by this giv employment to labor; whether capital does not pay the taxes to support the government and the poor when capital does not employ them; whether capital, employing labor, does not produce wealth; whether wealth is not less dependant on labor than labor is on wealth to employ it; whether there was ever a time in this or any country where labor was more employed (in peace), or could purchase more with its earnings, than here and now; whether supply and demand must not regulate all productions; whether, if there is too great a supply of labor, some must not be idle all or part of the time, and the remedy should be in the future ss supply of the article. J. B. SMITH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Boy of ye Olden Time.

I hav heard of a boy who lived long ago—
For such boys are not found nowadays, you know—
Whose friends were as troubled as they could be
Because of a hole in his memory.

A charge from his mother went in one day,
And the boy said "Yes," and hurried away,
But he met a man with a musical top,
And his mother's words through that hole did drop.

A lesson went in, but, ah me! ah me!
For a boy with a hole in his memory!
When he rose to recite he was all in doubt—
Every word of that lesson had fallen out.

And at last, at last—oh, terrible lot!—
He could speak but two words: "I forgot!"
Would it not be sad indeed to be
A boy with a hole in his memory?

The World We Liv In.

This world is a wonderful planet on which we liv. It is much smaller than the sun; the circumference, or distance around it, being twenty-five thousand miles, and the diameter, or distance through it, being eight thousand miles. It is a round body, composed of land and water, there being three times more water than land.

There are five divisions of land. Those of the Eastern Hemisphere are Europe, Asia, and Africa; those of the Western Hemisphere are North America and South America. We liv in North America.

All the people inhabiting the earth are of five different races, differing in complexion, hair, shape of the head, etc. These races are divided in five classes, called Caucasians, or white race; Mongolian, or yellow race; Malay, or brown race; Ethiopian or negro, black race, and the American or Indian, red race.

Most of the Caucasians, Mongolians, Malays, and Ethiopians liv in the Eastern Hemisphere. While the Western Hemisphere contains mostly Caucasians, there are quite a number of negroes that were first brought here as slaves. The Americans were the first people found here.

North America and South America hav been discovered but a few hundred years. Christopher Columbus first discovered this new world in 1492; since that time it has been rapidly growing in wealth and population.

North America is divided into British Possessions and Alaska occupying the northern part, United States the central, Lower California, Mexico, Central America, and Yucatan the southern.

I liv in Wyoming, Chicago county, Minn. Wyoming is situated on the St. Paul and Duluth Railroad, thirty miles north of St. Paul, the capital of Minnesota. I can tell a great deal more about the world, but, for fear of making my article too long, I will close by saying my grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to please him I hav written this. Your little friend CARRIE A. ABBOTT,
(Aged 11 years).

You Conquer Me, Me Conquer You.

There was an old Indian fled from a bear;
He afterward found it asleep in its lair.
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "How do you do?
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you!"

He raised his tomahawk high in the air,
And, bringing it down, laid Bruin's brain bare.
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "How will that do?
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you."

The Indian went to the city one night,
Where he became exceedingly "light."
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "This will not do;
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you."

So to fast set an entering wedge
He right away signed the temperance pledge.
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "This will I do—
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you."

Some fellows the Indian's temper to try,
A whisky-jug placed where he would pass by.
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "Know you me do;
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you."

He then raised his tomahawk high in the air,
And bringing it down on the crockery-ware,
"Yo, ho!" said the Indian. "Guess that will do.
You conquer me, ugh! me conquer you."

Little Lessons for Little Folks.

We hav just been reading Mrs. Slenker's (Aunt Elmina's) book by the above title, and although we had read the matter before in other columns, yet we must say it is more charming in its new dress than ever. If the book could be in the hands of every child in the world, the world would thereby be the gainer. It is just what the children will all be delighted to hav for their own, for its real value as well as a memento of its author who is a true friend to everybody; and as the price is only forty cents, it comes within the reach of all. It is varied and instructiv, touching many useful subjects. Buy it, and make the children happy.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—CHARADE.

Two beasts will giv, when rightly joined,
Silver or gold that is uncoined;
One beast, methinks, might well be shown
As Aaron's golden calf full-grown;
A verbal argument at leat
That gold produces such a beast;
Still, if you doubt what here is said,
Remember pigs may be of lead;
A horse of metal, too, indeed,
Is of a most vivacious breed;
But with this first we next display
The second as a beast of prey;
If gold once changed into a brute,
Pray, may not beast then retransmute?
And these become, as here we find,
Silver or gold in mass, uncoined!

"I am the rip that took the brute."
Said Paddy: "May it plaze your grace

Correspondence.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y., Jan. 9, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am nine years old, and a member of the Hempstead Freethought Association. I hav recited several poems at our meetings. My papa is the president. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER the Investigator and the Freethinkers' Magazine. I do not go to school. Mamma and papa teach me at home. I am in the Third Reader, study geography, arithmetic, language, and shorthand writing. For my Christmas, among many other things, I received the "Story Hour," and "Little Lessons for Little Folks." I hav no brothers or sisters, but I hav a pet canary named Willie. I went with papa and mamma to White Sulphur Springs Convention, and had a real good time. If you like this letter, I will write again sometime. Wishing you a happy New Year,

I am your sincere friend,
ADA E. DEMOTT.

LEBO, KAN., Jan. 2, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first time I ever wrote to you. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for four years. I like to read in the Children's Corner. I was just reading a letter from "Uncle John," and it was a nice, long letter, and I thought I would try and write one. My mamma is sick in bed. She and I are here by ourselvs. I will ask if "Uncle John's" son is better. I hope he is. I am eleven years old, and I am in the Third Reader. I am a stranger here. I came here about two weeks ago. I would like to see this letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I did not go to school to-day. I had to stay home and help my sick mother. I hav three brothers and two sisters. I hav only one brother and one sister at home now. One of them is in Wichita, and one in Reading, and one sister in Lebo. If you think this is worth printing, I may write again.

Yours for Freethought,
WALTER PENFIELD.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I cannot resist adding a few words to my son's first attempt at writing you a letter, to express my appreciation of your work for the cause of Freethought.

To educate the children in the principles of Liberalism is the most noble work of all.

With best wishes for your success and happiness, I remain Your friend,
MARY F. PENFIELD.

[Such kind appreciation as the above stimulates us to continue in our work. We thank our friend for good wishes, and trust we may always merit them.—ED. C. C.]

ELK GROVE, CAL., Jan. 5, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the letters of the little folks. My papa said if I would write you a little letter he would buy me your book, the "Story Hour." I am a Freethinker's boy. I am eleven years old and study reading, spelling, and arithmetic. As this is my first time, I will close.

Yours truly, SUTTON F. COTTRELL.

BURNETT, NEB., Jan. 3, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you another letter, seeing you were so kind as to hav my other one printed. I am not going to school this winter. I hav a little brother named Bennett, after D. M. Bennett. We take several papers, including THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the essay on "The World We Liv In," from Gertie Martin. I think it was splendid. I wish I could write one as good. She is a smart, clever little girl of her age. I received a copy of the Liberal, and a lecture from J. Hacker. I think the lecture was splendid for Liberals. Father said he would send and get the "Story Hour" for me. I shall be very much pleased. Well, I will close for this time. Hoping you spent a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, I remain, Ever your friend,
ESTELLE WHITNEY.

CROMWELL, IOWA, Jan. 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We all like it and Watson Heston's pictures very well. Pa sent twenty-four TRUTH SEEKERS to our Christian friends, hoping they might be of some benefit to them.

The American Catholic News has been sent to us for some time. Pa is not so prejudiced as not to read it, but he intends to send them THE TRUTH SEEKER in return.

Mr. Putnam was here, and made us a visit last fall; we went to both lectures, and liked them very well, and hope he will call and see us on his return.

Mr. Remsburg gave us a good lecture also.

This is my first trial to write for the Children's Corner, hoping not to be the last, and will try to do better the next time.

Yours respectfully, MINNIE M. GEIER,
(aged 11 years).

MOODY, TEXAS, Jan. 9, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am yet a boy, but a good-sized one. I liv in a "Christian community" where all summer they get filled with the Holy Ghost, and when winter comes they giv up their religion for the ball-room. Last summer I went to a protracted meeting where the preacher would stand on the platform and say, "Come to Jesus, he will save you right now!" And furthermore they would say, "If you want to be saved, come and giv me your hand." Like as if taking hold of their hands would save them. They would draw picturss in their minds of hell and the souls that are there, and preach it to the audience, and tell them to come right to Jesus and be saved. They say that the government ought to be founded on the teachings of the Bible, and I think it would be a poor government. Not long ago I was talking to a man and he asked me if I didn't think if they obeyed the teachings of the Testament that they wouldn't do far from right? I told him that none of them obeyed the teachings of the Testament. JOHN M. SIMMONS.

MINIER, ILL., Jan. 7, 1887.

MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter for the Children's Corner; this is the first time I hav tried. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for five or six years. Father said it was a splendid paper. I read the Children's Corner. We hav three churches here. We don't belong to any; we used to belong to the German church, but father was not green enough to belong to church. Mr. J. E. Remburg is going to speak here this winter. Mr. W. S. Bell spoke here last winter; we went four nights; we all thought he was a splendid speaker. He told the truth. It is no use to learn humbug when we are young, and no use when we are old. We hav a book with your picture in it. I do not go to school this winter. I hav four sisters and one brother; two of my sisters go to school, and my brother. I hav two sisters older than myself. My sister said that her teacher told them in school that there were six men on the mountain, and, at once, some of the men were gone, and they looked for them and they could not find them, and so they came back in three or four days. They had a book, and they said that God wrote this book. We hav a Bible—it is a German Bible. I cannot read German, but, I think, if I could I would not read in it any way, because it is not fit to read. Two of my sisters learned the humbug; it did not do them any good. They do not believe in it. I will close for this time. Yours truly,
MINNIE IMIG.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR

HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2.000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Poetry.

A New National Anthem.

Tune: "God Save the Queen."

Long may the people liv,
May long years to them giv
  Plenty and peace.
Let no crowned knave or fool
Make man an abject tool,
But from their odious rule
  All get release.

True men, awake, arise!
Scatter the enemies
  Of liberty.
Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks;
On you our hopes we fix.
  Let all be free.

Let peace on earth prevail,
Ne'er let the nations fail
  In harmony.
Crush aristocracy,
Strengthen democracy,
Then o'er the earth will be
  Blest unity.

"David" and "Goliath."

Where, oh, where is the "Reverend" A. C. Wheeler? Who knows anything about him as a knight-errant and champion of the "Word," but more especially as a would-be gospel compeller and overthrower of Colonel Ingersoll? Be it known that "Reverend" belongs not to him by right of ordination, but is bestowed upon him free-gratis and for nothing by the writer on account of his buckling on the armor of superstition, and setting out some time ago in quest of the scalp of the great Liberal leader of the world, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll!

Be it known to all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER—if they didn't know it before—that the "Reverend" A. C. Wheeler, known to a portion of the World's readers (those who care to read critiques (?) on the plays of the period) as "Nym Crinkle," sometime last winter renounced the flesh and the devil of the stage for the nonce, shook the dust of the World office and Gotham from his feet, and set out on the intellectual warpath in pursuit of the scalp of Colonel Ingersoll, the acquisition of which he felt would be a great boom for God, the Bible, and Christianity, all three of which need booming, indeed, in view of the legions that hav renounced their allegiance thereunto, and whose numbers are constantly swelling with seceders from the ranks of those who "go it blind" on the supernatural, and are bound by blind faith and superstition to the juggernaut of the most baleful and lurid religion ever invented by man for the subjugation of man!

The World called the colonel "Goliath" and the "reverend" "David," and professed to believe that the latter would bring down the former with his little sling. The metaphor was good, but the belief was away off, so to put it. Compared with the "reverend," the colonel is indeed a "Goliath," physically and mentally; and to believe that the modern "David," with his little intellectual sling, could cast an intellectual stone that would knock out the modern "Goliath" intellectually, is to believe something not believed outside of the World office, if we except the outside followers of the "reverend," if he has any.

And what moved the "Reverend" Wheeler to fly off at a tangent, as it were? Why did he leave the flesh-pots of the stage to mount the rostrum as a defender of God, the Bible, and Christianity—to put it more accurately, to antagonize Colonel Ingersoll? Shekels, of course. What moves all the priests to rant and rave, to croon and croak, to whine and beg, to denounce and threaten on the first day of every week, which, strangely enough, they call the seventh and holy, and which all of them break, holy as they declare it to be? Why, shekels, to be sure. It is the easiest way going of rounding up shekels into the thousands; hence never a dearth of pulpit-pounders. And shekels moved the "Reverend" Wheeler to fresco his face with the war-paint of orthodoxy, and go in quest of the scalp of the heterodox Colonel Ingersoll. Vain quest, vainglorious "David," even before you started to open the campaign!

As everybody knows, Colonel Ingersoll is the best advertised man in the States, if not Christendom, not excepting Barnum of "great moral show" notoriety. He can draw bigger houses at fifty cents admission than any other man living. Remember it costs nothing, or next to nothing, to hear Beecher or Talmage, and, besides, the latter draws on account of his buffooneries and bizarre vaporings.

The "Reverend" Wheeler knew this as well as others, and it occurred to him that he might profit himself in shekels from the fame acquired by the colonel, by making the latter a foil against which he might show to advantage, and his first move was to write a critique (?) of a lecture given by the colonel. There was nothing more in this "critique" than any true believer of a monstrously false religious scheme will tell you; but, of course, it brought bushels of letters to the World office from "true believers," some of which declared he was the "coming man" for the faithful to rally around, if not the "David" who had already come to knock out the Goliath of Infidelity on the spot.

That settled it with the "Reverend" Wheeler. He would go lecturing. He had the gift of pen, and could write up a lecture. He had the gift of gab to a certain extent, great enough, he thought, being on the "right side," or the side of Christian religion—which, by the way, as it presents itself to us in these days, was never the religion of Christ, and therefore a misnomer in name—to overcome the splendid eloquence of Ingersoll, and uphold a false against a true belief.

If we thought the "Reverend" Wheeler sincere in his wish to down Ingersoll and boom the Bible, we should say he had taken a contract which he never could carry out; but as we believe his motiv to hav been shekels, there is nothing to say about a "contract," there being none. He set out on the warpath for shekels, Ingersoll to be his profit, if he had any, though ostensibly he went forth to conquer the doughty colonel. He undoubtedly reasoned thus, or about thus: "Three or four hundred dollars a week, if I can make as much from a lecture at my tongue's end, will knock the spots out of forty or fifty a week; and I'm going to venture it; nothing venture, nothing hav;" and he started out with his lecture for the provinces—he was too shrewd to make his debut in New York, which had witnessed a sorry failure of his in the dramatic line—said lecture being called, "The Mistakes of Ingersoll."

The title was a happy thought, with Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses" as a foil; but it proved, after all, to be a mistake of Wheeler's, as was his dramatic venture. It was thought he would draw fairly well, there being enough of the truly blue superstitionists in every place of any importance who, having looked in vain to their priests and parsons to floor Ingersoll, would go to hear and see, once at least, the one daring enough to pit himself against the eloquent colonel who has dealt the Christian religion such staggering blows, malgre the priests and parsons "holding the fort." Yes, they would go once—many would—but when they found the champion of Infidelity was not unhorsed by the pale and puny knight of orthodoxy, they would fall back upon the regularly ordained gospel shouters, praying for a champion to come to the aid of their assailed religion, and hoping for the best, contenting themselvs with the belief, if the champion came not to the front, that it was the Lord's will he came not.

Well, the "Rev." Wheeler struck out for fame and shekels, leaving the devil behind him in Gotham as busy as ever he was. We heard of him appearing in one obscure town in Rhode Island to a well "papered" house, but never heard from him again as a Bible-boomer and Ingersoll-slayer. Either the "followers of the Lamb" were off their feed, or they thought the pale and puny knight of Gotham wasn't the sort of champion for the waging of the battle that would put Ingersoll hors de combat, and so not the knight for their shekels, which they kept in their pockets.

Now, who knows anything about the "Reverend" Wheeler? Is he about, is he around, Bible-booming and Ingersoll-squelching? We know "Nym Crinkle" is here again with the fleshpots of the Gotham stage, but where, oh, where is the "Reverend" Wheeler? We know that "Nym Crinkle" left Gotham to bloom as the "Reverend" Wheeler, and we know that the "Reverend" Wheeler left the provinces under cover of darkness and appeared in Gotham in his old role of "Nym Crinkle;" and we know that the Goliath of light and reason lost not a hair to the David of darkness and superstition; and the latter "know," while comforting, would be greatly more so had the Quixotic knight who set out to annihilate the colonel been a foeman anyway worthy of his steel. This onslaught of the modern David against the modern Goliath might be likened to that of a bat against an eagle! The bat would hav better sense, though, than the David had.

To this particular David, who slunk back to Gotham with his little useless sling, and to all other would-be Davids, I would say: Lay not the flattering unction to your little souls that you can unhorse the Champion of Light and Reason; or that you can be any more successful in the attempt to stay the constantly rising tide of Infidelity than was the old dame who tried to stay the tides of the ocean with a broom! When the gyves of Christianity are stricken from the world, then will the world advance as it never yet has advanced.

SI SLOKUM.

Obituary.

Massena Paine Thurston, of Burr Oak, Mich., died Friday, Jan. 7, 1887. He was conscious to the last, and with his latest breath spoke in an audible tone to one of his sons watching by him. He met dissolution calmly, without fear, and without a change of the secular views that were his during the latter years of his life. Thus closed a somewhat long and remarkable career. Born at Painesville, Ohio, March 31, 1812, he emigrated with his parent to Detroit, Mich., when three years of age; remained there fourteen years, then removed to Mongoquinong prairie (now Lima, Ind.), and soon afterward locating in Colon township, St. Joseph county, Mich., in 1834, where he has ever since resided.

Among the tillers of the soil, the sowers and reapers, he was ever foremost in discarding the old, slow, and tiresome methods, and adopting the new, better, faster, and easier ways. His progressiv spirit was clearly evinced by the fact that he was ever seeking to obtain the better grades of stock kept on the farm, the latest and best farming tools and implements, and also of household utensils and machines.

A few words in regard to his views of death and a hereafter may not be out of place. To him death meant simply the ceasing to liv; that the physical system when worn out or broken can no longer continue the process of life, and that to die was a natural process, to fall asleep again in the arms of nature, from which he sprung. He banished all of that gloom of the past, with which church, creed, and dogma hav surrounded death, and threw sunshine around the end of life. To him the most probable view that could be taken of human existence was that it terminated with death; that when the organization which produces mind ceases to hav life, the mind no longer has any existence; and that the only immortality humanity can attain to is the continuation of the race by succeeding generations, which may progress and become more perfect and developed by the experiences and struggles of the generations that hav passed before. This, in few words, was his belief.

The last work of his life was a literary one, it being a series of quotations from, and comments on, the Bible and the claim that is made for it. His lamp of life expired, however, before the work was in print, but he had the satisfaction of knowing it was in the publisher's hands, and that others will circulate it for him.

A few years ago he prepared a brief sketch of his life, his journeyings and progress in the realm of thought and investigation, and the conclusions he had reached in regard to religious beliefs and a life beyond, and requested that it be read at his funeral when that time should come. The funeral was held at his late residence, D. R. Hazen, of the Sherwood College, reading the piece, to a large and attentiv audience, which the deceased had so carefully prepared, supplementing it with a few grand thoughts and remarks of his own.

Whether on that Friday morning after death he saw a more glorious sunrise, with unimaginable splendor above a celestial horizon, or whether his apathetic and unconscious body still sleeps in cold obstruction and insensible oblivion, we do not know. But if no other immortality awaits him he will hav one in the hearts and affections of his children and his children's children for many generations to come.

The six sons, who bore their mother to her long rest nearly two years ago, carried their father to his grave.

S. K. T.

Mr. Thurston was a subscriber and patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER from almost its first appearance, and one of the most ardent admirers that D. M. Bennett ever had. Very naturally he became one of the pioneers in the Freethought movement in his section of country. He has been quite a liberal purchaser of books from this office, at different times obtaining large quantities of tracts, and distributing them among friends.

The noble life and serene death of this man furnish a fresh refutation of the pious falsehood that the Freethinker livs without hope and dies in fear. Judging the Freethought philosophy by the lives and deaths of its votaries, it answers the requirements of all occasions. The world puts on a glory

For him who, with a fervent heart, goes forth
Under the bright and glorious sky, and looks
On duties well performed, and days well spent.
For him the wind, ay, and the yellow leaves
Shall hav a voice, and giv him eloquent teachings.
He shall so hear the solemn hymn that Death
Has lifted up for all, that he shall go
To his long resting-place without a tear.

Book Notice.

A LAY SERMON. By Robert G. Ingersoll. Delivered before the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union at Chickering Hall, Nov. 14, 1886. Reported for THE TRUTH SEEKER by I. N. Baker, and printed by permission of the author. The only correct editton. New York: The Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place.

Robert G. Ingersoll never opens his mouth without saying something, but he never said so much to the point—so much real, practical good sense—in the same length of time, as he has in this pamphlet. The pamphlet itself seems but a condensation, a synopsis, as it were, of the great thinker's best thoughts on the most practical, everyday questions. It reads like a beautiful poem, melted and stirred up and all poured out together in one unbroken stream of oratory.

There is really only one place to begin to quote from this "Lay Sermon," and that is with the first word, and only one place to leave off, and that is with the last word. As it costs only 5 cents, the reader is advised to read it all.—New Thought.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. Gives cheer and hope to the afflicted by saying and proving that SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., can be cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. No failure in any case.

It is one of Dr. Fellows's valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected by pad and bandage, which cures by absorption, and which is the only reliable method of curing Seminal Weakness and Loss of Sexual Power.

Send five 2-cent stamps for his book "Private Counselor," telling all about the disease, and the external cure, with evidences of success. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

News of the Week.

HISCOOK has been chosen U. S. Senator from New York.

PROF. E. L. YOUMANS, editor of the Popular Science Monthly, died on the 18th.

BEECHER has been elected an honorary member of the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

MAYOR HEWITT, of New York, is not yet able to leave his house, being doubled up with rheumatism.

THE young lady who was to hav married August Spies, the condemned Anarchist, has changed her mind at the solicitation of friends.

A SUSPENDED priest at Brainerd, Mich., almost caused a riot last Sunday by locking the church doors and addressing the people from the steps.

SAM JONES and Sam Small are reviving Boston. The Rev. Phillips Brooks preached last Sunday in Faneuil Hall to an audience of criminals and outcasts.

A NEW YORK policeman fired after an escaping prisoner one day last week, and shot dead the son of an Italian druggist standing on the steps of his father's store.

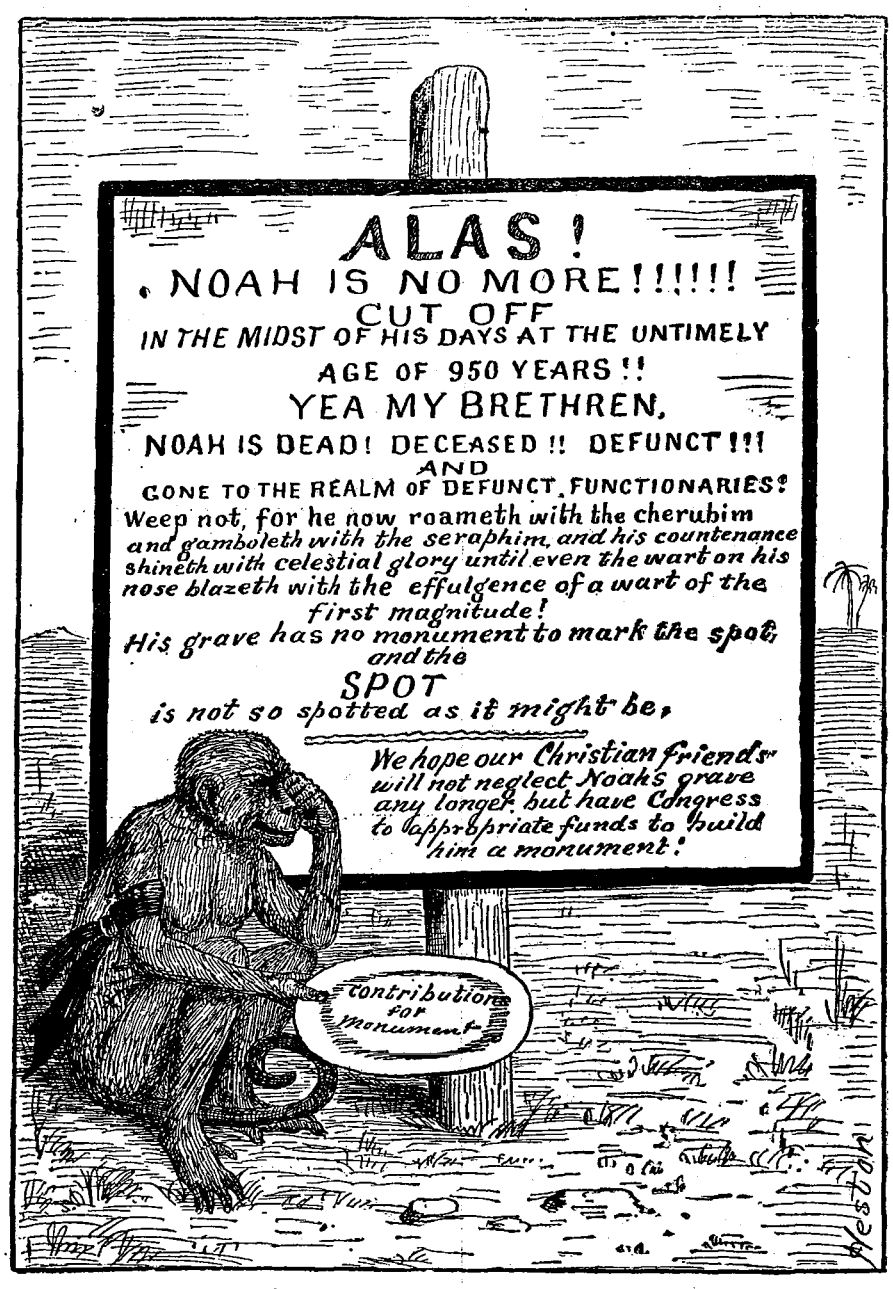
POLICEMEN were stationed in Dr. McGlynn's church last Sunday to preserve order. Priest Donnelly officiated. There was a large attendance, but no one gave any money either at the door or in the plates.

Two young desperadoes named Tristram shot a storekeeper at White Plains, N.Y., one day last week, and then, when pursued by the police and likely to be captured, committed suicide. No cause is known for the murder.

MICHAEL DAVITT, the Irish Land Leaguer, spoke to an audience of some 8,000 at Madison Square Garden, this city, last Sunday evening. Alluding to McGlynn's case, he said that the priest should obey the summons to Rome.

LAST Sunday the Chinese celebrated their New Year's all over the city. What a daily paper calls "a contribution from Christendom" was made by a half dozen young roughs, who invaded a laundry, pummeled the proprietor, and nearly killed a policeman who attempted to arrest them.

SULLIVAN broke his wrist in an encounter with Pugilist Cardiff the other day. By keeping the fact to himself until the stipulated six rounds had been fought through, the astute Mr. Sullivan escaped being knocked out, as he undoubtedly would hav been if his opponent had known he was disabled.



THE Scottish-Protestant Alliance has sent to Queen Victoria a memorial setting forth that the aggressions of the papacy in Great Britain and the supremacy of the pope are subversiv of the queen's authority and of the people's rights and liberties, and that the avowed aim of the papacy is the Vatican's conquest and subjection of Great Britain.

IN his discourse last Sunday, Felix Adler proposed for truant children cottage homes in the suburbs of this city in place of huge asylums. He had mentioned the scheme to the school board, but the board pleaded poverty. Professor Adler thought that if the untaxed property of New York were brought to book, the plea of poverty would not be necessary.

THE Rev. Dr. Wm. R. Huntington, now pastor of Grace church, this city, is not an ambitious man. By a unanimous vote, the diocesan convention at Cincinnati appointed him assistant bishop of southern Ohio, and he declined the position. It may be added that the salary of an assistant bishop is $3,500, while the pastor of Grace church is given $10,000 to scratch through the year with.

THE Rev. Henry Enos, a Methodist preacher from Brunswick, N. Y., came to this city a year ago to complete his education. He studied religion until it crazed him, and he imagined that the Andover trials had terminated in favor of the professors who believe in probation after death. Wishing to take advantage of that probation, the Rev. Mr. Enos attempted suicide, and is now in the hospital trying to recover.

THE coal strike is still on, and the shooting of a boy by one of the special policemen hired by the coal companies to protect their property against violence of the strikers has not contributed to an amicable settlement. The special policemen were standing on the pier, and were snowballed by some boys. They drew their revolvers and fired, and an innocent boy looking on was shot through he head. Four of the men were arrested.

OBIT.—THE GOOD DIE YOUNG.

And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years and he died.—Gen. ix, 29.

Odds and Ends.

IT may now be said without violating the truth that Alfred, Lord Tennyson, occasionally, if not oftener, drops out of poetry.

THE recent failure of "Adam and Eve" in Paris wasn't a marker compared with the failure they made of themselvs some years ago.—Puck.

GOVERNOR ALGER, of Michigan, gave four hundred and eighty-seven suits of clothes to Detroit newsboys, and Baxter street is wildly jealous over the boom in second-hand clothes in the Northwest. At last accounts, only one newsboy had not disposed of his gift, and he was hunting around for a pawnshop.

HUSBAND: "My dear, that is a long motto you are working." Wife: "Yes, John." He reads on it:

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

"Is it to be hung in the vestibule of the church, my dear?" "No, John, I'll hang it on the chandelier in the hall."

A LADY, who had recently lost her husband, and a friend were eating dinner together at the residence of the latter. "I sympathize with you from the bottom of my heart in your great sorrow," said the friend. "It must be terrible to lose such a man." "Ah, me, yes!" sighed the widow; "it is only the hope of meeting him in a better land that givs me courage and a desire to liv."

THE potter stood at his daily work,
One patient foot on the ground;
The other, with a never-slacking speed,
Turning his swift wheel round.
Silent we stood beside him there,
Watching the restless knee,
Till my friend said low in pitying voice,
"How tired his foot must be!"

The potter never paused in his work,
Shaping the wondrous thing;
'Twas only a common flower-pot,
But perfect in fashioning.
Slowly he raised his patient eyes,
With homely truth inspired;
"No, marm, it isn't the foot that kicks—
The one that stands gets tired!"

JUDGE FRISBIE'S HEATHEN.

Judge Frisbie, one of the pioneers of Arizona, has had a Chinese servant in his employ for many years. Always a consistent pagan, Ah Wong never until this winter manifested any interest in Christianity. The American's religion, he always said, was good enough for Melicans, but he would stick by his Joss. Some time in December the judge became interested in a revival in progress here, and after going forward one night he became impressed with the conviction that it was his duty to reclaim Ah Wong. At first the Chinaman was obdurate, and would not listen to the friendly exhortations that the judge made to him, but at length he announced his willingness to attend the services, and see what they were all about. After a steady attendance of a week or more, the Chinaman, in response to a question from the judge as to what progress he was making, said that he was not very much impressed with the religion of the Americans, and that he guessed that he would not go any more. The judge was in a bad humor that night, and he let fall a remark to the effect that if Wong did not join the church he could not work for him. He could not stand having a heathen in his house when it was in his power to save him. The next night found the Chinaman at the revival, and two or three evenings later he was among the number that went forward.

The rejoicing over the conversion of the heathen was tremendous, and the festivities extended far into the night. Along about midnight the judge, who had been out at a card party, led a procession to his cabin, where Ah Wong was found, routed out, and made to get up and bring out his idol. This secured, the crowd marched back into town, and in the presence of nearly all the citizens the ugly little thing was burnt in a bonfire which had been started in front of the tavern. While this ceremony was in progress, the judge descanted at great length upon the labor which he had done in bringing this heathen to see the error of his ways. As Ah Wong appeared to take as much interest in the cremation of his idol as anybody present, no one doubted the sincerity of his conversion. The judge is a candidate for the territorial legislature, and some infirmities of his in the direction of strong drink had always weighed heavily in the balance against him. With this public conversion of himself and his Chinaman he felt that at the next trial he would stand a better show than ever before. Some of the people in the crowd admitted as much, and the judge and his servant went home happy.

It now turns out that Ah Wong never really renounced the pomps and vanities of paganism. He had no more than got home from the celebration just described when he set up another idol and regularly paid his devotions to it. At the same time he continued his attendance at the revival, where he was looked upon as a brand plucked from the burning. Yesterday morning two visiting revivalists called at the judge's place to see the famous Christian Chinaman, and what was the judge's horror on leading them into the den occupied by Ah Wong to see the celestial in the act of adoring a little god of hideous aspect which he had set up in place of the old one.

"You heathen devil!" exclaimed the judge, turning an elegant red; "what are you doing?"

The unabashed Chinaman stepped back from his rude altar and, throwing up both hands, said, half apologetically: "Chinaman make velly sure. Me catel ee Joss and me catchee Melican God."

The judge was speechless, and the visitors could only cough and shake their heads. That night neither the judge nor the Chinaman was at the revival. It was announced that the judge had become a backslider, and that Ah Wong had never got far enough on the highway to become even that.—New York Sun.

Gems of Thought.

THE object of our lives should be to make this world as beautiful, and ourselvs and our fellows as happy, as is in our power.—D. M. Bennett.

"SISTER AGNES is my name in the church and that by which our dear Mother Mary knows me. Saint Agnes is my patron saint and I do her work, and obey her wish when I call myself by her name." "Her wish? Do you believe in the saints?" cried Virginia, blushing gravely. The sister smiled. "Do I believe in the sun and moon and stars?" she said. "Of course I do. The dear saints and our blessed Mother Mary are half the good influence of religion, half the foundation of the church." "If I could but believe in the saints!" cried Virginia. "But papa says that it was part imposture and part disease; and I hav never dared to let myself believe in the things that I hav read of them. How I wish I could! And how I wish I could feel as they felt!" "Child, do not bring your father's authority between us. He is a good man, no doubt; but he has trusted his own strength and God has abandoned him and given him over to destruction," etc.—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton's Under Which Lord?

IN all animals, the living brain is essential to all phases of thought. The thought-ability of any animal is always in precise proportion to the perfection and activity of the brain. The power of developing thought grows, diminishes, and ceases, the cessation always being complete when the brain ceases to perform its vital functions. If the brain is injured, the thought-ability is impaired, the thinking deranged, yet who to-day would think it wise or necessary, with evidence of aberration of thought resulting from local injury, to treat it as a case of demoniacal possession?—Has Man a Soul? by Charles Bradlaugh.

FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies;
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.
—Tennyson.

WE are a law-abiding race; the mass of us are little given to unpractical speculation. We are too earnest to tolerate impiety, and the traditions of religion will retain their hold with the millions long after they hav lost their influence over the intellect. Intellect, we know, is not omniscient. Emotion has a voice in the matter, which is always on the side of faith; and women, in such subjects, are governed almost wholly by their feelings. The entire generation at present alive may probably pass away before the inward change shows itself markedly in external symptoms. None the less it is quite certain that the ark of religious opinion has drifted from its moorings, that it is moving, with increased speed, along a track which it will never retrace, and toward issues infinitly momentous.—J. A. Froude.

THERE is another element of our happiness which springs from the fact that we do not know the future. How large a part of the pleasure of life is shattered and blighted by our unreasonable anticipations of coming evil! How much happiness would be lost if you knew that you were to be sick to-morrow; that a friend was to be stricken down; that a mercantil adventure was to go awry; that this or that evil was to come! You would hav no heart for the smile and laughter and sunshine of to-day, glad and bright though it might be, if you were overshadowed with the cloud of a certain misfortune that was to come on the morrow.—Savage.

CHRISTIANS say to me, "What do you propose to giv us in the place of Christianity?" I hav not torn the good down. I hav only endeavored to trample out the ignorant, cruel fires of hell. I do not tear away the passage, "God will be merciful to the merciful." I do not destroy the promis, "If you will forgiv others, God will forgiv you." I would not for anything blot out the faintest star that shines in the horizon of human despair, nor in the sky of human hope; but I will do what I can to get that infinit shadow out of the heart of man. "What do you propose in the place of this?" Well, in the first place I propose good fellowship—good friends all around. No matter what we believe, shake hands and let it go. That is your opinion, this is mine; let us be friends. Science makes friends; religion, superstition, makes enemies. They say belief is important. I say, No, actions are important. Judge by deed, not by creed. Good fellowship, good friends, sincere men and women, mutual forbearance, born of mutual respect.—R. G. Ingersoll.

LIFE is a battle, and it is by fighting that we acquire the power to fight; it is by marching that we become inured to the exposure, toil, weariness, and want of the march. We could not now sally out and take a long campaign. But we soon get used to it, and the soldiers after the campaign are so in love with the open air that they cannot sleep in a bed. So it is wrestling with fate; we make it our tributary, our companion, our friend, and extract from it the blessing it would fain withhold. How much there is in that Old Testament legend of the patriarch wrestling at midnight with his unseen foe! He cries, "I will not let thee go until thou bless me!" And he gets the blessing! —Frothingham.

THE tyrant custom, most grave senators,
Hath made the flinty and steel couch of war
My thrice-driven bed of down: I do agnize
A natural and prompt alacrity.
I find in hardness; and do undertake
These present wars against the Ottomites.
—Shakspere's Othello.

THERE are men who hav no theory about God, who deny that they hav any consciousness of him, who are in much closer and sweeter and more vital relations with him than some who can produce him, as if he were a pocket-piece, on all occasions, and rattle off his attributes as if they knew the whole contents of his infinitnde of being.—Chadwick.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York. N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 14. No. 6. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, February 5, 1887. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

THE GIBBET AS AN ENGINE OF REFORM.

The ignorant offspring of church and state must suffer for the shortcomings of its parents.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Heber Newton expressed the opinion in a recent sermon that "woman is inevitably destined ere long to receive the franchise through successiv stages."

EX-GOV. HOADLEY, of Ohio, is expected to come to New York to liv, having formed a law partnership here. Being a Freethinker, Governor Hoadley should at once join the Manhattan Liberal Club.

A NUMBER of Catholic cardinals took steamer from this port for Rome last Saturday. Among them were Gibbons, of Baltimore, and Taschereau, of Montreal. These two worthies will be decorated with red hats by the pope.

IT is not an extravagant estimate that there are five hundred hypocrits, impostors, and cranks of both sexes getting a living by acting as temperance lecturers, evangelists, etc., in the United States and Canada.—Christian Advocate.

A LEADING Baptist minister in Richmond, Va., has received a letter from Boston, signed H. F. Steadman, asking the ministers of Richmond and the South to pray especially for Boston, which is represented as being in an unprecedented condition of wickedness.

COLORED worshiper: "Mistah Clarence, wasn't dem patriarchs of old de mos' forgetfullest men you ebber knowed of?" Mr. C.: "How so, Mr. Johnson?" Mr. J.: "Why, I heerd de preacher at my house ob worship read out de good book time an' time again, how Abraham he ferget Isaac, an' Isaac he ferget Jacob, and Jacob he ferget a whole lot moah. 'Pears like dem patriarchs couldn't 'member anybody."—Pittsburgh Bulletin.

THE high hats worn by women having been much complained of by New York theatergoers, the ladies, hav begun leaving their head-gear in the dressing-room. They wear the same hats to church, but no complaint has as yet come from that quarter.

A COMMITTEE appointed by the National Woman Suffrage Association called on the president on the 28th ult., and presented a memorial asking him to veto the Edmunds bill or the Tucker substitute therefor, whichever shall pass Congress, proposing to disfranchise non-polygamous women of Utah. The president said that he would giv the memorial his careful consideration.

A WOMAN in Bridgeport, Conn., complains that her husband, who is a member of the Salvation Army, makes her life miserable around the house by too much praying and singing and assaults upon her and the children, because they do not believe in his religious methods. It is enough to make a man lose his hold on all the religion he has to be compelled to break off abruptly in the middle of a prayer or a hymn to hammer his wife and children because they do not join in the worship.—Norristown Herald.

THE Pall Mall Gazette notes that "in the last number of Tydschrift a 'Diary of a Boer in the Kafir Commando' is published. We extract two consecutiv entries: 'Sunday, February 23d. No Kafirs in sight. Held divine service. Prayer-meeting at night—a blessed time. Monday, February 24th. Saw Kafirs on the hills. Commando went out and shot thirty-four, besides a number that got away wounded. Thanksgiving service in the evening on return to camp. Sang Psalm 107, and went on sentry. Shot two Kafirs.'"

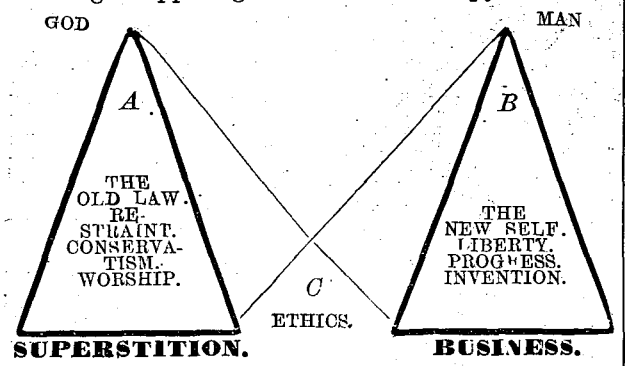
A CHUNK of a boy asked a New York ticket seller for a half-fare ticket the other day. "How old are you?" asked the ticket seller. "Ten years old," said the boy. "When were you born?" asked the railroad man. "Ten years ago," said the young Yankee. He got his half-fare ticket.

CONCERNING Mr. Henry George's doctrins which he claims to derive from Moses the Rev. Henry Brann says: "George's theory of the nature of property is taken from the German Atheist Fichte; 'the naturalization of land' is from the English skeptic Herbert Spencer, and the 'unearned increment' theory from another English skeptic, John Stuart Mill."

REPORT says: "A theatrical company is to be put on the road, with the approval of the Roman Catholic church, to collect a fund for the relief of the creditors of the late Archbishop Purcell. The company will not do business during Lent." It is cheering to know that the company will keep Lent. In this respect it will resemble the money placed in the defunct archbishop's hands.

THE town council of Paris has lately opened several night shelters, each of which has accommodation for several hundred outcasts. When applicants arrive at these homes, where they may remain several days at a time, they get a thorough overhauling in a bath, and are then given a fresh outfit and a bowl of soup. There are three other night refuges belonging in the Œuvre de l'Hospitalité de Nuit, established in 1878. This work is kept up by voluntary contributions. It receives cast-off clothing, bread, and all sorts of crumbs from rich men's tables for distribution. In addition to providing nightly lodging for the miserable, it receives the convalescent from hospitals, and finds places for those who are willing to work. Last year it received 60,000 homeless creatures, many of whom remained for several consecutiv nights. Of these 50,000 were French, 3,221 German, 2,112 Belgian, 890 Swiss, 602 Italian, and 70 English. Over 76,000 pieces of bread and 15,000 bowls of soup, or other rations, were served, and 15,000 articles of clothing distributed. The total expense was $350,000.

THE Bismarck Tribune describes the picturesque appearance of a train that recently reached there after a tussle with a blizzard. "The most interesting sight of all," it says, "was the white-capped snow-plow which came just ahead of the train. The plow was loaded with several tons of pure white material, and the engin was a gigantic moving icicle, of curious shapes and exquisit beauty. The drive-wheels, the boiler, the bell, and the smokestack were handsomely slated with ice and snow, and the cab was a perfect little crystal palace."



AT a large meeting of Dr. McGlynn's friends held in this city last Sunday night Henry George said, "If priests must be pulled like puppets by an irresponsible power, then I say that that kind of Catholicism is a menace to free institutions." Mr. George has been a long time getting around to this view. At the next outlook he takes he will see that priests always hav been puppets in the hands of higher authorities, and always will be. If Mr. George was less in love with himself and his own theories, he might see a little beyond the length of his own nose.

Ethics.*

Ethics includes the various efforts made by thoughtful men to reduce the views of mankind concerning right and wrong to a system or a moral science—a self-consistent department of philosophy. I hav arrived at the conclusion that this cannot be done, and that ethics or morals will, with the progress of thought, be consigned to the same limbo that abolished and obsolete studies, as alchemy, astrology, sorcery, divination, incantation, spells, charms, witchcraft, and prayers, hav been, or will be. For morals are but the study of interests whose relations to pure selfishness hav become obscured, and with the restoration of these self-relations they will cease to be morals, and will be studied as mere phases of self-interest, all of whose motivs and reasons are known.

The following diagram will assist in explaining why ethics or morals will disappear from the thought of the individual and of the race. First applying it to the individual man: He enters on the stage of life led by his parents, who supply him with a sort of code for his infancy, which we will express by the pyramid A. He then goes on into life and builds up an efficient character and personality of his own, which we will express by pyramid B. If we suppose each of these pyramids to be capable of casting a shadow toward the other, that will express the degree in which the precepts we inherit from our parents and the lives we develop seek to influence each other. There will thus grow up between the two a third pyramid which is wholly made by the crossing of opposing shadows. This is pyramid C.

Let A represent our inherited code of parental influence, B our personal lives, C will represent the degree in which each seeks to modify the other. For instance, A opens life for us with the precept, "Obey your parents." As our lives develop (B), we substitute the maxim, Obey your own intelligence, or interest—in short, go as you please. But each of these influences, casting its shadow toward the other, results in a third or mixed command, viz., Obey your parents so far as your own intelligent sense of your and their well-being will permit, i. e., obey yourself. The first canon, A, is the precept of blind infancy, and promotes the infant's welfare for a time. The sccoud, B, rises up into independence of the first but is essential to the adult's welfare within certain limits. The third, C, is the result of the union of A and B, and is ethics. It says, harmonize the obedience due to your parents with the obedience due to your own selfhood and sense of justice—in short, straddle.

But as the supreme court which is to administer this rule as between you and your parents is your own supreme court or conscience, and not theirs, it rests with your judgment finally to determin, so far as such determination is essential to the guidance of your own conduct, when your parents' interests are equitably harmonized with yours. Hence, after all, the rule, Obey your parents, on close analysis is eliminated, and the rule that survives is, Obey yourself—as intelligently as you may, of course, but, whether more or less intelligently, it is, Obey yourself. The necessity of this change of ethics in our advance out of youth into maturity is represented by most nations by a definit line called the period of majority.

Take another parental rule—love your brother. If you've got two apples, giv him the bigger one, and run your chance of thereby securing the bigger one next time, when he has the two apples. Out of this we grow, as we begin to liv our own free lives, into the rule—first, "Keep the bigger apple yourself;" then "Keep both apples, but giv your brother a piece out of the larger;" then "Keep both and reflect whether your brother deserves a piece out of the smaller one or not," until finally the rule becomes, "Barrel up all your apples, you'll need them next winter." The first is the rule A, of the infant or dependent organism. The third is the rule C, of the P. I. G., or perfectly independent gentleman, alias the capitalist, relativly to whom the brother, whose fitness to survive depends on his alacrity to serve, is styled labor or the proletariat. Now, if we let the shadow from the rule of dependent life A cross the shadow thrown by the rule of independent life C, there results a third rule, which, in fact, is an impossible rule, and a juggle called the ethical rule, or B, which says: "Giv your brother the apple, provided that if you were in his circumstances and he in yours you would wish him to giv you the apple"—a metaphysical set of conditions which can never be actually supplied. Hence the rule becomes a mere implement to aid in begging; something that is freely quoted by those who want to get something for nothing, and quietly ignored by all who are not prepared to giv something for nothing.

This third rule—called by those who make a living out of the net profits obtainable by begging under it the Golden Rule, "Do unto others as ye would that men should do unto you"—is useful only as a begging machine in helping the parasitic classes—priests, nuns, ministers, and professional reformers—to liv upon the productiv—viz., the farmers, merchants, and manufacturers. As we advance in life, and in our knowledge of the economic laws that govern society, we discover that the money which does most good is that which we keep reserved from immediate consumption, productivly invested; and that which does least good is what we giv away to professional beggars of every sort, and to organized hierarchies, formed for securing pretended salvation from imaginary ills, and pseudo-reform of imaginary evils, which hierarchies really liv on the profits of systematic beggary. Of course I do not include among these hierarchies of holy beggars any churches which deserve to be classed as amusements, or as sources of instruction about matters which lie within the domain of human knowledge. There are a few such, and they are generally distinguishable by the fact that their gate fees are sufficient to keep them running without much intimidation or superstitious imposition.

Morals or ethics in the infancy, both of the individual and the race, consist chiefly in repressiv rules, framed by the adults to promote their own convenience, and all aim at subjugation—"Obey," keep still, don't whisper aloud, don't wink, don't doubt, don't laugh, don't steal—a very comprehensiv maxim for a child, or slave, who is of the age, or in the condition wherein nothing belongs to him; don't sing, don't scratch the paint, don't make a noise going up and down stairs, don't tease the cat, or kiss the girls, or let out the birds, or upset the ink, or leave the door open. This is the decalog of infancy. Under it the only good boy is the sick boy; hence the maxims: "The good die young;" "The worse the boy the better the man," and "The devil looks out for his own."

It is easy to see that this early system of ethics is framed by the parents to promote their own convenience. How long it shall last depends on the despotic temper of a race. Among the Romans the child's obligation to obey lasted until his parent died, though the child might become first consul. So the wife, like the daughter, was bound to implicit perpetual obedience. She had so little ethical freedom that she was property. Pagan Rome has done what it could to impart these two precepts to Christian Rome.

But generally among civilized races the subjugativ ethics hav given place to the go-as-you-please ethics, some time between the ages of sixteen and thirty, as between the child and his parents. Then has come a formidable effort to make the child believe that though he has come to know enough to paddle his own canoe through this world, yet it is a very serious thing to face the issues of the world to come, and for that he needs a priest. The assumption is of course that the priest knows something about the next world which other persons do not—an assumption which every intelligent priest knows to be false as to himself, but is able to preserve his sincerity in most cases by nourishing the slender delusion that some priest of higher rank or earlier date knows more than he. But to all in whose minds this assumption can be made to prevail a second period of subjugation and tutelage is preached in the effort to hold the human mind under the domination of the class of men who make their living by teaching what they don't know in the interests of virtue.

Let us now transfer to the race that analysis of ethics which we hav been applying to the individual. Every generation of men is born into the world surrounded by an atmosphere of superincumbent human experiences, errors, truths, traditions, impositions, suppositions, poetic analogies, and moral monstrosities, which profess to be the lesson of all the past to the youthful present.

Around the cradle of each generation await three magi—the priest, the man of business, and the philosopher. The priest brings to him a kaleidoscope, a rattlebox, and a string of beads, and says to him, Here is ample provision for your whole nature. By looking into this kaleidoscope you see the glories of heaven. By turning this rattlebox you produce the harmony of the spheres; by counting these beads, every time a bead is dropped a sin is forgiven. The man of business brings a hoe, a loom, and a pen, and says, I call you to honest toilful work. Every time you turn over a sod you giv bread to the hungry; every time you speed the shuttle you clothe the naked; every time you touch the pen you are inspired anew. The philosopher says to him: I bring you only sadness. I can only show you that the priest's glories of heaven are bits of broken glass, that his music of the spheres is the striking of one chip on another, and that his pretended forgivness of sins is itself a sin against nature, for which, poor priest! no soul has so much need to be forgiven as his own. All that I can offer you is the solitude that comes to the wise, the sadness that attends the pure, the persecution that is due to the kind.

Land Ownership.

The controversy lately arising between Mr. Henry George and certain dignitaries of the church is a very interesting one, but with which I hav no intention of meddling. It is, however, a matter of prime importance to know by what method the main question is to be determined, whether by an appeal to divine, human, or natural law.

The great difficulty of determining the matter by assumed divine authority or dogma occurs in the necessity of first deciding what is divine authority upon the subject; for the proper ownership of the land is not simply a Jewish, Mohammedan, or Christian interest; but a human one. Even if it were purely Christian, its decision by Christian authority could be binding only on those who accepted the authority, and could hav no further application. Now, the Christian religion, divided into many sects, orthodox and heretical, does not embrace one quarter of the inhabitants of the globe, not to deduct the great numbers of those in Christian communities who utterly deny and reject the church and the oracles she holds most sacred.

The Mohammedans constitute a still smaller propertion, and the Jews not a one-hundredth part of the population of the earth. Even if we consider these all as a unit, as accepting the Mosaic law, they would still constitute a minority. It is well-known, however, that only the Jews giv more than a very qualified acceptance to Moses's teachings, to say nothing of that large percentage of the intelligence of so-called Christian nations which repudiates wholly the idea of their divine origin.

For all practical purposes, then, and in any general application of a principle, the conception of a law of land ownership, as proceeding from a source specially divine, must prove barren of any salutary result to human well-being, except as such divine intent is manifested through nature and her unerring operations.

For those, however, who look upon the laws of Moses as the "word of God," there can be no excuse for their refusing to accept as conclusiv his wise provision for the holding and periodical redistribution of the land. "The land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine and ye are sojourners with me," is clearly the Jewish or Mosaic law, whether we regard it as truly divine or merely human. This is not and cannot be denied. And, although no passage in the New Testament expressly recognizes such a law, it virtually teaches that all nations of men are made of one blood to dwell on all the face of the earth. The tradition of the church in all ages has been, "The earth he hath given to the children of men," and then all men are tenants in common. Whether the earth has been cursed or blessed does not affect the fact of the gift. It holds good just the same. It is also worthy of observation that monopolizers of the land are quite willing to accept it subject to the curse, the church not less than state corporations.

I hav said all this, not with the desire or purpose of entering into any theological controversy, but merely to make clear the distinction between "property in land" and property in other things or commodities, which are, and hav been, universally admitted to be property in all time and among all people.

It is by failing to recognize this important difference that these theologians run into the error of confounding the generally recognized "rights of property" with the ownership of land. And their courteous and able opponent, it seems to me, fails equally to comprehend the distinction; for while they infer that property in land must be made absolute, or the principle of property itself be sacrificed, he assumes substantially the same ground, and argues that private property in land cannot rightfully exist at all, since the land is not the product of labor, but the "gift of God," or the "bounty of Nature."

To this point where "opposits meet," I address myself. John Locke stated a universal principle, in perfect accord with all rational utterances of the ages: "The earth and all that is therein is given to men [not necessarily by any anthropomorphic God] for the support and comfort of their being." I know of no dissent from this proposition on the part of any statesman or divine, philosopher or economist. As a necessary deduction from this proposition the following conclusions appear as legitimately drawn in respect to private right:

1. The individual must hav property (ownership) of the land and in the things it contains and in the forces it embraces. But

2. The individual must not hav (absolute) property in them to the exclusion of others. This covers the whole ground, and obviates all disputation as to the nature of property in land as contrasted with property in movables. With regard to chattels there can be no doubt that property rights depend upon the principle that they are the products of one's labor; but it is equally true that labor produces nothing until it is "joined to the land," or to something grown from or derived from the land. Now, if labor has not first property in these, i.e., a right of occupancy, how can it hav in the resultant production? for his labor has not created, but only effected change in the raw material.

If, on the other hand, the land is the property of the state, in any absolute sense, does the state then part with the property when the worker has wrought it into other forms? And if so, what does property in the state amount to? If we mean merely that the state is charged to see that equity is observed in its apportionment and use, it is a harmless thing and can work wrong to none. If we mean, however, that such property is absolute (and if not absolute, why must private property be so?), then the state can transfer it to individuals, and so a system of monopoly, like the one we hav, necessarily results. For wherever commercial monopoly of the land exists, the state has already parted with its property. In this country this is particularly true, most of the private titles being directly traceable to the general government. How land, once the property of the state, and which has been transferred by the state to the individual, can be again "nationalized," is a matter of law in which Mr. George has not deigned to instruct us. "Eminent domain" is precisely absolute property, and this is what the state has parted with, if anything. It may be said that the land was the property of the state to be "let," not "sold," to the individual to the exclusion of others. But the effect of letting and of selling land is precisely the same as to the effecting of all the powers of eviction, absenteeism, and rack-rent, which betray the unjust and immoral tendencies of exclusiv private ownership. Letting is merely selling for a specified term.

In England, where the allodial form of ownership has never obtained, and where all land-holders are traditionally tenants of the state, the vices of landlordism hav been developed to the direst extremes. Nationalization of the land there would be simply for the nation to resume the management of its estate, and to require all tenants to account directly to the government. But this could giv the people no guarantee that the same course would not be run over again, or that the same extremes of wealth and poverty would not be perpetuated. Such action might possibly be tolerated by a people with such traditions, but it would be wholly incompatible with our popular traditions, our land system, and our form of government.

It is evident that this confusion of thought in respect to private ownership of land arises from the failure to comprehend the true nature of property. The ownership over movables approaches the absolute, for the man can carry them with him and personally control their use. And yet the right of property in them relates to the service rendered by exertion and sacrifice through which they hav been made fit for human uses, rather than to the materials of which they are composed. For it is not the salts and gases composing the food, rainment, or shelter, in which the property inheres; for these exist in nature, plentiful as the air, earth, or water. It is the particular form and adaptation to use which our labor has effected, over which we exercise the right of property; for when the food or clothing is consumed these elements go back to nature and disappear as property. Our dominion ends even over the elements composing our physical structure when their uses in that structure hav been subserved. Nature exacts the strictest return of every particle of matter she has yielded to our control. She recognizes no title "forever" in any thing whatever.

With the land we hav the elements and forces of nature in a raw state, and our title to property in them depends primarily on occupancy alone. Hence, all our laws respecting dominion over the land are wholly arbitrary and invasiv, without rational, ethical, or economical justification, except in so far as they define and enforce the natural law of ownership depending on occupation.

In his renowned 45th chapter, Gibbon, in stating how the development of the Roman civil law arose, givs the general principle of property in land. He says: "The original right of property can only be justified by the accident or merit of prior occupancy." It is plain that this is not only the original but the sole justification of private property in land. Without prior occupation no application of labor can be made, and no right to the land, or to anything connected with it, or produced from it, can be exercised or enjoyed.

This, then, is the natural law in regard to land ownership. Surely we would be scarcely justified in assuming that either Archbishop Corrigan or Cardinal Manning is ignorant of the well-known fact that commercial property in land is comparativly a modern institution, and even now confined to a few western nations. It is true that in a certain way it was permitted by the Roman civil law, but the spirit of that law was consistent with, not opposed to, the "agrarian laws," the very constitution of the state requiring that every citizen should be a land-holder, and every land-holder a citizen. The Dominium, which corresponded to the German Allod, and to our absolute ownership, originally extended only to the domicilium, that which was occupied as the home.

Traffic in slaves, greatly multiplied by Rome's aggressiv wars, called for the extension of the dominion of the patricians, on which to place their human chattels, and thus the absolute power, at first exercised alone over the sacred precincts of Rome, was extended over wide demesnes, and ultimately became matter of transfer and sale, until the whole territory of imperial Rome was swallowed up by large proprietors, and occupied by numberless slaves, to the exclusion of the exploited and evicted citizens. It was not, as vulgarly believed, the agrarian laws which endangered and finally ruined the Roman civilization, but the suppression of those laws and the triumph of a spurious principle of property, which at last violated all property rights, whatever.

It is not probable that either of these divines would deem the abolition of slavery as an attack upon any just system of property, and yet a generation has scarce passed since numerous doctors of divinity denounced the antislavery agitation as dangerous meddling with "the sacred rights of property," to question which they held to be treason to the state, and blasphemy against an institution of divine origin. We must conclude that it is the garish light of scholastic learning which causes these educated men to overlook the dangerous precipices toward which commercial monopoly of the land is drifting; the laying of tribute upon labor by a wholly useless class; the "rack-rent," "eviction," disinheritance and murder, scarcely disguised; and the inevitable reprisals which must follow—agrarian crimes, rebellions, assassinations. Will they never ask themselvs whether any true principle of property can involve such robbery, such mockery of justice, such national degradation and general ruin?

Absolute property in land givs to one man dominion over the inheritance of thousands, carrying with it virtually the power over life and death, liberty and slavery. "Occupying ownership," or possessory property, givs only to the worker security of title in possession to such land or goods as his labor has been joined to, while leaving to all others similar opportunity. This is the natural and equitable law. No divine law can differ from it, and all human laws should conform to it. J. K. INGALLS.

Why Am I Not a Christian?

A REPLY TO THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

GENTLEMEN: You will permit me to thank you for your card, asking why I am not a Christian. And in my reply I shall endeavor to treat the subject fairly. Religion is a matter of policy, locality, and education. And of the thousand religions you hav selected your religion for the reason that you hav been educated to believe it the best. But while you believe it the best, I believe it the worst; for it is heaven or hell for everybody, and almost everybody for hell. Now, I don't like such a religion as that.

And if any of your mothers hav died, and they were unbelievers, according to the creed of your church they are now in hell, and whilst they are weeping and wailing it is your duty to love and praise the one who sent them to that place of eternal agony and pain. You may like such a religion, but I do not. There is no evidence that Mary, the mother of Christ, believed, or ever said, that her son was the son of God and, if she did believe that he was the son of God, she would hav been quite apt to say so, and if she did say so, the fact ought to hav been recorded, for her opinion on that subject ought to hav been as good or better than the opinion of others. Now, if she died with doubts as to who was the real father of her son, according to the Bible she is now in hell. I do not believe that Christ would damn his own mother, nor do I believe that you ought to love a God that has damned your mother. I hate such a religion as that.

Truth cannot contradict itself. The Bible is filled with contradictions; therefore it cannot be true. Your religion is founded on the Bible and the belief that it is God's word, but you differ in your opinions as to its real meaning—that is, you cannot understand the book. And you say that God knows everything and can do everything; then he knew that you could not understand, and did not want you to understand, or he would hav made the book so that you could understand, or else he had nothing to do with its making. It is either the one or the other, and you can take your choice.

A God that could make a universe, with its worlds and millions of stars so perfect as not to clash one with the other, ought to hav been able to make just one little book that would not so clash with itself as to make one a Presbyterian, another a Unitarian, and another one a Universalist, and then damn the Unitarian and the Universalist for not having been Presbyterians. Gentlemen, on your card you giv me several Bible passages, and I will now giv you one: "The fear of the Lord prolongeth days: but the days of the wicked shall be shortened" (Prov. xix, 2). Now, I do not fear the Lord; for if there is a God I do not believe him to be one-half so bad as the Bible represents him to be, and yet I hav beaten you, who fear him, in the record of life, for I hav lived longer than most of you will liv; for, instead of my days having been shortened, I hav lived within a few days of the age of three score and ten—the full age allowed to man. Besides, by your authority, I hav proved that I am not a wicked man, for my days hav not been shortened. Now, if I am not wicked, why should I be damned?

Christ never hurt anybody in this world, but you think that he will not object to seeing almost everybody burnt in the next world. He never kept Sunday as a holy day, believing, like Paul, that all days were alike, and I agree with him in that, but you are against him. And you want to know why I am not a Christian. Christ was a friend to the poor, and I sometimes hav given a little. Let me giv a little item, clipped from one of our village papers. And when you read it, if you feel like it, you can send me another card and ask why I am not a Christian:

M. Babcock's Christmas tree this year bore the sunny fruit of charity in the shape of envelopes containing five-dollar bills for several poor widows of St. John's, and several dollars for poor boys. Mr. Babcock's theology isn't up to the orthodox standard, but when it comes to the solid religion of clothing the widow and feeding the orphan his record outshines that of many who, neglecting to scatter sunshine in the paths of their less favored fellow-mortals, hope to mount to joys celestial on the clipped wings of creed and dogma.

Now, you see, I did not giv much nor giv because I am so very fond of giving, but I thought it might suit Christ just as well to see me giv a little as it would to see me on my knees, or to see me paying a minister for praying and asking God to feed them. And if it suits him it will be cheaper for me, and it may be that it will be just as well for the widows. I hav given more than two hundred dollars to the clergy and the church, and yet they insist that I ought to be damned if I will not believe the Bible to be God's word. So I hav stopped giving to the church, and wish to find a cheaper way of being saved than by the way of the church.

Now, let me giv an extract from a letter of thanks which I received, and I only giv it as a means of showing how much good a little gift may do, and how much better it was to giv as I did than to giv to the church. The writer says that she received a paper—it wasn't a Christmas present, for after getting the paper she said that she and her children had a spell of crying. So I infer that the paper was a Christmas notice to pay her rent or get out of the house. She writes: "I thank you for your kind and generous present. On Friday I had been given a paper, and then we had a spell of crying. Susie was taken sick, and when Johnnie came home she was asleep. When Johnnie gave me the envelope I could hardly believe what I read—'Five dollars from Santa Claus.' And when I took from it the new five-dollar bill I knew I was not dreaming. In our great joy we awoke Susie to tell her the good news. I shall save the money to commence my rent somewhere else, and I am thankful to think it will keep a roof over our heads for five weeks. To-day I think the sun has shone with a softer light than it ever did before, and I think, too, the Lord made you his agent to help us in our distress. May he reward you a hundredfold!"

Now, gentlemen, I hav some doubts as to the propriety of publishing these items, but when you ask why am I not a Christian, I must say something. I want you to work a little more humanity into your religion, and treat Christ with more respect than to believe that he will damn any man for his honest opinons. But you say that I was born a sinner. Well, I am not to blame for that any more than a black man is to blame for having been born black. And it would be just as reasonable to damn him for his color as to damn me for having been born a sinner.

This poor woman, you will notice, thinks that I am an agent of the Lord. Well, if I work for God and furnish my own money and do just what he wants me to do, and charge nothing for my work, I don't believe that he will ever damn such an agent. The fact is, if there is a God, and if Christ ever lived, I hav a better opinion of them than you hav. You hav my kindest regards and best wishes. M. BABCOCK.

How Would the "Rogue's March" Answer?

From the Central Presbyterian.

In one of the Richmond churches we heard last Sunday one of the most touching and earnest appeals to the sinner we ever listened to—and what thereupon followed? A hymn was sung, the benediction pronounced, and then the musicians in the gallery struck up in the briskest and loudest strains a quick-step march from a popular opera, and so sent the congregation almost dancing out of the church.

News and Notes.

Rome City, Ind., is a village of about six hundred inhabitants. I was met at the station by our friend Ithamar Eddy, in the midst of a driving rain, and went with him to his home, about four miles in the country, where I had a good Saturday night's rest. Rome City is quite a summer resort. From thirty to fifty thousand people come here on pleasant Sundays from every direction. Forty excursion trains break the Sabbath day, but nothing is said, since it is for the "benefit of clergy." When ministers can make anything by Sunday violation, they are perfectly willing to undertake the job. The buildings connected with the island, river, park, etc., are owned by the railroad company, but are given for use to any parties who desire to get up attractions, and the Methodist clergymen are ready to avail themselvs of this opportunity for a "religious racket" and big excursions and big gate-money. Twenty-five cents admission to every poor pilgrim who wants to hear the gospel of this "summer-land." Talmage, Sam Jones, Bill Nye, and other notorieties hav been here under the auspices of the church, and enormous crowds hav attended. The clergy are up to a trick or two worthy of Barnum himself. For an advertising dodge, giv me a few Methodist elders. They put their work in fine, Sabbath days and all. It was announced that a man would ride a bicycle on the lake, thus emulating in modern style the miracle of Jesus, for to ride in a bicycle over the water is certainly as difficult a peregrination as to walk. Thousands came to see the wondrous spectacle. Of course they had to listen to a round of sermons before the marvel appeared—and what was the marvel? Simply a contrivance by which a bicycle was put upon a small flatboat and used as an instrument for paddling—a very ordinary sort of humbug. And I guess all Christian miracles would pan out just the same way if exploited in the light of the nineteenth century. Of course the whole affair was a transparent fiction, a lying for the glory of God, but it brought money, and the ministers waxed fat, and no doubt laughed in one another's faces at the gullibility of the people and rejoiced in their devout cunning.

It is proposed to hav a Freethought convention here some time, and I think it might be a grand success. There are many Liberals in Noble and adjacent counties, and, in fact, throughout northern Indiana. It is easy of access from all parts, railroad connections are good, and I believe that on some bright summer's day we could gather an immense number; but I should want to hav the clerk of the weather thoroughly on our side and furnish a first-class holiday, all jeweled with blue skies and silver, fleecy clouds, and musical with soft winds, for I notice that Liberals don't like to go to meeting in mud and rain. I presume arrangements will some time be made for a grand rally of our forces at Rome City.

Sunday, January 23d, was like an April day, and rain and shine kept coming and going, and getting mixed up in marvelous fashion. When the sun was shining brightly the rain kept pouring down. It did not like to quit, but I had a full house after all. Mr. Corbin, Dr. Williams, and others are pleasant friends and good workers, and I quite enjoyed my visit to Rome City, and look forward with high hope to the future organization of our forces here.

Mr. S. W. Devenbough, whom I met at Cassadaga Congress, and who was present at the New York State Convention this year, and who is an enthusiastic and outspoken Liberal, in spite of the stormy outlook came several miles to the lecture with his wife and daughter, and I went with him to his pleasant home in Brimfield, where I spent Sunday night. Nearly thirty years ago he came to this spot, covered with the "forest primeval," and began with his ax to hew a home in the wilderness. Amid many difficulties he conquered stubborn nature, and now has one of the handsomest and best farms in the state, with elegant residence, big barn, and all the comfortable aspects of country life. Mr. and Mrs. Devenbough, like sensible Liberals who don't look forward to harp playing as a reward for this world's toil, hav enjoyed the fruits of their work in pleasure and refinement here and now—in delightful travels over Europe, California, etc.—and so I found this a model Secular family, where leisure and noble delight blend with laborious days. I was quite refreshed by its natural and enlivening hospitality. I expect on my return to see these friends again and inaugurate something of a Liberal campaign in Noble county, including Rome City, Kendallsville, Albion, Ligonier, etc.

Monday was a lovely day, and the ride to Kendallsville over the sparkling snow was invigorating and gave me good courage for the long jump eastward, three hundred miles, to the blazing camp-fires of Linesville, Pa. I feel very much like a spirit—a witch, indeed—I hav been taking so many night-rides, traversing immense and shadowy spaces, starlighted, moonlighted, or domed with impenetrable clouds. I hav been flying along, not on a broomstick, however, as I should hav had to do a hundred years ago. The Lucifer of to-day has provided much better accommodations for those who want to take a fast trip.

I did not get to Linesville until Tuesday. Meanwhile, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the fort had been held with courage and endurance by those two bright stars of the feminin persuasion, Mrs. Freeman and Mrs. Reynolds, and I understand from good authority that we men were not missed a single bit; that, in fact, the women did a little better than we could hav done; and this I most potently believe. Mrs. Freeman has won golden opinions. She is a most ready speaker, good for a long discourse or for a short, brilliant speech. Her lectures are both thoughtful and sparkling, and entertain and instruct. Those who want something bright, witty, progressiv, sensible, must secure the services of this talented lady. Now that she has consented to enter the general lecture field, I hope that Liberal societies will keep her busy.

Mrs. Reynolds, brave and patient while the clouds of orthodox persecution are threatening, is doing valuable service by her earnest words, and is especially worthy of generous support now that her husband, Mr. Reynolds, is at the point of issue where the lightnings of religious hate hav the opportunity to strike with force and desolating power.

Mr. Charles Watts arrived on the noon train from Pittsburgh. His wife has just met with a serious accident—a fall from a carriage—which at one time seemed quite dangerous, and prevented Mr. Watts from fulfilling lecture engagements. At last accounts, however, Mrs. Watts was recovering. Our valiant comrade needs our hearty sympathy, for the pioneer work is severe enough if we hav health and strength. With sickness, especially of loved ones absent, the strain upon one's vitality is simply terrific.

Mr. Watts spoke with his usual impetuous and instructiv eloquence, and gave three discourses during the remaining sessions of the meeting; and so did the secretary, mainly upon the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," and the importance of organization.

I had to leave Linesville Wednesday afternoon, before the big ball came off, with the music and dancing, the yellow-legged chickens, mince pies, etc., besides the array of "fair women and brave men," and those who know the mind of the secretary will realize that he obeyed the summons to duty very unwillingly. But he must be at Waterloo, Ind., Thursday night, and delays this season of the year, with ice and thaw, are dangerous.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin, our stanch captain at Linesville, had his forces in good order, and with Mr. C. D. Thayer, our good Nestor; Mr. Butler, the chairman; Mr. Hamlin, who as usual furnished excellent music, assisted by Mr. A. M. Freeman, of Chicago, who fingered the light guitar, and Mr. Thorp Williams and sister, who made exhilarating strains, so that if we had been in a Methodist camp-meeting we should hav shouted, Glory hallelujah! Mr. D. G. Brockaway, of Farmdale; Mr. A. Morey, of Gustavus; Mrs. Dr. Bookes, of Helena, Neb.; C. B. Brooks, Mr. John Bissell, etc., altogether made our ranks full of hope and good cheer, spite of the low mutterings of the orthodox party who didn't like to see Liberals quite so contented and happy.

I expect to visit Farmdale, Ohio, on my return. There is quite a knot of Liberals here, and an effort will be made for organization. Thus the fields of labor are continually opening.

Another midnight ride, and the iron horse dashing through the blue and golden gates of morning, and I arrive at Waterloo. I am met by that indomitable pioneer, E. R. Shoemaker, who bears almost all the burden of the campaign here, but he is able to do it. However, I found other good allies, Mr. Kelly, etc., and with Mr. Shoemaker spent a few hours in seeing the friends who fall into line at the summons, and are ready to keep our banner at the front. Mr. Remsburg has already been here, and I think that Waterloo will make a good live point eventually. Without doubt there will be an organization of our Liberal forces in this place and vicinity.

I lectured in the Reformed church, as it is called. This makes two churches that I hav lectured in since I began this trip. I begin to feel quite evangelical. The droppings of the sanctuary are upon me. Times change. The Reformed church would hav burnt me once. It now givs me a comfortable reception.

Gen. Blair, of Waterloo, presided over the meeting, and with cordial remarks made the introduction of the speaker favorable.

The church was full to overflowing, although two revivals were going on at the same time. We had good music by Mr. Bergman and his band, and it was of the right sort—cheery, secular, inspiring—and this added charm helped me to giv my discourse with better effect. A considerable number of Christians were present, and listened with apparent good nature to my criticisms of the ancient faith. My subject was "Universal Mental Liberty." As by taking another midnight train I could arrive in Chicago in time for the Paine celebration, it was proposed that I giv my lecture, "The New Heaven and Earth," the next night. I left it for the audience to decide, and by a unanimous rising vote it was resolved that the second lecture should be given, so I remain over for this Friday evening, and proceed to Chicago to-night.

I am now at the farm home of Mr. Shoemaker, a beautiful place three miles out of Waterloo. Mr. and Mrs. Shoemaker and their two sons, who are at home, are intelligent Freethinkers, and it is a pleasure to be in this family, amid the broad acres, where you hav plenty of room to stir about. However, I hug the stove to-day as I write these notes, for the skies are thick with clouds, and the winds are howling with a sort of melancholy thunder, and the pine-trees are doing their level best to make one feel blue, and on the whole it looks as if we wouldn't hav a very pleasant evening for the lecture. However, the die is cast, and we must buckle on our armor. If there are but few of us, we will hav a good time—ring out the old, ring in the new—under the very roof of the church itself. To-morrow and Sunday next I shall be in Chicago; Feb. 5th and 6th, at Fort Madison, Iowa; Feb. 8th, at Belton, Mo.; Feb. 9th and 10th, at Bavaria, Kansas; Feb. 11th, 12th, and 13th, at Salina, Kansas; Feb. 14th 15th, at Brookville, Kansas. I am in hopes, if time allows, to lecture at Haven and Windom, Kansas, on my way to Fort Dodge. I expect to be at Fort Dodge on Feb. 20th; Garden City, Kansas, Feb. 21st and 22d. I find I must change my dates for Denver; I shall be there March 6th and 13th, and not Feb. 27th, as before announced. I hope to go to Greeley, Longmont, Boulder City, Central City, Colorado Springs, while in Colorado. Will friends at these places interest themselvs in this matter, and arrange for lectures. I shall be at Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Tulare, and other places in Southern California from March 13th to April 1st. During April I expect to be at San Francisco, Oakland, San Jose, etc., and in other places in California until June 1st. I shall be in Portland, Oregon, Baker City, etc., in June, and in Washington Territory in July. I want friends at these places to correspond with me at the earliest possible moment in order that I can arrange the lectures two or three months beforehand. My permanent address while en route is 750 W. Lake street, Chicago. All letters sent there will be forwarded.

Paine Celebrations.

AT THE MANHATTAN LIBERAL CLUB.

An audience that crowded the hall to its outside limits assembled at the rooms of the Manhattan Liberal Club on the evening of the 28th, to take part in the Paine anniversary services. The regular speaker of the evening, Dr. R. G. Eccles, had kindly given way, by request, that the evening might be devoted to recalling and rendering more sacred the memory of the Author-Hero of the Revolution.

Mr. Wakeman presided. He had hoped to secure on this occasion the attendance of Dr. VanBuren Denslow, the biographer of Paine in a work called "Modern Thinkers," but Mr Denslow was unavoidably kept away.

Mr. E. W. Chamberlain, after saying that a poem which he was about to read was the grandest one ever written, gave the extracts from Miller Hagaman's poem on "Liberty," printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 25, 1886. This poem, as Mr. Chamberlain said, embodied the spirit of Thomas Paine's writings.

Mr. Wakeman made the address of the evening, taking the Positivistic view of Paine, and showing that it is not his mere destructiv work that constitutes his strongest claim to our respect.

Following Mr. Wakeman, there was a piano solo by Mrs. Randolph, who played an original piece, copies of which were on sale for the benefit of the Workingmen's Free Library. Professor Wessel gave a violin performance of great merit. Mrs. Hinton recited a poem, and was recalled to giv another; and Miss Russell sang two songs very sweetly. Mr. Wakeman spoke briefly, saying that there still survived in the United States two of the old-time Thomas Paine Liberals—Capt. George Loyd, of New Rochelle, N. Y., and Horace Seaver, of Boston. Captain Loyd was present in the audience. Some token should be sent from New York to Boston on this occasion, and Captain Loyd would say what that should be.

The venerable Captain Loyd told about the present tenure of the land around Paine's monument, and said further that he had cut a limb from a tree that once grew over the grave of Paine. As Mr. Wakeman was going to Boston to attend the Paine anniversary proceedings, he would send this limb to Mr. Seaver, with a suitable inscription.

Further exercises consisted of more music from Professor Wessel's violin, and a short address by Mr. Gunton, in which the latter pointed out that the way to secure the liberty which Paine advocated was to abolish poverty. Poor men could never be free men.

In his closing remarks Mr. Wakeman said that Paine had showed that poverty and suffering could be largely done away with when men should inaugurate the universal republic, the federation of the world.

Everything had passed off so smoothly and interestingly that the audience nearly forgot the flight of time, and it was at a late hour that the meeting broke up.

Friday evening, the 4th, Dr. Eccles givs his lecture on "Evolution Illustrated by a Flower."

AT THE SOCIETY OF HUMANITY.

On the evening of the 29th, there was an anniversary celebration and sociable at the parlors of the Society of Humanity, at 28 Lafayette Place. The committee having the affair in charge had decorated the rooms for the occasion and prepared a fine program. A large crayon portrait of Paine, from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, hung on the wall back of the speaker's stand, and this was surrounded by a half dozen silk copies of the Stars and Stripes, which Mr. Eckhard had bought, and which the young ladies of the committee had festooned about the picture with becoming taste. Large flags extended from the center to each side of the room, and above them all an illuminated placard bore this motto:

> The world is my Country; to do good, my Religion.

The rain fell in torrents all the afternoon and evening, which fact is here mentioned casually and not because it had anything to do with the meeting. Amid the prevailing dampness the members kept dry the powder of enthusiasm. For lecture occasions the society has borrowed the chairs which Mr. Reynolds uses in his tent, and these were nearly all filled when, at 9 o'clock, Dr. Ned Foote called the assemblage to order, and introduced Mr. Edward King, who spoke for about thirty minutes on the traits in Paine's character which made it appropriate that this society should commemorate his birth. Mr. King read extracts from many writers and historians, showing how great were the Author-Hero's services in the cause of civil liberty, and expressed a belief that Paine deserved a place in the Positivistic calendar, although Comte had not seen fit to accord him that honor. Mr. King would not attempt to eulogize Paine. Robert Ingersoll had taken that task in hand, and with his last word on the subject the force of eulogy had ceased. Nothing more could be done than to repeat the words of the great Liberal orator. Paine was constructiv as well as destructiv, and wrote his "Age of Reason" when he did in order, as he said, that, amid the general uprooting of superstition then going on, morality might be preserved. Mr. King's address contained much that was new and interesting as touching the scientific and historical value of Paine's work, and was received with hearty tokens of approval by the audience.

Colonel Ingersoll was expected to attend, and would hav liked to be there. The reason for his absence is given in the following letter:

89 5TH AVE., Jan. 29, 1887.

MY DEAR MACDONALD: Yesterday I had an operation performed on my throat. To-day I am speaking, as an Irishman would say, only in whispers. I would like to be with you honoring the memory of the man who did more for liberty than all the popes, cardinals, archbishops, bishops, priests, and clergymen that ever lived on the fears and ignorance of the human race. They were and are the friends of God, whereas Paine was the friend of man, and every man should be his friend. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

There were recitations by Mrs. Mazenovitch and Mr. Tonks, and Mr. Reynolds made a brief and stirring address. Then the chairs were removed, the musicians took the platform, and dancing ensued. It might be deemed invidious to point out any one among so many well-meaning people as especially deserving of mention, but it would be unjust to conceal the fact that Mr. King is scarcely less graceful as a dancer than as an orator. It is intended to preserve the social feature of the occasion, and to hav social meetings at these parlors as often as practicable.

The Catholic Church.

What! Yankeedom be but an appanage
Bestowed by the pope of Rome
On the younger son of some saintly name
Under St. Peter's dome?
Out on the old hagmalion!
The mother of scarlet knaves!
We're needing no son of that mother
To tread on our fathers' graves.

We're needing no high cockalorum
With pallium, surplice, and pyx,
No rosary humbugging prayer-wheels,
No dryrotting crucifix;
No masses, or vespers, or matins,
No altars, or fonts, or shrines;
No jeweled, cross-fashioned tiaras,
No cannibal food and wines.

We laugh at your saintly relics,
Your crosses and Holy Grails,
Your musty old bones of the martyrs,
Your parings of Peter's nails:
From Constantine down to Pius—
The ninth of that name I mean,
Who made the "immaculate Mary"
Not a whit less "unclean."

We're a nation of simple Yankees,
And down upon saints and such,
And if asked if we needed salvation,
We'd answer at once, "Not much!"
Away with your antique doins'!
Your rigmarole trash at Rome;
We've quite enough of the wretched stuff
Among ourselvs here at home.

As witness the muss at Andover,
Where wiseacres seek to know
The chances of soul salvation
Of the dead of the long ago.
To the souls of the Pliocene period
Some offer to giv a lift;
From that 'way back to the Simian line—
At least the "Flint Folk o' the Drift."

We've enough to do in these stirring times,
To help in the struggle of life;
To us the great question of questions:
The boss and the worker's strife.
We'd rather a million times over
Hav plenty and peace at home,
Than all of the spiritual "fixin's"
Of the Vatican at Rome.

A Story About Colonel Ingersoll.

From the Sun.

"I served in Col. Bob Ingersoll's command," said a veteran of the Ochiltree Club at the panorama of Bull Run this morning, "and whenever I want to hav a good laugh I recall in my mind the incidents connected with his capture in Tennessee. I hav seen somewhere a cruel paragraph to the effect that the colonel surrendered very willingly, and I want to brand that falsehood for just what it is. A braver man I never saw in five years of service. We were scattered over a good deal of territory surrounding a village at the time the colonel was taken in and cared for by the Johnnies. We were in a skirmish at the time, and the colonel was trying to get to a demoralized wing of his command. As he was passing through a series of cattle pens he was surrounded by a lot of Confederates and commanded to surrender, but he didn't do it worth a cent. He kept right on, running at breakneck speed. He was not so stout then as now, and as a pedestrian he was no slouch. The bullets were flying about him thick as hail. If he could get to another branch of his command he felt that he could rally the boys and win the fight. A number of his men saw that he was in imminent peril, and that if he didn't surrender he would be killed, and they yelled at him at the top of their voices to stop and surrender. He heeded, but I could that he did so with regret and disgust. Here is where the humor began. When the colonel stopped he threw up his hands and screamed out 'Stop firing! I'll acknowledge your —— old Confederacy!' The colonel was taken over to a store for safe keeping, and he proved to be a great curiosity. People flocked around him, listened to his stories, laughed, and declared that they were having more fun than they ever had in their lives.

"That night the colonel sat around the store till a goodly number of the rebels came in, and then he began to treat and tell yarns. Finally the crowd overflowed the place and blocked up the entrance to it. Then the colonel went outside. The boys were all feeling well under the potency of words and drinks, and every man, woman, and child within the sound his voice loved him. Directly the colonel was asked to make a speech. This was what he was working for, and a minute later he was on a box and addressing the crowd—and it was a right rough crowd, too. No lecture that great orator has ever delivered contained so much that was good in it. It fairly bubbled over with good will and the milk of human kindness. He pictured how regretfully the North took up arms against the South, reminding his hearers that they had fired the first shot in their assault upon Fort Sumter. Then he went off on slavery, placing the poor white before him in the place of the unfortunate blacks, a people with souls and all the instincts of the whites, but down-trodden for no other reason than that they were black. He pictured the scenes, when those who had held human souls in bondage were called before the judgment throne to answer for deeds done in the flesh. It was a touching appeal, and brought out streams of tears and storms of applause from the very men who had but a few hours before shot at and captured him. At the moment when the most pathetic passages in his speech were being delivered, Gen. Forrest, the Confederate cavalryman whose command had made the capture, rushed into the crowd, all aglow with excitement, but not anger, and exclaimed: 'Here, Ingersoll,' stop that speech and I'll exchange you for a Government mule.' A short time afterward Colonel Ingersoll was paroled. He was demoralizing the whole of that whole command, and would have had it revolting against its commander had he been allowed to go on for two or three days as he had on the first day."

Another About His Dog.

Colonel Fellows is a great admirer of dogs, and doesn't hav to observe which way the tail curls to judge whether the breed is good or not. It is also easier for him to reach down and pat a good dog's head than for Commissioner Brennan. The other day a superb Irish setter stuck his nose into the colonel's hand unbewares as he stood discussing County Democracy affairs in the Hoffman. The colonel was charmed, and patted the shaggy red head, saying, "You're a fine fellow; who's your master?" The setter slowly shook his head. "He heard what I said, and he doesn't know who his master is. Did you see him shake his head?" said the colonel.

"That's Bob Ingersoll's famous Irish setter, colonel," said a gentleman.

"Ingersoll's! There you hav proof. The dog's an Agnostic, too," and the colonel patted the setter again, and with the touch of increased respect.

A Roman Catholic Fetich.

From the San Francisco Argonaut.

And now, while we hav the Examiner in hand, we will publish an extract from its edition of July 7th. It illustrates, we think, the relation that exists between religious bigotry and political cowardice. It demonstrates the attitude which a Democratic newspaper holds to the Catholic church. We giv this wonderful item of politico-religious information, and ask intelligent Romanists to imagin how such a thing must appear to the non-religious man or the man without faith. If it is not too severe a strain, let him reflect how the average, level-headed, common-sense, Protestant-minded individual must regard such arrant nonsense as this idolatry of a piece of rotten wood, when there is not one chance in a million that the sacred splinter came from the true cross. And if it did, it is not of the least consequence in the world. Let us giv the item before we continue our criticism:

THE SAVIOR'S CROSS—THE PORTION OF IT OBTAINED BY ST. FRANCIS'S CHURCH.—A venerated treasure has been acquired by the people attending St. Francis's church, on whom the Redemptorist Fathers hav bestowed a portion of our savior's cross. Archbishop Riordan has affirmed the genuinness of the wood, which is inclosed under glass in a small silver reliquary, fastened to the wall by the side of the blessed Virgin's altar and under the large crucifix left by the missionaries at the close of their labors in the church. The holy rood upon which the Redeemer died is at the palace of the Pontiff, in Rome, and a remarkable fact recorded of it, as is attested by the faithful, is that, notwithstanding how many pieces, or splinters rather, are taken therefrom, it never diminishes.

We are glad to know that our most worthy Archbishop Riordan has so mastered the legend of the discovery of the true cross by the Empress Helena nearly four hundred years after its use for the crucifixion of Christ—if it was ever so used—that he can affirm the genuinness of the wood. We hope it may do a great deal of good, and in case the church should burn, let the faithful be not in the least degree despondent lest they should be unable to get another genuin splinter, because this particular piece of wood possesses the miraculous power of reproducing itself; and if this miraculous power of self-multiplication fail, let it be known that reliquary sellers hav never been out of genuin splinters, and never will be, so long as they command a good price, which bigotry and ignorance are always willing to pay. Is it a wonder that in this nineteenth century, this age of intelligence, there should be found men and women who will sneer at such pretensions, and refuse to believe in a religion that must be supported by such idiotic nonsense as this?

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Association of Moralists is a Liberal organization now in the twelfth year of its existence. It has some remarkable features. A copy of the constitution will be sent to any address on receipt of a one-cent stamp. Address Dr. A. R. Ayres, secretary of the Society of Moralists, Hannibal, Mo.

W. F. JAMIESON gave his tenth Sunday evening lecture in Denver, Col., before an audience that packed Unity church, extra chairs having been brought in, and many turned away unable to gain entrance. His subject was the fifth of a series of discourses on "Immorality," being entitled "My Personal Experience in Modern Spiritualism." He is now filling his Nebraska engagements: Minden, Central City, Osceola, Stromsburg, Wilber, Waverly, Argo, Omaha. Address at Denver, Col.

Christian Absurdities.

The Christian's duty is narrowed down to reading an old book, and bowing down to his great Spontagligasticus, and to giving him a great deal of cheap advice; and to thinking how his God is filled with pure cussedness because a woman ate an apple six thousand years ago. The true Christian can be of but little service to his kind, for his time will be mostly spent in trying to beat the devil, and doing the agreeable to the "great first cause least understood."

The Christian teaches that a certain individual was executed nearly two thousand years ago, and through his blood all can escape the consequences of wrong-doing. Is it possible that the great interests of the world can be made to hinge on such a circumstance?

What does it matter to the thousands of starving poor, huddled together in tenement-houses like beasts, whether Christ died for them or somebody else, or whether he died at all or not. What they want is better conditions, better houses, better food and clothing—not blood. To them the blood of Christ will do no more good than any other blood. The man who is more interested in imaginary beings in the skies than he is in the suffering ones ought to be treated as an outlaw.

The blood of Christ will never reach the brothels and rum-holes and slums, scattered all through the land, like scars after the small-pox. The teacher is more needed than the preacher. The great want of the people is practical knowledge—less talk about the efficacy of blood and more practical work—more humanity and less Christianity. The soup-houses and cheap dinners which have been furnished in some of the large cities have helped the poor more than all the missionaries who have made fools of themselves among the heathen.

We want to stop fooling with gods and saviors, and by and through our own efforts make the poor and suffering understand that we are their real saviors. What good will it do to tell the human vermin that swarm our cities—sleeping in dry-goods boxes and gangways, and living on garbage—that they must look to a crucified savior? Out upon such nonsense! When will men learn that the blessings of heaven can do us no good on the earth—that the blessings to ourselves and others must come through the efforts of our own heads and hands. When will men get off their knees and leave off their sky enterprises and turn their gaze from heaven to earth?

Christianity has been long and faithfully tried. It originated in ignorance, and ignorance has been a characteristic feature of its adherents until the present time. For a thousand years it held the people of Europe in the midnight of darkness. From the time it was firmly established it has been characterized by persecution and slaughter. Wherever Christianity has had the power it has murdered and imprisoned, roasted and robbed, with a savage ferocity.

The most deadly strifes and terrible encounters recorded in the world's history have taken place among Christian nations. The inventive genius of the Christians has been taxed to produce weapons which would reduce to froth the greatest number of Christian brains in the shortest time. Remember the mission of Christianity was not to bring peace, but a sword.

There has scarcely been a war since the Christian era unless some Christian nation has had a hand in it. For hundreds of years Christianity did not find out that drunkenness was a crime, or decency and cleanliness a virtue. In this country in an early day ministers frequently took grain in payment for their services, and had it distilled into whisky. Many of them kept a bountiful supply on hand, and frequently indulged, even to inebriation. For many years the church was the "tower of strength" to slavery—church-members and ministers owning slaves, and selling babes from the breast of mothers, and sometimes their own children, into bondage. One devout Christian declared "that each year he meant to devote one slave to the interest of Zion." Not unfrequently the prayer of the slave-owner and the sound of the driver's whip could be heard from the same plantation.

In some mysterious way, crime and some of the most evil practices have followed the missionary to every clime. A faithful account of all the prostitution in every Christian country would be appalling. In the most Christian society, even in the churches, practices obtain which are little better than prostitution. Hundreds of women can be found in the churches living with men who can in no just sense be called their husbands—men for whom they never had any affinity; men whom they never loved; men whom they married because they were rich, without any regard to the eternal fitness of things. Where is the difference between such practices and open prostitution? In both instances the woman is in the market for money.

The church has always assumed authority in these matters; and when these unholy alliances produce nothing but gall and aconite, and when these disgusted parties seek to free themselves from such loathsome bonds, the church puts up his hands in holy horror, and exclaims, "What God has joined together let no man put asunder." But it should be remembered that the stock in trade of the church are forms and ceremonies, and not principles.

The church prates about licentiousness and lewdness—about license and obscenity, free love, and all that, but never rebukes this high-handed adultery when it is under the forms of the church.

No one will trust a man because he is a Christian. Not one of them could draw a dollar from a bank on his church certificate.

Almost every paper brings intelligence of some Christian getting away with unearned money. Bank robberies are frequent; forgeries are so common as to excite little comment; jails and poorhouses are full; executions for murder are matters of daily occurrence; seductions and elopements, infanticide and suicide, are occurring in almost every neighborhood. Money everywhere obtains place and power. Legislators, both state and national, sell out, and so readily that the price is taken into account by capitalists and corporations when a new scheme is projected. Even Christians have no confidence in each other. Suits at law often occur between Christians, in which one swears a lie directly into the teeth of another. Neither has one Christian nation any confidence in another. It does beat all how the peaceful influence of the meek and lowly Jesus has set his followers to cutting each other's throats.

Such are the fruits of the Christian religion after a trial of two thousand years. Christianity has never made men better, but it has made thousands worse. John Calvin, Torquemada, and all the witch-burners and woman-whippers might have been decent men if it had not been for their religion. Christianity has sacrificed millions upon millions in holy wars. It has tortured and murdered tens of thousands for opinion's sake. It has murdered other tens of thousands for the unmeaning crime of witchcraft.

With all these facts before our eyes, after this long and faithful trial, is it not about time to run down the curtains, put out the footlights, close the doors, and pronounce Christianity a failure?

Some of the most depraved men who ever cursed the world have been the most zealous Christians. Nothing is more natural than for guilty persons to become devout. Having sinned beyond the world's forgiveness, they seek forgiveness in heaven. Having violated every principle of decency and justice, and brought upon themselves the just condemnation of all good people, they seek the consolations of religion. The bloodthirsty murderer, Constantine, was a case in point. Some of the most devout Christians are found in states prison. Nearly every man who mounts the scaffold is attended by his spiritual adviser, gives utterance to orthodox sentiments, and when the drop falls, another spirit becomes the tenant of that "mansion in the skies not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Too vile for earth, he is twitched to heaven with a rope, where only the pure can enter. Perhaps the poor victim whom he murdered, although a moral and upright man, has never had a "change of heart," and he must roast in hell. This is the Christian's idea of it. The Christian is always full of repentance, but seldom mends.

Every time the Christian gets scared about hell he repents. As soon as the scare is over, he goes back to his old tricks.

The Christian religion has been a declaration of war against every instinct of our nature. A cardinal doctrine is that it is wicked for one to be happy until he gets to heaven. Then he is to be rendered eternally happy by wearing white robes, without anyone to wash them, and all the time he is to keep flapping a beautiful pair of wings, which will sprout out on his shoulders, and twang a harp without cessation. If you are happy here, you cannot be happy hereafter. The way to fill heaven with smiles is to wear a long face here. If one is inclined to enjoy himself here, he is on the broad road to hell. To be sure of eternal life, one must look and act as if he was struck with eternal death. He is the most acceptable who is the most miserable. To be on your knees and regard yourself as a worm of the dust is to be godlike. To be a bold and independent thinker and investigator is always to be partaking of the forbidden fruit. To make a hell of this life is to escape hell in a life to come. So the Christian fixes it.

For hundreds of years the doctrine was current that all men were born in sin; in other words, were hell-deserving. Sin could not enter the kingdom of heaven, therefore every child that died, although free from crime, must be handed over to the superintendent of the plutonian regions, because a woman ate an apple six thousand years ago. See yon group of merry children sporting on the green; hear the innocent ripple of laughter. Are these innocents hell-deserving? Who can look upon such a group and say they are totally depraved—that they are born in sin? I could only loathe and detest a God who would consign such a group of innocents to endless torments. And yet for centuries the church taught this horrible doctrine. Oh, what a God! Oh, what a system!

According to the Christian idea, the sorrows and miseries of this life far exceed the joys and happiness, and then while a few are elected to share the joys of heaven, the vast majority are elected to endure the most frightful torments throughout an endless eternity. If this theory be correct, then words more frightful in their consequences were never uttered than those words uttered by God when he said, "Let us make man" If there is a God who ever created one human being only to damn him, then I loathe that God. Damn a God who will damn an innocent child. The human mind cannot conceive anything more ferocious. I am in favor of a great deal of happiness, therefore I utterly detest this damnation doctrine.

The latter-day Christian will tell you that he does not believe in infant damnation. There is where good sense and justice outrun his religion. He sees the barbarism of infant damnation only when he forgets the monstrosity of his religion. If all children are not born in sin, then the fall of man goes for naught. If they are born in sin, and there is no way of being saved only through repentance and belief in Jesus Christ, then every child that dies unrepentant must go to hell. If, then, there is no sin at birth, what does the old snake story amount to? If there is any other way to be saved except through Jesus Christ, then away goes the plan of salvation. To deny infant damnation is to deny the fall of man. That gone, the plan of redemption is a bubble. Infant damnation is not the only horrible feature of Christianity.

"If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and his wife and children, and brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

Not for Jesus's sake, nor for heaven, nor the fear of hell, will I hate my father and mother, or my wife or children, or brothers or sisters. Here is where Christianity and humanity part company. He that loves the one must hate the other. When human kind get to hating themselves, the race will become extinct. What I have just reason to hate I will put out of the way if it is in my power to do so. Down with this doctrine of hate and all who teach it; it has cursed the world long enough. When less hell and hate are taught, and more love for our kind, then will all be happier here, and none fare worse hereafter. The church and the priesthood may lose, but humanity will gain. Calling one a savior or redeemer who teaches such a doctrine of hatred does not abate the curse of it one iota.

"Take no thought of your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, or what ye shall put on."

Of course not. Don't think about your living; if you don't get a square meal, eat with the swine, or gnaw any old bone which you may find, like a dog. Don't think about digging a well when you get thirsty; drink out of a mud-puddle. If the drink and diet don't agree with you, you will get to heaven all the quicker. And then the poor Esquimaux—they are not to think about clothing. Whew! let us go in and warm! Nowhere outside of a "sacred book" can be found such fool talk as that. To follow the advice would be little better than suicide. "He that believeth in me hath eternal life, and shall not come into condemnation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned."

Here real merit is entirely lost sight of, and eternal happiness or misery is made to hinge on simple belief. This passage of scripture seems to rest upon the assumption that belief is like a pair of old slippers—they are off or on as you may desire, without much trouble on your part. But if you slip them off and death overtakes you, certain parties will begin to punch up the fire in regions already uncomfortably torrid.

JOHN PECK.

"The Childhood of the World."

I hav just finished reading to my children a little work of Edward Clodd's, with the above title, published in the Humboldt Library (No. 60); and while I would recomend it, as well as his works entitled "The Childhood of Religion" and "The Birth and Growth of Myth" (No. 47 and 54, Hum. Lib.), I want to take exception to some of his assertions, and add, perhaps, a little to his testimony from the writings of others in the same field of thought. "Everything," he says, "in the wide world has a history." "Clever men" hav traced the history of even the "stones of the roadway;" more wonderful still the history of living things; most wonderful of all, the boys and girls of this generation. To these he says: "Well, it is about yourself that I am going to talk; for I want you to learn as far as we are able to find out how it is that your are what you are, and where you are." So far, good; but he adds, and to this I take exception: "Remember I do not say how you are, or why you are, for God alone knows that, and he has told the secret to no one here, although, maybe, he will tell it to us one day elsewhere." Pure fancy, and should be omitted. He then goes back, away back, to "show you that man was once wild, and rough and savage; frightened at the roar of thunder and the quiver of lightning, which he thought were the clapping of the wings, and the flashing of the eyes of the angry spirit, as he came flying from the sun; and that it has taken many thousands of years for man to become as wise and as skilful as we now see him to be." This was the childhood of the race; and all the knowledge we hav since acquired has been by slow experiment and patient toil. And the story is not one of progress alone. Races, after attaining a comparativly high degree of intelligence, hav backslid, obstacles hav arisen, and the race degenerated. He tells you "several reasons for the belief that man was once wild and naked, and that by slow degrees did he become clothed and civilized. All over the world the first evidences we hav of man's existence are the tools and weapons found. These are of a low order, and constitute what is known as the first or rough stone age." He givs as a sample of primitiv men the nativs of Australia, Borneo, and Ceylon. On these islands, he says, "there liv at this day creatures so wild that if you saw them you would scarcely believe that they were human beings, and not wild animals in the shape of men, covering themselvs with mud, feeding on roots, and living in wretched huts, or in the woods under the shelter of trees." The rough stone age—the first indication of man, and by far the longest period of his existence—takes us back countless ages in the world's history, all through what is called the Quaternary period, showing him to be contemporary with those monster extinct animals. Says De Mortillet:

All geologists are agreed that the duration of the period in which we liv is as nothing compared with that of the Quaternary period. It is as a day compared to ages, as a drop of water in a stream. All paleontologists understand what a length of time is required for the rise and decline of animal species which while they hav been upon the earth hav been lavishly distributed over an enormous area. . . . The earliest Quaternary epoch, the pre-Glacial, is characterized so far as man's works are concerned by a stone implement of peculiar form. It is dressed on its two sides, usually rather roughly chipped; it is rounded at the base, pointed at the top, and its edges are pretty sharp. In general form it is more or less almond-shaped. This implement in past times, called by workmen in quarries 'langue de chat' (cat's tongue), is now called 'hache de St. Acheul' (hatchet of St. Acheul), terms derived from the locality in which it has been oftenest found. They are found in abundance in the Quaternary alluviums of France, England, and Spain. Nay, within a few years they hav been found in the valley of the Delaware near Trenton, New Jersey, by Dr. Charles C. Abbott. The figures which he has published and his description tally exactly with the St. Acheul hatchets of France and England.

But this is not all. M. De Mortillet takes us back still further, back to Tertiary man:

But first let us understand what is meant by the terms "Quaternary man" and "Tertiary man." The fauna of the mammals serves clearly to determin the limits of these later geological periods. The Tertiary is characterized by terrestrial mammals entirely different from extant species; the Quaternary by the mingling of extant with extinct species; the present period by the extant fauna.

The man of the early Quaternary, he who made the St. Acheul hatchets and used them, is the man of Neanderthal, of Canstatt, of Enggisheim, of La Naulette, of Denise. He is indubitably a man, but differing more widely from the Australian and the Hottentot than the Australian and Hottentot differ from the European. Hence unquestionably he formed another human species, the word "species" being taken in the sense given it by naturalists who do not accept the transformation doctrin. Tertiary man, therefore, must hav been still more distinct, of a species still less like the present human species—indeed, so different as to entitle it to be regarded as of distinct genus. For this reason I hav given to this being the name of man's precursor, or he might be called Anthropopithecus, the man-monkey.

After enumerating the evidences of such a being, he says:

It results, therefore, from the Abbé Bourgeois's researches that during the middle Tertiary there existed a creature, precursor of man, an anthropopithecus which was acquainted with fire and could make use of it for splitting flints. It also knew how to trim the flint flakes thus produced, and to convert them into tools.

But to return to Mr. Clodd. He says:

God placed man here naked, and left him to seek for himself the food and clothing best suited to that part of the world in which he livs. If God had given men thick hair-covered skin he could not hav moved from place to place with comfort, and so man is made naked, but given the power of reasoning about things and acting by reason.

Now, we know why God made man naked, but Mr. Clodd doesn't tell us why he made him savage. Mr. Clodd is talking to the children, and seems to think it is very essential that the child should be instructed in the "God idea." It is so much easier for the child to comprehend than the more complicated evolution theory, and then, too, he seems to think it is somehow essential to morality!

He says, farther on: "The nobler your view of him (God) is, the nobler is your life likely to be;" but somehow his facts don't reflect much nobility on God. It might occur to the mind of a child that it should be as easy to create a polished gentleman as a howling savage. And then, too, it might bother a child to know why a man could not "move from place to place with comfort" in his own "thick hair-covered skin" as well as in the skin of some other animal. But how does he know that early man was naked? Grant Allen says: "Several of the sketches of cave-men, cut by themselvs on horn and bone, certainly show (it seems to me) that they were covered with hair over the whole body." The Quaternary man might hav been "given the power to reason about things, but if so he made very poor use of it." Passing the rough stone age, he describes the "new stone age," with its polished tools, its curious methods of obtaining fire, of cooking and pottery, of the cave homes and lake dwellers, their ornaments and drawing, and ends the chapter with the assertion "that man is greater than the brutes, . . . since no brute has been known to draw a picture, write an alphabet, or learn how to make a fire."

Our author seems very anxious to impress this distinction upon the minds of his youthful readers. In the next chapter, after speaking of savage decoration, he says that "the love of what is beautiful, or what is thought to be beautiful, is theirs, and that is another thing which the brute has not. No herd of cows ever leave off feeding to admire a sunset, and you never saw a horse or a monkey with face lit up with delight at the sight of a rainbow."

It is possible that the Quaternary man would quit his cannibalistic feast to admire a sunset, or call the attention of his best girl to the beauty in a rainbow. But students of Darwin deny that man alone has a sense and love of the beautiful. It may be traced through the whole animal kingdom. Nobody denies the distinction between man and the brute, but the question is, Was it always so? The facts brought forward by Mr. Clodd show that the farther back we go in the world's history, the nearer man approaches the condition of the brute; and Professor Huxley has shown that there is a greater difference between the highest and lowest men than between the lowest men and highest apes.

In part second of his book Mr. Clodd would "show you by what slow steps man came to believe in one all-wise and all-good God, . . . the early struggles of man from darkness to twilight—for no man really loves the darkness—and from twilight to full day." But the question suggests itself, Why darkness at all, when God had but to say, "Let there be light." In all of Mr. Clodd's facts, or fancies, I fail to find any proof that the "God idea" is in any way intuitional, or that a religious sentiment originates in man himself. Its origin is in the endeavor of primitv men to explain the phenomena of nature. Sir John Lubbock, speaking of the lowest races of men, says:

They hav no idea of creation, nor do they use prayers; they hav no religious forms, ceremonies, or worship. They do not believe in a supreme deity, or in the immortality of the soul; nor is morality in any way connected with their religion. . . . It is a much-disputed question . . . whether the lowest races of men hav any religion or not . . . The ideas of religion . . . are intimately associated with, if indeed they hav not originated from, the condition of man during sleep, and especially from dreams. . . . To the savage they hav a reality and an importance which we can scarcely appreciate. . . . It is of course obvious that the body takes no part in these nocturnal adventures, and hence it seems to them natural to conclude that they hav a spirit, which can quit the body. Lastly, when they dream of their departed friends or relativs, savages firmly believe that they are visited by the spirits of the dead, and hence believe, not indeed in the immortality of the soul, but in the existence of a spirit which survives or may survive the body. . . In other cases the belief that man possesses a spirit seems to hav been suggested by the shadow. Thus among the Fejeeans "some," says Mr. Williams, "speak of man as having two spirits. His shadow is called the 'dark spirit,' which they say goes to hades. The other is his likeness reflected in water or a looking-glass, and is supposed to stay near the place in which a man dies." Probably this doctrin of shadows has to do with the notion of inanimate objects having spirits.

These primitiv people "look at things with the eyes of absolute ignorance." The Eskimo "looks upon glass as ice, and biscuit as dried flesh of the musk ox." The Bushman of south Africa, says Chapman, thought his big wagon was the mother of his small one. Schultz tells how "a Kaffir broke a piece off the anchor off a stranded vessel and soon after died; ever after the Kaffirs regarded the anchor as something divine and did it honor by saluting it, as they passed by, with a view to propitiate its wrath." "No wonder, then," as Hume says, "that mankind, being placed in such absolute ignorance of causes, and being at the same time so anxious concerning their future fortune, should immediately acknowledge a dependence on invisible powers possessed of sentiment and intelligence."

Here, then, we hav the origin of religion, and no doubt Frederic Harrison was right in saying: "The primitiv uncultured man frankly worshiped external objects in love and in fear, ascribing to them quasi-human powers and feelings." A little child stumbles against a chair; his idea is that the chair was to blame; the chair hurt him, and he wants it whipped. Primitiv man feels the same, and what can hurt him can help him by hurting his enemies, and no doubt the earlier stages of fetichism took no cognizance of any indwelling spirit or ghost. Still primitiv man must hav very early conceived a supposed duality in his nature. His dreams satisfied him that there was something which could leave his body during sleep. Then his shadow on the ground, reflection in the river, and echo in the forest, all suggested a connection with this something in the man. Dr. Tylor says: "It seems as though the conception of a human soul when once attained to by man, served as a type or model on which he framed not only his ideas of other souls of lower grade, but also his ideas of spiritual beings in general."

It matters not whether religion began, as Harrison claims, with "nature worship," or, as Spencer claims, with a "human ghost." Both arise from the most natural causes in the world, a very necessity of thought; and the idea of "a groping after God," or a special faculty, "the religious sentiment," in primitiv man is all nonsense. Yet I would not deny, for I do believe, that such a faculty has become implanted in man's organization through countless generations of worship by the rules of heredity and laws of evolution. Mr. Darwin says: "It is worthy of remark that a belief constantly inculcated during the early years of life, while the brain is impressible, appears to acquire almost the nature of an instinct. And the very essence of an instinct is that it is followed independently of reason." And this is why a man is so loth to giv up the traditions of his youth; and this is why "the hand may well tremble that writes it, and the ears may tingle that hear, yet it has been both written and said, 'There is no God, except such as man has made.'" I would nail the motto of Mr. Cleveland, "Tell the truth," over the door-post of all who would teach the young. Giv them the facts. One little fact is worth more than all the assertions of all the men that ever lived, and a world of fancy thrown in. Teach them to discern between facts and fancy. Facts alone are demonstrable. Fancy is all right in its own domain—poetry. Facts may be "stubborn things," but they are not harmful. Giv them your conclusions, but at the same time giv them to understand that you are not infallible. Giv them the conclusions of others, even though they may clash with your own. An idea never hurt anybody. You may be a firm believer in deity, but do not hide from them the fact that there are Atheists just as wise and honest as yourself. There are too many such in the ranks of Freethought, and whose nobility of character is too well known, for you to affirm that a belief in deity is necessary to morality. Morality has nothing to do with a belief in deity.

Mr. Clodd should hav transposed his sentence to read, "The nobler your life is, the nobler your view of him [God] is likely to be." Neither has morality any more to do with religion than immorality. Indeed, I think not as much. Utility is the standard of morality, and not the "fear o' hell or hangman's whip."

Herbert Spencer writes: "I believe that the experiences of utility organized and consolidated through all past generations of the human race hav been producing corresponding modifications, which, by continued transmission and accumulation, hav become in us certain faculties of moral intuition, certain emotions responding to right and wrong conduct."

Giv the children the facts. There are enough, and more than enough, to occupy their minds in a life study. Take them to the haunts of nature. Let them listen to the

> Tongues in trees, books in running brooks,
> Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

Let them con the advice Milton put in the mouth of his angel:

> Heaven is too high for thee to know what passes there,
> Be lowly wise.
> Think only what concerns thee and thy being;
> Dream not of other worlds.

Sam Jones's Sentiments.

I'd rather be a noble, generous sinner than a stingy Methodist.

It is mighty hard to keep a two-hundred-pound, fat, sleek, Methodist straight.

Where is the preacher who is not striving for a bigger church and a bigger salary?

What is a creed but an old skin stuffed with sawdust, good to be exhibited in a museum.

That fellow lying in the gutter drunk is a better man in the sight of God than those fellows talking about him.

These religious women who are gadding about all over creation and neglecting their homes—I don't like them.

Dr. Talmage puts the second Advent about the year 1900, but what are we going to do with these old sinners in Boston before that time?

One editor said I ought to be glad because he had made me. I asked him if he could not make some more. Well, he said he had no more dirt.

A man that will creep up to my bedside and steal a dollar out of my pocket is a gentleman, a scholar, and a Christian beside a man that would smirch my good name.

I expect my preacher to make a good sermon on a Sunday morning, and I would rather hav him do that than hav him coming around the house kissing the babies.

Now, if we members of the church will only stand together, and when the devil hits one of us with his paddle, if the balance of us would catch him on the first bounce, why, then the devil would be out—don't you see?

I hav been preaching frequently when I hav seen the nose of some elegant sister turned up at me at an angle of forty degrees, and I hav said, "Sister, let that nose turn down; the devil has got a mortgage on that nose, and he is going to foreclose some day on the whole gal."

Suppose you go down some day and try to hypothecate your Methodism for some dry goods. How much do you suppose you will get for it? Why, my dear, the storekeeper will say, "I can show you the names of Methodists on my books who hav been owing me for twenty years."

I know a man must think and study to preach. But let me say to you right here that I don't believe in the old idea, "If you open your mouth, the Lord will fill it." I believe he will fill it, but he will fill it with air. And there are now too many old air-guns running around over this country.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired, are requested to remit at once.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

Michael Corrigan's Letter.

The following is the full text of a secret circular referred to by Dr. McGlynn's friends to show that Mr. Corrigan uses his priests for political purposes when it suits the interests of the church. The occasion of its writing occurred in 1875, when Mr. Corrigan was bishop of Newark. An amendment to the constitution of New Jersey was to be voted on, which forbade all appropriations, by state, city, or town, to any society or corporation. Mr. Corrigan sent this letter to all his priests:

"NEWARK, Sept. 3, 1875.

"REVEREND AND DEAR SIR: Having taken legal advice, I am informed that, by the new constitutional amendments, clerical property is liable to taxation. This would involve so heavy an additional burden to the diocese that I feel it my duty to recommend you to instruct your people to strike out the objectionable clause, or, better still, to make assurance doubly sure, let them strike out the whole ballot.

"It is not enough to abstain from voting; let them vote, and vote against the amendment.

"Very truly yours,

"MICHAEL, BISHOP OF NEWARK.

"P.S.—Remember that our people must cancel, by pen or pencil, the whole ballot, and then vote it thus canceled, in order to protect against injustice.

"Remember also that the special election in regard to these constitutional amendments will take place next Tuesday, September 7th."

The amendments were defeated, as the Catholic residents of the large cities of New Jersey are exceedingly numerous. But some of the priests resented the imposition upon them of this Jesuitical work, and gave copies of the letter to reporters, who were sworn to secrecy as to the source whence they derived them. But the authenticity of the letter has never been denied by Michael Corrigan, now archbishop of New York, and official squelcher of Dr. McGlynn.

Idolatrous Begging.

The University of Ottawa, Ont., needs a chapel, because "of education in every form the ruling principle is religion." To study the works of nature "the young man must do everything with a view to God." Therefore, "every house of education must hav a special department sacred to God." This we learn from a circular sent to "our Christian families" by "Yours in Jesus and Mary Immaculate, Thomas Ferron, O.M.I., missionary." It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the object of the circular is to solicit pecuniary aid for the enterprise.

But the college is no deadhead in this matter, and in return for cash dispenses an immense amount of spiritual benefit. Everyone who collects money for the college is unreservedly promised "an increase of grace here and glory hereafter." The collector also shares "in twenty-five masses daily, that is, nine thousand masses yearly, and in all the prayers and good works of this religious community." For those who contribute the cash the scope of the spiritual benefits widens to "relations and deceased friends." They are given the following "certificate of affiliation to the Rev. Frs. Oblates of M. Im'culate (Mary Immaculate) of the University of Ottawa:"

This is to certify that, as a token of gratitude for an alms given to aid in the erection of the chapel of the University College of Ottawa, we make a sharer in all the masses, prayers, and good work of our community.

J. H. TABARET, O.M.I., D.D., Pres.

The holder of this certificate shall be entitled to share in twenty-five masses daily, and in all the prayers and good works of the Rev. Oblate Fathers of the University College of Ottawa.

For 10 years, by a contribution of $ .25.
Forever, " " 2.00.
A family for 10 years only, " 1.00.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGES.

The name of any person who shall collect and remit $15 shall be preserved in a silver heart at the feet of a statue of St. Joseph, patron of the University.

All persons collecting and remitting $25 will be affiliated forever, and besides enjoying all the other privileges, will, if they so request, be presented with a rosary from Jerusalem.

Anyone may affiliate his relativs or friends, living or dead, by making an offering, in their name, of one of the above-stated sums. The names of the affiliated must be forwarded to the College, in whose registers they will be preserved.

None can be considered affiliated until he has forwarded his subscription.

Please address all communications to the Rev. Fr. Thomas Ferron, O.M.I., College of Ottawa, Ont., Can.

Imprimatur † J. THOMAS, Bp. of Ottawa.

Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, I giv you my heart and my soul.
Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, assist me in my last agony.
Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul in peace with you.
300 days' ind., Pius VII., April 28, 1807.

The century in which we liv is called the age of science, but it appears that there are rather wide streaks of superstition running through it. And the worst of it is that those who are sunk so deep in superstitious idolatry as to giv money in answer to such appeals are in sufficient numbers to rule the greatest state in the Union, and to hav a commanding influence in ruling the nation.

Good Christians.

There are many things which tend to make joyous the lives of Freethought publishers, and the publishers of THE TRUTH SEEKER get their share. The sagacious and energetic business manager of this paper sits up nights devising methods of spreading the profound views of our contributors and the doings of the Manhattan Liberal Club, and a happy thought that came to him recently when the stars were shining was that the newsdealers of the country might, by giving them a chance to make a hundred per cent profit, be induced to stay at home from prayer-meetings and sell TRUTH SEEKERS. At once copies of the paper were forwarded to a large number, and for a few days thereafter visions of an Infidel world, and wealth sufficient to pay for the paper sent to subscribers who haven't paid us, were bright in this office. The following postal cards show how the scheme worked. The first is from a jocose newsdealer of Erie, Pa.:

"SIRS: You may think free as much as you please, but I want to let you know hereby that the 'Atomnical combinations' are as yet in such an irregular motion 'twixt you and me as not to allow you to send me any more of your dung-pile expectorations. The best to do with such scents for cents as yours is to shun the infinitly more than any pest-house. PETER FRIEDRIOHS."

Mr. Friedrichs, it will be observed, is a coiner of words as well as a vender of news. His syntax is a little awry, but his theology is evidently sound. We wish we could add, without doing violence to truth, that he is a gentleman.

The next two are from stationers residing in the enlightened province of Ontario, which territory must hav been included in the list by mistake:

"Your trashy and senseless sheet is not required in this country. We prefer Christians to Infidels; they are better men and citizens, notwithstanding your shallow sophistry to the contrary. When you and your adherents hav done as much to elevate humanity as Christians hav, you will then hav some claim to be heard; but such blatant do-nothings as Infidels are generally, should hav a little modesty and not try to push themselvs where they are not needed or wanted. Send me no more of your TRUTH SEEKER; its contents belie its heading. Yours truly, D. B. PHILLIPS."

We are sorry indeed to hav troubled Mr. Phillips, but the regret is somewhat softened by the knowledge that had he not been addressed, we should not hav had the pleasure of his courteous correspondence.

The last of the three is from a gentleman of sterner mold, perhaps a village squire, "with eyes severe, and beard of formal cut," who looks upon a heretic as proper food for flames. He writes:

"SIRS: Be good enough to send me no more of your scurrilous and blasphemous literature. I hav called the attention of the proper authorities to its circulation in this country, and trust they will take steps for its immediate suppression. Yours, etc., J. R. DAVIS."

When Mr. Davis's red-hot pen hissed over this postal card he evidently had not read the late warlike speeches of our senators, or he would hav been more careful how he pinched the American eagle. But let the suppression go on. It will be a fitting conclusion to the attempted suppression of the works of Ingersoll and Paine, and about as effectual. The Canadian officials are capable of undertaking such a work, but their intelligence is not of that high order necessary to render it successful.

These are replies from only three out of several hundred newsdealers who received consignments of TRUTH SEEKERS. We anticipate an enormous amount of fun in the immediate future.

The Bishop of Buffalo.

A bishop with a less densely ignorant flock would hav hesitated before penning the following lumbriciform sentence. But Stephen Vincent, Roman Catholic bishop of the Buffalo diocese, can put it in a pastoral letter, confident that none of his readers knows enough of history, ecclesiastical and secular, to trip him up. The sentence is supposed to bear upon the subject of labor and capital:

"The church that has come down through the ages without a taint on her escutcheon, that has come forth from fierce contests with royal tyrants and despotic rulers unscathed and pure, that would see nations fall away and peoples severed from her communion rather than betray her trust, be false to faith or morals, that has time and again braved all powerful despots in defense of injured justice and defenseless innocence, will not now compound a felony or compromise morality, or tarnish a record so glorious, or bring dishonor on a name above reproach."

The escutcheon of the Catholic church must be composed of peculiar stuff if the crimes of her officials hav failed to taint it. We should think that the murders committed by the very first Christian emperor would hav left a drop of blood upon that escutcheon, even if the lying of Eusebius had no effect upon it. Is it possible that the shield of the church has been unstained by such robbers as Calixtus, such murderers as Theodosius, such crazy hogs as Simeon Stylites, such royal assassins as Clovis the Great, such incestuous bishops as Sixtus I. and John XI., such debauchees as Virgilius and Sergius, such crowned knaves as Pepin and Charlemagne, such villainies as those of Hildebrand, the poisoners of popes, such pious monsters as St. Dominic and Innocent III., such traitors as Innocent IV. and Boniface VIII.; such butchers of humanity as Charles the Fifth, Philip the Second, the Duke of Alva; such fiends in human form as Torquemada, such obscene theologians as St. Liguori, such ravishers of innocence as Pius VI.—is it possible all these villains hav lived and died good Catholics, been loved and honored and canonized, without staining the escutcheon of holy Mother Church?

The compounding of felonies and compromising of immoralities hav been the distinguished and distinguishing work of the churchmen of all ages, when not themselvs engaged in such enterprises.

Mr. Reynolds's Case.

The trial of Mr. Reynolds has been postponed till the May term of the Morris county court. This decision was arrived at after profound consideration by the court and district attorney. Mr. Reynolds renewed his bail—Mr. Edwin Worman, of Boonton, affirming that he would risk five hundred dollars that Mr. Reynolds would be in Morristown on the first Tuesday in May—and is now prepared to go about his master's business (Liberal lecturing) for the next three months.

It is our opinion that the legal authorities of Morristown are ashamed of themselvs, and will never press the case to trial. They hav, perhaps, considered that God is able to take care of himself without the interposition of the Morris county legal luminaries. Or it may be that they hav read the statutes forbidding a non-resident of New Jersey to sue for libel, and doubt their ability to prove that the Jewish Jehovah is a naturalized citizen of this country. At any rate, it is the opinion of several of the Morris county officials, as well as our own, that District-Attorney Cutler will never try the case.

The Rev. Mr. Caldwell.

We hereby acknowledge the receipt of the subjoined letter:

"CHURCH OF CHRIST, J. W. CALDWELL, Pastor.
"MAPLETON, KAN., Jan. 20, 1887.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: On the first page of your issue of January 15th, is the picture of a man who has cut off his hand and foot, and put out his eye. You giv this as an illustration of literal obedience to Christ's teachings in the Sermon on the Mount. Such a picture, in illustration of the text, is beyond all respectability. You know, if you are capable of comprehension, that Christ did not mean that anyone should literally fulfil this teaching, and among the millions who hav accepted his teaching, not one, not the most silly, has ever so understood him. Why will you, a truth seeker, so flagrantly misrepresent the teachings of a man who 'knew no sin?' How can you, in the name of truth, make such hideous misrepresentations? You must be in desperate straits to defend your cause. No man, in any way eminent for brains or learning, ever called Jesus evil, or put such an unnatural construction upon his words. Your misinterpretation would put Voltaire, Paine, Renan, and Strauss to shame. They would not dare to so misrepresent Christ.

"You are to be congratulated if you will be true to the name of your paper. There are hundreds in the same great enterprise. We will not accomplish any good, and will do much harm, if we misrepresent or falsely interpret the greatest religious teacher and hero of the centuries. Let me, as a friend, admonish you not to let your prejudice blind you to the truth. Sincerely, J. W. CALDWELL."

We are not fully aware of the extent of our own capacity of comprehension, but after reading Mr. Caldwell's letter we hav no doubts as to his.

We know well enough that some Christians—possessing some common sense and a few humane feelings—repudiate the absurd, the cruel portions of the Bible, but if Christianity be true we would not like to stand in their shoes, for God shall take away their part out of the book of life, and if they add to the things in the Bible, God shall add unto them the plagues that are written therein.

Mr. Caldwell is to be congratulated upon the certainty with which he knows what Christ meant and what he did not mean. He should hav been upon the New Testament Revision Committee, and then a lost world might rejoice and be exceeding glad that at last all doubts touching sacred things had been removed, and the pathway to heaven made clear. With him to straighten out the tangle, the differing sects would vanish, as all would, of course, hav no reason for seeing darkly through the interpretation spectacles of so eminent a gentleman as the pastor of the Church of Christ of Mapleton, Kansas.

But, unfortunately for those who pick the roses from the bush and leave the thorns, their proceeding does not eradicate the thorns, and the thorns are just as real as the roses. Every orthodox church believes in the plenary verbal inspiration of the scriptures. The commentators excuse God's palpable cruelty in a thousand ways, but who shall judge God? Christ taught much by parable, but his worst utterances were direct commands. It is not Christ's fault that the world is not full of cripples; and the reluctance of his followers to obey his orders indicates lack of faith.

If Christ did not mean, "If thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off and cast them from thee," how do we know that he meant that those who lose life for his sake shall find it?

If he spoke falsely when he said that "if ye hav faith, ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and it shall be done," did he tell the truth when he said, "And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive?"

If he was mistaken when he said that "if any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, he cannot be my disciple," was he right when he said, "And everyone that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life?"

If he deceived all his followers when he told them that "they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them," did he not deceive them when he promised that those "who do and teach" the beatitudes "shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven?"

If he spoke apocryphally when he said, "He that believeth not shall be damned," did he speak canonically when he said, "He that believeth shall be saved?"

If he spoke untruthfully when he said, "I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother," did he speak truthfully in saying, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my father which is in heaven?"

If we are not to believe that Christ "came not to bring peace, but a sword," when he says so, shall we believe that "whosoever shall giv to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, shall in nowise lose his reward," upon only the same authority?

If he used metaphor when he said that "whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple," did he use metaphor in saying that "your heavenly father shall giv the holy spirit to them that ask him?"

If he did not put unnecessary conditions upon getting to heaven when he told the young man to "sell that thou hast and giv to the poor," was the woman sure of eternal bliss to whom he said, "Thy faith hath saved thee?"

Jesus said that "except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye hav no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life." If that was a figure of speech, what is this: He also said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of God."

A great many more questions like these might be asked the Kansas exegetist, which neither he nor any other theologian can answer in any way that will relieve Christ. The authority for one quotation is as good as the authority for the other. If one passage shows Jesus to hav been kindly disposed, the other shows him arrogant in his claims to divinity and impatient of unbelief. There is just such a fellow as Jesus floating around this city now. Occasionally he comes to see us, and the burden of his song is that he is the savior; belief in him is necessary to salvation; scoffers will be punished, and so on to the end of the chapter. He occasionally spends a night in the station-houses; Sundays he goes into strange churches, and is ejected when he wants to talk at the preacher; calls the contemporary Christians "generations of vipers," and in many other ways irresistibly reminds one of Jesus. But this nineteenth-century reformer has been crazed by reading the theologians' history of his first-century prototype.

We will admit, if Mr. Caldwell desires, that Jesus never lived; that he never said one word attributed to him; that all the gospels are anonymous; that we cannot tell divine writing from human; that we should not know divine writing when we saw it; that no one else would; that the Holy Ghost has been charged with writing a lot of books that he never saw; that the early Christian fathers wrote the gospels, and therefore Christ is not responsible for what they make him say; that the middle-century copyists put marginal notes made by priests into the texts of Bibles; that there are one hundred and fifty different readings of so-called holy writ; that the last revision of the New Testament is no nearer Christ's words and meaning than the King James translation; that both the Old and New Testaments are full of contradictions and obscenities; that the history of Christ is paralleled by other and preëxisting "saviors;" that the Lord's Prayer is a garbled copy of an ancient Jewish prayer; that the apocryphal New Testament is as reliable as the canonical books; that the religious world is in complete confusion regarding all its sacred literature; that there isn't any "original Greek" of any book in the New Testament; that Jules Soury was right when he said Christ was insane; that his birth and death are barren of proof; that his resurrection and ascension are idle tales—all this and much more will we cheerfully admit to Mr. Caldwell, but we must contend that there is as much proof that Jesus said the disagreeable things as there is that he spoke the agreeable and flattering passages. The good and bad stand and fall together. If Jesus taught anything, he taught, "Woe, woe to the world," and that it was better to suffer here than to go whole to hell.

There was no misrepresentation in the picture complained of. Christ was not the greatest religious teacher of the centuries. Several so-called saviors hav more followers, and a man's greatness is generally gaged by what he accomplishes. Socrates was as great a hero as Christ, and hundreds and hundreds of thousands hav endured more at the hands of Christ's followers than he endured at the hands of the Jews. Mr. Caldwell greatly overestimates the character of Christ and the value of his alleged teachings.

The Picture.

There are perhaps two sides to the question which Mr. Heston has raised this week in his picture on our first page, and the question is whether or not a woman should suffer the death penalty. Just now interest centers in Mrs. Roxiana Druse, of Herkimer county, New York. Mrs. Druse killed her husband—there seems to be no reasonable doubt of that fact. She pleaded self-defense. Druse, she claimed, had subjected her to long years of intolerable cruelty; and, besides, was in the habit of scoffing at religion, having read the works of many skeptical writers. An examination of the case by Governor Hill, in response to a petition for commutation of sentence, failed to substantiate the charges of cruelty, and the stories told by Mrs. Druse in regard to the killing of her husband had already been shown to be absurd fabrications. Her life certainly could not hav been threatened at the time of the killing, as the victim, it was shown, sat at the table eating when the fatal shot was fired. Having killed her husband, Mrs. Druse cut up the remains and burnt them in a small stove.

Such are the facts, as nearly as we remember them, in Mrs. Druse's case. We do not believe that Mrs. Druse should be hanged. Society and religion are responsible in the main for such combinations of ignorance and superstition as this woman represents, and society and religion should cease producing and reform rather than exterminate them.

Following the Lead of The Truth Seeker.

From the New York Herald of Last Monday.

The Herald is for free and frank discussion all the time. It advocates a fair hearing for even the most unpopular doctrins.

DR. J. L. YORK, who has been absent in Australia and New Zealand for the past two years, has returned to his home at San Jose, Cal., where he will rest until the first of May, when he will begin a lecturing tour, coming East through Salt Lake City, Denver, and other principal intermediate points between California and Paine Hall, Boston. In his travels abroad Dr. York was accompanied by his wife. Dr. York promises the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER an account of his work across the Pacific and a description of the countries visited and their inhabitants. He was very cordially received by the Freethinkers of New Zealand and Australia, who gave him crowded houses to lecture to and substantial reward for his work. He was affectionately called the Freethought revivalist. His farewell to the people on the other side of the globe was from Auckland, N. Z., and an immense audience of Freethinkers cheered him on his way. As a token of esteem he was presented with an album of New Zealand ferns, nearly two hundred in number. The album, according to the Auckland Bell, is bound with mottled Kauri boards, engraved in gold and fancy fretwork. The Brisbane Freethinkers presented Dr. York with an elegantly silver-mounted emu egg to induce him to remember them. If we can believe the Australian and New Zealand papers—and there is no reason why we cannot—Dr. York won the affections of the Freethinkers wherever he tarried. Our other lecturers must look to their laurels when he starts East.

SINCE the repeal of the compulsory prayer attendance in Harvard College, the faculty hav been compelled to publish an appeal to the law students asking them to attend the chapel services.

SEND to THE TRUTH SEEKER office for a catalog of the books we hav for sale. The catalog is free.

Letters from Friends.

AYLMER, ONT., Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, for which you will please renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me the books mentioned in inclosed list.

The progress of Freethought in this country is slow, but it is sure and certain, as is the case with all truth.

With hopes for the triumph of Liberal principles everywhere, I am, Yours truly, W. A. GLOVER.

BOULDER, COL., Jan. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inclose you $6—$3 to pay what I ought to hav paid long ago, and $3 more to pay for another year's subscription. I like the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and don't see how I could get along without it in the house; but I would rather do without it than get it and not intend to pay for it.

Wishing you a Happy New Year, I remain, a truth seeker, Greenbacker, and Materialist, N. R. HOWARD.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 21, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Doubtless you know all about it yourself, but for the benefit of many of our brother truth seekers, who, like myself, are also interested, please say, if you hav not already, that the House of Representativs on Jan. 18, 287, concurred in the Senate amendments to the Mexican pension hill. And hence the few survivors of one of the most remarkably successful wars known to this or any other age hav become in a measure partially recognized. NELSON HUNT.

MORRILL, KAN., Jan. 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.10 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the coming year. The frontispiece in your issue of Jan. 1st. is to the point, and don't you think the grand old TRUTH SEEKER would look better headed 287 E.M., instead of the year of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, son of the Holy Ghost and Blessed Virgin, the mother of God? There is no proof of any of them ever having an existence. If any of them ever did hav an existence, we hav no date to start from. J. W. SCOTT.

FOX LAKE, WIS., Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Within find money order for two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My first thought was, I cannot subscribe this year; my second was, I cannot do without the paper; my third was, I can never read it and be owing for it. It is said first thoughts are best. I'll take my chances on the last this time. Send paper, and hold on to Heston, don't let him giv you the slip; hold him as surely as his bulldog holds old Noah in your last issue. Yours, for truth, reason, and liberty, C. B. HAWES.

GLENWOOD SPRINGS, COL., Dec. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Once more the good old TRUTH SEEKER is a weekly visitor to my home, and it is with pleasure that I peruse its pages. I used to be a subscriber to it when Mr. Bennett was at its head, but somehow through neglect I failed to renew my subscription. Now, through the kindness of R. L. Baker, a stanch worker in the cause of Freethought, I am made a present of a year's subscription to your paper, and many thanks to Mr. Baker for the same. I think the paper is better than ever, and I am bound from this time on it shall always be a visitor at my house if I hav to work nights to pay for it. B. S. SOULE.

PORTVILLE, Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading my last TRUTH SEEKER, and, as I want to send stamps for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, will improve the opportunity of expressing my appreciation of our noble TRUTH SEEKER and its manly editor. I hav no suggestions to giv in regard to the management of the TRUTH SEEKER; in fact, I think it could not be beat the world over. And in making choice of contributors I would hardly know where to begin or leave off, but C. Fannie Allyn is my kind of Spiritualist. I would like to know why we hav been gettiug no reports from the Liberal Club. I would like to hear something from George Macdonald. His letters from down East were just the whack. J. L. BROOKS.

FRIEND, NEB., Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find amount of my renewal for this year, and my best wishes for the success of the cause for which you labor. I see you sometimes hav a little tariff from some of your correspondents. I look upon that just as I do the exemption of property from taxation. There can be no injustice in taxing all property to defray the proper expenses of government, wherein all are interested. Whenever any particular property is exempt, the remainder hav got to make it good. I hold that there can be no injustice done by allowing every person to buy and sell whenever he can do to the best advantage; whereas, if you protect some man's interest, somebody has got to be hurt by supporting him. Paine said: "The world is my country;" therefore, I say, let every person hav free access to the markets of the world.

Respectfully, J. W. GILBERT.

NORSE, TEXAS, Jan. 12, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1.90 in subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a few books as per inclosed list. I thought that I should hav been enabled to send you a larger order, but circumstances will not allow it this time.

Texas has, as you are undoubtedly aware, suffered severely from a continued drouth the year just passed. In many portions there were not raised sufficient crops for subsistence; in other places nothing, or next to nothing, was raised, and many people are consequently now in a destitute condition. There are places, I am reliably informed, where they are now actually suffering for want of food; they are appealing for aid. Nearly all the western portions of our state are more or less affected by this unprecedented severe drouth.

We fortunately had sufficient rain here to make a, comparatively speaking, fair crop, while but a few miles west—even in this community—but very little of anything was raised. Although we had some rain last fall, enough to start the early sown wheat, it is now again becoming dry, and prospects at present are rather gloomy.

T. THEO. COLWICK.

BRIGHTON, IND., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find inclosed $11.50, for subscriptions to your paper. I think it is the best Liberal paper that I hav seen, and I must say that I cannot do without it. I am not like some of your subscribers that order their paper discontinued when your views do not coincide with their way of thinking. Such men, I think, are not quite out of the woods. I think your opinion on the trial of the Anarchists sound, and cannot see how anyone could take exception to it. McArthur's letters to "D. C." are good, and if what he says is true, it makes a bad showing for Catholicism. She is the mother of harlots and evil-doers, and she cannot he handled too roughly. The writings of Peck and Washburn are good; in fact, it is all good. Keep on in well-doing, and you will gain the respect and esteem of all honest men and women. Wishing you success, C. A. SHATTUCK.

EAST OAKLAND, CAL., Jan. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sorry at not being able to send you more money at present, but as soon as I can spare a few dollars I am going to send to you for Thomas Paine's and R. G. Ingersoll's complete works. I had the luck to hear Mr. Ingersoll twice when he was here in Oakland. I also called on him in company with a friend, a strong Freethinker, A. H. Schow. I think Mr. Ingersoll is one of the finest and best speakers I ever heard, and it would be a grand thing if we should be able to put him in the presidential chair at Washington.

You can count me as a steady subscriber for your valuable paper; it would be impossible for me to get along without it, and I agree with the gentleman that sent you ten dollars for a year's subscription; it is worth that amount for those who can afford to pay it. ANDREW JOHNSON.

GOLDSMITH, IND., Jan. 1, 287.

MR. EDITOR: We had Mr. Remsburg with us December 27th, 28th. He gave three lectures at Petersburg—"Sabbath-Breaking," "Apostle of Liberty," "False Claims of the Church." We had some of the pious old saints come out and hear him. The old bell-wether of the New Light church came to hear "The Apostle of Liberty." We had a hard time to get the school-house. No stone was left unturned to keep us out. Some went so far as to see a lawyer about it, but the law gave us the house beyond question. Their next move was to get an old Methodist priest to hold forth in the New Light church. The lecture was a little the longer, and the minister's congregation came to hear it when about half delivered. We feel that we came out first-best all round I brought Mr. Remsburg to my home and entertained him. I know his lectures were well received. He is much of a gentleman, and a fine speaker.

Mr. Editor, as you ask for names of Liberals, I inclose a list. DAVID SMITH.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: My morning's mail reminded me that another year had spun around, and that I had again the pleasant duty of adding my mite in support of the welcome TRUTH SEEKER, and I inclose another year's subscription. I went to a dinner in your city the other night, and the tables were loaded down with a great variety of food, many kinds of which it would be impossible for me to enjoy, but there were so many palatable other dishes that I think it was the best dinner I hav sat down to in many years. So with your paper—there are many articles which I cannot stomach, but there are so many more which to me are benedictions that from the pleasure derived I feel it a privilege to continue. An Agnostic friend of mine wrote me a few days ago, said he had given up your paper and was subscribing for the—or, rather, to the ——, and sent me a copy. When I had time I glanced over it, and wrote him in return that, while your paper was bad enough, the other was infinitly worse, and that I could not think of deserting Father Bennett's ship.

Yours truly, HORACE L. FAIRCHILD, M.D.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Jan. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Within please find $5—$2.50 to apply on my paper, and $2.50 for a new subscriber. I hav been working for that subscriber for over a year. I tell you it is hard work to find Freethinkers here; too many doxology shops for them to thrive. There are a few, but they dare not make their convictions public, or they would be brought before the people in such a manner as to ruin their business. So they say nothing, but keep up a devil of a thinking. There is an old saying that it is hard for a cat to be in hell without claws, and it is about the same for a Freethinker here. Still I do not feel discouraged. I sent you a new subscriber last year; now another. That is encouraging, taking into consideration that we hav two theological colleges (Lutheran and Methodist), two Catholic churches (English and German), having the second largest congregation in the state; three Presbyterians, three Lutheran, with a church or two for every other Christian creed, I believe, making us the most church-cursed city in the state (to a population of 35,000). Some of my church-going friends may think this is strong language. It is a fact, though, as I will prove. Here we hav millions of church property that pays no taxes while it costs as much to protect it as other property of the same value. Consequently we hav to pay that much more taxes.

Now these are the facts in this case: While we hav the largest and most costly church-edifices in the state, we also hav a county debt of $265,000 (city debt about the same in proportion) without a decent road in the county (two toll-roads excepted) or decent street in the city; no parks, no place to pass a quiet hour, except it be a church or saloon; and as the church services hav become so stale, the saloons are very numerous, and are doing a thriving business. Now, Mr. Editor, I think that this non-resident God (it would be hard work for the preachers to prove that he ever was a resident of the state) should be compelled to pay his taxes just the same as other people. Then we should soon be out of debt and hav some improvements in our city. J. S. FROST.

SALEM, O., Jan. 4, 287.

MR. EDITOR: My physical and financial restrictions compel me to limit my aspirations to your lowest terms, $5 for two years, which I herewith remit.

I am glad to see Spiritualism is sustained. I supposed it would be, and am glad to see it is done, and done so well as it is said to be by Colonel Kelso and the Bible. The objections to Spiritualism always seemed to me so inefficient as to make for the other side. When the raps appeared in western New York forty years ago, they were explained as sounds produced by the toe joints, and this poor explanation was persisted in for many years, and now it is persistently insisted that Kelso's book defeats its purpose by showing that there is falsehood as well as truth in the Bible. The fact is, as it seems to me, the Bible is a good witness to a believer therein, and would remain such even though explained as not infallible, but, like all other testimony, liable to be erroneous and deceptiv, and also that this explanation is due from those who would use it as a witness.

It is said our business with notions differing from our own is to understand them, not to quarrel with them. I think Materialists are not always aware that we reject the supernatural, the miraculous, and are as philosophical on the unknown and unknowable as the full-fledged Agnostic.

JOHN MCDONALD.

OSBORN, OHIO, Jan. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As there are so few Liberals here that hav any means and sand enough to be candid and tell their honest thoughts, I see but little chance to get new subscribers, so I renew my own for two years. Can't do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am fully convinced that you are doing a grand work. When your illustrations first began I thought them a little rough on sincere, yet beguiled religious people; but I hav changed my mind, and think them a great addition to the paper. Watson Heston is a genius, and he has chosen a fruitful field, for there are enough Bible absurdities to furnish him a subject for every day of his life, even if he should liv a thousand years.

I am a thorough Freethinker, for there is no subject or question so sacred that I will not think and reason about it without the least prejudice or reverential awe. I am a Rationalist, for I am always ready to receive and accept whatever seems to me rational or reasonable. I am an Agnostic, for I do not know whether there be a God or future state, or not; but still it does seem that the weight of argument is against it. I do wish people could talk about their religious differences without passion, the same as they can about other subjects. Then, perhaps, more people would be honest and candid, and say what they think. S. F. WOODWARD.

WEST UNION, O., Jan. 15, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: In remitting my dues, as one of the first class referred to in your recent notice to delinquents, I desire to speak of the excellence and indispensableness of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our Liberal society here is in a rather stationary condition, owing to the fact that, with a few exceptions, its members are not stimulated by the splendid facts sent out every week in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I inclose a circular showing an effort I made to hav a social meeting of Adams County Liberals, and hoping to take a few subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the day was terribly cold, and about twenty friends sat down to dinner, but no subscribers were taken.

Until the entire mental and moral energy of Liberals is stirred into activity, through a realization of the vital human interests at stake in the deadly contest between Secularism and superstition, no Secular society can hav the vital force and cohesivness necessary to success. This realization and condition of growth it is scarcely possible to attain, except by each member reading weekly THE TRUTH SEEKER, and pondering its momentous and serious facts, and thus coming into sympathy with the grand Liberal magnetism of the age. The success of broad humanitarian Liberalism depends more on THE TRUTH SEEKER than on any other paper published on the planet. J. F. BECK.

HARWICH, MASS., Jan. 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within $3.75—75 cents of which pass in to Father Hacker when convenient. I hav been waiting to see other parties send their fee, but hav not run across them; shall endeavor to soon.

I hav only to say THE TRUTH SEEKER is all I can ask for—a paper full of the best, most useful, and pertinent literature. Besides, the cartoons are multum in parvo. Let no one fear to raise the ire of mythologists. Giv them an inch, and they will take an ell. Slam-bang at them rather than bate your breath, but let us never be disrespectful to others that honestly differ from us. As Paine said, "Destroy the king, but save the man," so I would say, Destroy Christianity, but save the poor dupes who in earlier life were seduced by its insidious influence.

I enjoy reading the incisiv contributions of Si Slokum and Mr. Peck, and scarcely less the grand expositions of your able contributors who lay bare to view the consummate monstrosity of the Roman church. How glad I am that there are able men among us that can do it! And then the two pages of "Letters to Friends"—they are amusing and instructiv. And what excellent opportunities to get into correspondence all over the country! I think we ought to avail ourselvs of such excellent chances. And the little ones so well entertained by that lover of children in the Corner! Many a girl and many a boy, I dare say, will hav been "saved as brands from the burning" by the large-hearted editor of the Corner, whose philoprogenitivness is aptly called into requisition for children who, in a certain degree, she can call her own. BRAIDSTOWN, Jan. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Permit another item on Lincoln's religion. Last May, when on Memorial day we were in Springfield, Ill., we had the pleasure of an extended conversation with Hon. W. H. Herndon, Lincoln's early law partner. This partnership began in 1843, and only the assassin's bullet dissolved it. The conversation turned upon Lincoln's religious views, about which there seems, according to the standpoint taken, to be a variety of views. Mr. Herndon notably knew Lincoln longer and more intimately than any other living man. He told us that when Lincoln was a clerk in a country store in Sangamon county the latter wrote a very fanciful book, militating against the Bible from an orthodox standpoint. His employer, having read the work, replied, "You are a rising young man; but if you publish this book you will forever blight your worldly prospects." Lincoln then and there put the MS into the fire, after he had "put the fire into the manuscript." Mr. Herndon further told us that Lincoln's religious views were then practically those held by the liberal wing of the Western Unitarian Conference, namely, that while he would not submit to any dogmatic tests, he did honestly and at all times endeavor to promote "truth, righteousness, and love." Such, practically, is the sum of Colonel Ingersoll's religion. And if we do not much mistake, Ingersoll to-day and Lincoln, were he living, would, upon application, be cordially welcomed into the fraternity of the more progressiv Unitarians in the West. So would scores of others who hold like principles. ZOA TOPSIS.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Jan. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your editorial of the 22d inst. I notice you refer to a split in the Knights of Labor and the Lutheran church, and seem to think that the Knights of Labor will lose many members thereby. I am a Knight and I think I know whereof I speak. It is true that we hav lost a few members by the action of the priests of not only that denomination, but others as well; but where we hav lost one we hav gained two. Now, look at the absurdity of their action! In the first place, these priests object to their members belonging to any secret society, while at the same time they call a secret convention of Lutheran priests to determin, or, in other words, to take a vote whether the Knights of Labor shall go to heaven or hell (I can't do away with the old version, for it seems more expressiv). Now, I know many church-members who are Knights, and who would let the church and its priests go to the devil before they would giv up their Knighthood; and if those priests will come to me I will giv them a pass to the warm climate aforesaid, and a letter of introduction to his Satanic majesty, with a request that he will stir up the fires a little for their benefit, and if necessary use the Knights of Labor coal for that purpose. I am satisfied that all the churches and preachers are determined, if possible, to break up our organization; but if the heads of the order do their duty, the blow will fall upon the churches. I think it would be safe to say that the Lutheran church alone will lose ten thousand members in this state if they persist in fighting us, and they cannot afford to do it. As for me, I hav a Bible of my own, and it consists of but one book, and that book has but one chapter, and that chapter contains but one verse, and that verse is composed of only two words—viz., Do right. My Bible needs no revision, consequently we can do away with a large army of priests, and the money it takes to support them could be given to the deserving poor of our land. I believe the Knights of Labor are doing more for the poor to-day than all the churches in the country. I do not blame the poor workingmen for their belief, for it has been taught them from childhood, but I do blame the preachers when they teach what they know to be false. Our order is in a flourishing condition in this city, and these wolves in sheep's clothing will find it out in the near future. I am more and more pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cartoons, and agree with you on the Anarchist question, all others to the contrary notwithstanding, and I admire the writings of many of your correspondents. I am only an humble mechanic, so you cannot expect much from me. GEO. M. HARE.

LETTER FROM SI SLOKUM.

2 LEWIS AVE., BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1887.

BROTHER MACDONALD: What's the matter with the folks the country about? It would appear that they think that this man, that man, and t'other man—any man but Si Slokum—are bent on working up a revolution through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all on account of a supposition and conundrum in an article of mine which you publishcd, entitled, "The Impending Revolution," which supposition, to begin with, was, Suppose the mighty host of this country's workers should lay down its tools [this doesn't appear to be taking up arms, does it?] some fine day, and resolve to do no more work until matters between its millions of members and comparativly few grinding employers were adjusted to the scale of justice, as between man and man; if not the precise words, the precise supposition, as a whole; and which conundrum was as follows: "Grabocrats, monopolists, and robbers in general, including Jay Gould and his pals, the Wall street bandits [when comes the laying down of tools—not taking up of arms], what are you going to do about it?"

This supposition, with the conundrum—I admit that the first was somewhat startling, and the second decidedly staggering—knocked the sycophantic defenders of monopolies and grabocracy silly, and they are getting no better of their silliness very fast, it would appear, for they charge that Si Slokum is James Redpath, Colonel Hinton, Jeff Davis, Geronimo, Bismarck, General Bowne, Ben Butler, Bombastes Furioso, and hell—excuse me, sheol—knows who else.

Now, be it known to the timid, wherever they are, that Si Slokum is not James Redpath; that, personally, he doesn't know James Redpath from the exalted St. James; that Si Slokum is not Colonel Hinton; that, personally, he doesn't know Colonel Hinton from—oh, any Kentucky colonel you can name; that Si Slokum is not any other homo than Si Slokum himself; that Si Slokum's personality, years, avoirdupois, moderate fondness for extract of corn or rye, and hatred for grabocrats, are all his own and no other person's. Hoping this will be satisfactory so far as setting me on the shoulders of those who, doubtless, are burdened enough already, is concerned, I remain, Yours fraternally, SI SLOKUM, himself.

P.S.—As I, and not Redpath, et al, must be the one who is trying to kindle the fires of revolution through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would say to "Inter Nos," and all other inter noses, that I am not seeking to kindle anything but the fire that keeps the pot boiling; but all the same, and without any "kindling" effort on my part, the "revolution" I spoke of will sooner or later be on—a comparativly bloodless "walk-over," if according to my supposition—is on the way now, and "revolutions never go backward;" and the monopolistic grabocrats, the plutocracy of the country, are doing their best to fan it into a flame. I repeat, in effect, what I said in that all-disturbing article, that, if it comes red-handed, it would be, perhaps, better for the country, as the grabocracy would not forget it as quickly as the white-handed sort. Nothing is so cowardly as wealth. S. S.

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 10, 1887.

"He went about doing good"

MR. EDITOR: That practice continued would bring together assemblies of disciples until there would not be room to contain them.

Let Freethinkers remember that a taste for fanaticism being absent from us, there is but one course to adopt to prevent Liberal ideas from falling into the oblivion which stands like a vampire ready to devour all shades of opinion, good, bad, or indifferent. The world, with all its advantages, is not firmly intellectual, but plastic, like clay, and can be molded by the shrewd manipulator into any shape, unless the few to whom this would be distasteful will arise and demand that our theories shall harden into real plans and institutions which will perpetuate our views and make them the greatest and most substantial things in the world. Love is the only principle which cannot be trampled out and obliterated by the foot of time or tyranny, the only magnetic force which prevents the universe from falling back to star-dust.

Let it be remembered that a habit of self-indulgence carries with it a kind of self-condemnation, a sensation of restlessness, which is not felt when most of our time is spent in doing good.

What shall render the future of the world different from the past? Instead of the reign of a brutish indifference, a careless selfishness, and disregard of the rights of others, all the sweetness of the human heart must become prominent.

The yearning love for the world, which burnt in the heart and moistened the eyes of Voltaire, we must experience by a happy contagion, which will permit us no longer to behold with indifference human beings with the intellects of angels sinking to the degradation of fiends, because, forsooth, they were raised so—the hydra was not strangled in the cradle, which poisoned these infants' breath, which covered them and filled the heart with the foul slime of hypocrisy, delusion, discontent, and all the dreariness of despair. That deep, passionate love which is indigenous to the human heart must sleep no longer, but awake with an ecstatic thrill and "bless them unawares," like the Ancient Mariner, when the cursed albatross of hatred, and sloth, and pride, will leave us, and sink like lead into the sea of earth's misery and shame.

But you ask, What will create such love? What, O Heavens! when men and women all around you are not only sick with poverty and sorrow, but are poisoned and enfeebled, their best powers crippled by the corruption, the horrible stench, the strangling slime, the withering contagion which the Jewish Bible emits from its black, bloody, and guilt-stained pages. Like the flies and lice of Egypt, it covers alike counters, tables, kneading-troughs, makes the air sickly and malarious, and distorts the brain until the loathsome nightmare of falsehood, distortion, and corruption are the only mental fruit of what we call mind. What glorious things we could do if we were not trammeled with robes of Jewish folly, expected to utter incantations instead of using all our energies in the cause of knowledge and benevolence.

What would be your emotions to see your friends exposed to the plague, smallpox, cholera, and black vomit at one fearful moment of time? Would you not rush and bring to bear quickly upon the case every influence which was available for purposes of relief, security, and future happiness? Agitate, keep the subject before the people, fear not to pass the hat for money, until the land is dotted with beautiful Freethought school-houses and lecture rooms, happy homes for orphans and poor young men and women.

If our poor are comforted and relieved, well. If enthusiasm is wanting, we must be disgraced or get up an artificial heat from somewhere, such as sustained the followers of Cromwell in their fiery opposition to royalty, church, and state, creeds, etc.

A new Cromwell should arise, who would be able to lead peaceful hosts into Washington, and while the usual discussions are going on, he should calmly order delinquents to the "painted chamber," entertaining the audience with a history of their doings as they passed before him, as was done long ago in England. How often we hear the expression used, "The truth is powerful, and will prevail;" but the truth will never conquer except by the superhuman efforts of burning and determined hearts who are resolved to conquer or die.

But the beautiful glow of the universe is not compelled entirely by outside force, neither is morality made of rigid lines or logical rules. Feeling ofttimes determines what is best for us, and the tissues which giv birth to these feelings, so susceptible of improvement, are a legacy handed down from previous experiences and influences.

Make the most, then, of what you find in human nature. "Coincide with it," and draw it into something broader and more noble by a magnetism which brings enchantment to the soul. Men of the finest mold are a kind of prophets, showing what the world can be, but men of the passions well directed leave an impress which defies the power of time to efface.

If the faint enthusiasm of reason is intrusted with the care of the mighty undertakings in question, we may fail where we ardently hope to succeed. The world is but human; every feeling, association, and memory upon the side of right should be enlisted; every harmless piece of machinery and artistic device should be used to arouse the heart of man and lead him into a new and glorious field of action.

We can learn human nature from the practices of the Methodists, and some keen-sighted Spiritualist has, I think, brought the news to us that even in heaven, when the golden streets seemed cold and lonesome, some dear member would contrive to get a few chips from an old Methodist church to make a fire, around which they would pray and shout until the bliss of heaven was held at a discount. ROCK GROVE, ILL., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you call on your readers or patrons to furnish you with names of solid Infidels that are not now readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with a view to send them sample copies. I hav taken a view over the field of this locality, and hav selected the herein inclosed list of names as proper persons to be tempted with sample copies. They all hav stood the brunt of revival meetings all along without being affected by them in the least, and some are quite old men. However, they are generally of the Agnostic kind (the don't know kind); but as they are all intelligent persons, it would be a great gain to the cause to put weapons in their hands such as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Liberal and scientific literature. They would then be enabled to talk back to some purpose, in place of simply keeping mum.

While I am at it, I may as well giv you some inside view of our little farm community, or neighborhood. The rule here is, the ghostly church leaders keep up revival all winter, which in the main is not preaching or explaining scripture texts, but simply going through a performance that to a deaf person would look like a backwood's show, the object of which evidently is to mesmerize the weak and negativ-minded, which is sometimes accomplished, especially if the operator is a strong positiv person, and the surroundings are favorable, mostly effectiv on children and young females; rarely on strong, positiv men, and hardly ever on positiv, intelligent, and well-informed women. Always toward spring the "bloods" become tired of the sameness of the thing, so they change the program by calling out the fiddle, which soon dissipates the mesmeric influence (at least in most cases), or at least turns it in another and more natural channel, where a natural instinct plays a big part. Indeed, no coaxing, praying, or preaching is at all necessary. The thing goes booming from the start, but just as soon as the frost is out of the ground, then all the winter sports are dropped without the least formality, and by common consent the thing stands adjourned to next December. Souls need no saving in summer, and there is no time in a farming community to attend frolicking parties. I am a man of seventy-five years of age. What a grand change has taken place since my young days! Then it was considered a most horrid crime to say the Bible was originally fixed up by cunning old monks, and that no God ever authorized them to write it, and that it all was a myth and a sham to lead ignorant and uninformed people by the nose. But now it has become not only honorable to say so, but is deemed a sure sign that a man has a sound and intelligent mind. The same idea is even proclaimed from the pulpit itself, and that by some of the most gifted preachers in the world. And what is more, such hav the largest and most respectable congregations, and the best paying ones, too.

I hav been a subscriber and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since D. M. Bennett first started it at Paris, Ill., some fourteen years ago, I believe. 'Rah for the pictures! I am cutting out all my pictures from THE TRUTH SEEKER, to preserve them in a scrap-book, before sending out the reading matter on missionary work. I would suggest that it would be an advantage to print advertisments or other unimportant matter on the opposit side of the large picture, for the cutting out spoils the reading matter of the second page, which is generally valuable. # Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Miss Lillipop's Housekeeping.

Little Miss Lillipop thought she must help
To wash up the dishes and wipe up the shelf,
To brush off the table and sweep up the floor,
And clean off the stains from the paint on the door.

She put on her apron, and pulled up her sleeve—
She didn't want work that was only make-believe;
"For muzzers who've dot yittle chillens," said she,
"Must hav yittle housekeepers; dat's what I'll be."

Little Miss Lillipop went through the room,
Whisked the dust high with the edge of her broom,
Broke the poor cup which she dropped on the floor,
Left the paint twenty times worse than before.

Splattered and splashed—but oh, how could I chide
The little swelling heart with sweet helpful pride?
"For how would my muzzer be able," said she,
"To get froo her work if she didn't hav me?"

Science Column.

Under the above heading we propose to giv a short sketch every week on topics relating to the world in which we liv. Every child comes into being ignorant of its surroundings and the laws that govern life in its varied aspects and conditions.

He is obliged to learn all about the world, and how to liv in it, all about life and his relations to the same. In the past it has been that too many were ready to die before they had learned how to liv. They were started on the wrong track, and were instructed in the geography and philosophy of another world before learning the rudiments of this—they were taught, ignorantly, it may be, the ethics of another life before they had learned the morals of this one.

In preparing and offering the little items of scientific information which we propose, it is our desire that the children who shall become interested in them will feel that they are starting somewhere near the right way in the journey of life, and they will not be obliged to unlearn much of that which they find in this column in after years. The letter in another column suggests "World-Building" for our first topic.—Ed. C. C.

WORLD-BUILDING.

'Tis a grand old world, with stories bright
And fresh as morning dew,
Which grow and gleam on our growing sight
In ever deepening hue.

It is, indeed, a grand and lovely world that we liv in, and it is very natural to want to know all about its birth and growth.

There are those who hav made this world a study, and who hav devoted much time to the understanding of its silent but powerful forces.

Our world, the earth, is, as you may know, a planet, belonging to what is termed the solar system, and is like a book full of beautiful pictures, whose every page is ornamented with precious jewels.

A planet is an object or body that revolves around the sun. Its name is from a Greek word, planetes, and stands for a wanderer.

"Solar" means belonging to the sun, and the solar system comprises those planets and their moons and comets that travel around the sun at different distances.

The planets are not shining and bright, because their outer surface or crust has become cold. Besides our earth there are seven other big planets in our solar system. Their names are Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune.

People hav been very ignorant in the past about how these planets or worlds came to be, and many children hav been taught wrong stories in regard to world-building. It is only within a hundred years that people generally hav begun to learn the truth. Before that they were prevented from learning many things by ignorant men who had power and were called priests.

Geology tells us about the structure of our planet. This word is from the Greek, and means to talk about the earth.

Millions of years ago the earth was a little bit of nebula—a cloudy, hazy, misty, baby spot, thrown off, probably, from the sun, and it went whirling, rushing, like a whirligig, around and around, on and on, through space, faster than we can think. As it flew through space, atoms adhered to it, and it grew larger by degrees.

You ask how it came to be round. It was in obedience to a force, or law, which we can see in operation to-day in the rounded apple, or the drop of dew on a rose in summer time. For thousands and thousands of years the earth was growing amid steam, vapor, heat, and storms, like a swelling bud that some time was destined to blossom in brightest bloom and beauty. Fire, and smoke, and many gases, that to us would be poisonous, helped it to unfold, and after many ages of constant motion, and adding to its form, the heat of its body began to float off into space, obeying still its inherent law. As it grew colder and colder, it showed signs of solid matter here and there on its surface, with many rents and rifts.

There were great gaps and yawning gulfs, earthquakes, volcanoes, geysers, melting rocks, fire and tempests, a thick and muddy atmosphere, and the elements all in frightful commotion, with a great many wonderful changes, in that early time, while the earth was working itself clear, and into shape and condition fit for our dwelling-place.

No one can tell the exact age of the earth, but it is safe to say it is more than a million years old. Its crust is thought to be about fifty or sixty miles in thickness, and it grows very hot as we penetrate deep down below its surface, and it is supposed that very hot fires are still raging in its heart or center.

S. H. W.

Questions.—What is the earth? Define planet. From what word is it derived? Define solar. What is the solar system? Do the planets shine? Why not? Name the other planets in our solar system. How were the children taught formerly in regard to world-building? Who prevented the truth from being spoken? What does geology teach? Define the word. When was the earth a bit of nebula? How did it go through space? What adhered to it? How came it to be round? What aided its growth? What happened to it after many ages? What occurred before it was fit to liv on? Does anyone know the age of the earth? How thick is its crust?

Legacies.

When a rich man dies and leaves a written request that a certain other person shall hav his money for his own use, it is called a legacy. How many of the young readers of the Corner are there who would not like to receive one? No doubt you all think you could appreciate that.

Now, there are other things besides money which are left for us by others, which are sometimes called legacies, which are not always so well appreciated, yet are quite as useful. No doubt some of you hav had an intimate "grown-up" friend to whom you hav been accustomed to listen, and whose mind seemed to you to be a fountain of knowledge always overflowing with sparkling gems of wit and varied information. What sadness clouded your pathway when the life of that friend suddenly went out, and you realized what he had been to you! You felt that the loss to yourself and the world was great, indeed, and how you did wish that you might take up or become possessed of his goodness and wisdom, and if you could do this, how much better the world might be when you should leave it.

While your friend could not leave to you all his wealth of wisdom, you will find as the years go by that he has indeed left you a rich legacy in the gems of thought, the fruit of his experience, which he dropped by the way while with you, and which are stored in your memory, as money in the vaults of a bank, from which you may draw, as you are able, to use them to your advantage. You are continually being left legacies of this kind in the thoughts written and stored in the Corner, and many other papers and books which hav been written and printed, from which you can freely draw all you can use. There is one thing, however, which you cannot come into full possession of without labor and experience. It is called good judgment. If you hav for some time been a careful reader of the Corner, and hav parents or guardians who are thinking people, and hav taught you to think for yourselvs, and as far as possible attribute the things that occur around you to their true causes, you hav already a great advantage over those who are being reared by credulous and superstitious people, as many children are.

You hav, no doubt, learned that there are many things which can be demonstrated as being true; that is, can be positivly proved or made evident to the senses beyond question or denial. Such things are real facts, or truth. By comparing statements of which we know little or nothing with what we do know, we learn whether or not they are true, because all truths will agree or be in harmony with each other wherever found. Thus we may increase our store of facts and strengthen our ability to judge correctly and quickly. We may soon form a habit of doing this, and be far less liable to be led into error.

When we hav seen it proved by experiment, and know that water will always flow down hill, unless some force greater than the force of gravitation acts upon the water to prevent, it would be difficult to make us believe that a man could cause a large body of water to separate and stand like two solid walls, with nothing but the air between them, simply by holding a rod like a walking-cane over or toward a portion of it. Perhaps you hav heard a story something like this. How does it compare with what you know of water? As you grow older, you will often hav occasion to apply such tests as above indicated, and the facts so obtained will serve to drive away many groundless fears which haunt the narrow minds of those who hav not learned to apply them.

You will do well to remember that there is no subject too "sacred" for the application, as there can be nothing more sacred than the truth.

In this way you will liv longer and be happier, besides leaving the world better than you found it, by making others happier also, because of your influence upon them.

That you may all do this, and more, is the sincere wish of your Uncle George.

[We thank the writer for the above beautiful legacy, and trust it may not be the last he will leave the children of our Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

Correspondence.

Austin, Nev., Jan. 8, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is my first letter I hav ever written, and as I am a little Freethinker seven years old, I thought I would write my first letter to you. I like the Children's Corner; mamma reads it to me. I read the children's letters every week. My papa has taken The Truth Seeker for many years. We laugh at the pictures every week. I am going to send for Aunt Elmina's book for children. More next time.

From yours truly, Harry Moss.

Cuming, Ga., Jan. 16, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I once more come before you as a beggar, for which I am ashamed—not to beg alms, but to ask a place in the Corner to thank the friends who hav responded to my situation. I hav a friend indeed at Philadelphia, who has been sending me The Truth Seeker regularly. We hav moved, and changed our post-office to Cuming. Pa is a tenant, and since we hav been up here in north Georgia, we hav to move every year, and you do not know how hard it is on him. I began to think we would hav to be thrown out all because pa is an outspoken Infidel, and the only one that dares to speak what he thinks. He will not act the hypocrit under any circumstances. I think he is wrong. I believe in policy myself. Oh, how I wish for a home! I hate the word "tenant," or "serf." As Uncle Bob says, "home is where the virtues grow." Nellie H. Guthrey.

Oneida, Ill., Jan. 1, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I go to school, and sit with another girl, whose name is Kate E. Main. She is as old as I am, and we are in the same classes. I study reading, arithmetic, geography, language, and spelling. It is very cold weather here now, and the snow is deep. There are five of us going to school, two girls and three boys. I must close for this time. Yours truly, Edith J. Rees.

Burnett, Neb., Jan. 5, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: My sister wrote a letter to the Children's Corner, so I thought I would write one. I am a little boy seven years old. I am in the Third Reader, and study spelling and arithmetic. I hav four sisters and three brothers older than myself, and one brother younger than I. Well, I guess this is a long enough letter for the first one, wishing you success with the Corner. I read the story in the last paper about, "Are Your Hands Clean?" and I thought it was very good. Yours truly, G. L. Whitney.

Atlantic Highlands, N. J., Jan. 15, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I liv at Atlantic Highlands, a Christian seaside resort. Our house is about twenty feet from the water of Sandy Hook bay. I hav a boat and I go fishing and rowing in the summer, and in the winter I go to school. I am twelve years old. My studies are spelling, history, algebra, grammar, arithmetic, geography, Fifth Reader, and etymology. My papa takes The Truth Seeker. I go to Sunday-school and read The Truth Seeker at home. I like the pictures first-rate. My school-teacher told us the other day how the world was made. She said God took a stick and dipped it into molten fire and brimstone, and whirled it around and a piece flew off and made this world, and another piece flew off and made Venus, and another piece flew off and made Jupiter, and so on until all the planets were made. I wrote this for the Children's Corner in The Truth Seeker; if you think it best, please put it in.

Willie C. Stickle, aged 12 years.

National Soldiers' Home, Va., Jan. 9, 287.

Miss Wixon: I hav often thought of paying tribute to the Children's Corner over which you so happily preside, but it has seemed on approach to be too sacred a precinct for an old bachelor soldier to intrude upon. The open-faced letter (that is a printer's term) from Dena L. Diamond calls me to the front. I am somewhat acquainted at the village of Ely, Vt., where that young and brave Freethinker resides, having been born in Port Mills village, in the township of Thetford (named after Thetford, England, where our honored Thomas Paine first saw the light). Ely is in the next township, Vershire on the northwest, and in between is West Fairlee, in which I hav lived about half my days, and where there are some of the terrible Freethinkers also, and not altogether afraid of their own shadows. Tell your correspondent, for me, that there is no thought but Freethought; the ideas that are bound upon one by force or fear are not thoughts, but notions—not Yankee notious, but useless notions—and the reason the church people hate Col. Robert G. Ingersoll so much, and their dislike amounts to hatred, is because he tries so effectually to free them from the yoke of bondage which they hav worn so long they think it a part of themselvs. They almost always speak of him as Bob Ingersoll. Now, how refined and gracious that is! How would they like to hav us call Jesus Christ Jed Christ?

I want to hav all our young friends learn to use the Bruno calendar, adopted by the Secular Union; at least, when writing on scientific and philosophical questions. They must know that Giordano Bruno was the first who brought such themes to a focus, and made a system of knowledge, showing that the universe was under the dominion of unchanging law, instead of being governed at the hap-hazard beck of a God, and for doing this the lamb-like Christians burnt him alive in the city of Rome, two hundred and eighty-six years ago. As the pious bigots say that the world is indebted to Christianity, as they name their nonsense, for civilization, whilst they teach Bruno's science in their schools, not letting their pupils learn there ever was such a person, we ought not to reckon time by the Christian style, but giv honor to whom honor is due, and date our chronology from the martyrdom of Bruno, making this year to be 287. I think that children are the most interesting creatures in the world, and the best that Christians believe about Jesus is that he was once a chubby baby boy. The Children's Corner is the most delightful part of The Truth Seeker, and a deal of truth is to be found in it. I wish there was a whole paper published by the Liberals for the little ones. Your "Story Hour" is splendid, and if you and the good Truth Seeker folks could arrange a Long Hour, it would be glorious. There, I am crowding the rightful occupauts out of their snug Corner, and shall hav to bow myself out.

Yours for the children,
John Prescott Guild.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.

SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.

OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

The Battle of Life.

I am tired, lay me down;
Welcome death; I sleep at last;
I hav fought, but gained no crown;
"One of a crowd," is all my past,
Yet had I hoped a course to run
Should bring me honor, wealth, and fame;
Or if not all, but only one,
Yet I, at least, should make a name.

Well, some must stand, and some must fall,
Some must be leaders, some be led;
The happy chance comes not to all;
Some fight for honors, some for bread.
When the brave leader you decree
Honors and rank and royal smile,
Forget not, men as good as he
Are standing in the rank and file.

Ingersoll and Lambert.

For the past two years, but more especially the last three months, various Catholic friends hav persistently called my attention to a book entitled, "Notes on Ingersoll," by Rev. L. A. Lambert. I was assured that it completely demolished that celebrated Infidel, and one enthusiast remarked that the arguments used were so clear-cut, so convincing, they carried conviction to the most obdurate.

The articles of Mr. Ingersoll, to which these "Notes" were supposed to be an answer, first appeared in the North American Review, and are known as his controversy with Judge Jere. S. Black. I had read them, and thought that Ingersoll had by far the better of the argument. Moreover, I did not remember having seen anything since which could cause me to change my mind.

Therefore, I reasoned that if "an obscure country pastor" could effect such a work, his place was not in an obscure, interior town, but in some large city, where, the observed of all observers, he could receive that homage justly his due for having saved Christianity from her impending doom. Hundreds of the most important positions in the church in Italy are occupied by men whose only claim to distinction is that they are members of some rich and powerful family. But here was one, an Irish-American, of poor but virtuous parents, who, by his gigantic intellect, had destroyed with one fell blow what God, the virgin, the angels, and all the rest of Christendom had been vainly endeavoring to do for centuries.

So I bought the book, determined that when it had carried conviction to my heart I would present the reverend gentleman's claims to the holy father—claims which his nativ modesty would naturally prevent his presenting in person. I read it carefully three times, and each time felt more and more satisfied that it would not be fair to assist in having him removed from his present position, as, at least so says the Buffalo Catholic Publication Company, "it is the wish of the people among whom he resides, that he may long be retained as pastor of St. Mary's church, and that his health, strength, and usefulness may not be impaired for many years to come." So the suffering souls of St. Mary's can depend that, so far as any exertion on my part is concerned, he is likely to remain "an obscure country pastor."

A woodcut of the Rev. Lambert, which graces the first page, shows a man of considerable mental ability, and an impression is made that, under other circumstances, he might hav been both an able and an original thinker.

From a somewhat limited biography, I learn that he founded the Catholic Times at Waterloo, N. Y., which has since consolidated with the Union, and is now known as the Catholic Union and Times, of Buffalo. Also that he is an author: his "Thesaurus Biblicus," or hand-book of scripture reference, being "a mountain of scholarly research and patient toil."

The preface is by the Rev. Patrick Cronin, who takes to himself the credit for having published the "Notes" in pamphlet form, as originally they appeared only in the columns of the Buffalo Union and Times. For, says he, "regarding them as a complete annihilation of the preteptious scoffer [Ingersoll], and desirous that they should reach a much larger public than could be secured by any newspaper," etc., etc.—the nativ modesty of the author was overcome and the "Notes" appeared. There is no question in regard to the motiv. The spoils of Egypt, filthy lucre, had nothing to do with it. It is claimed that one hundred and twenty-five thousand of these pamphlets, which could be produced at less than five cents per copy, hav been sold at twenty-five cents per copy. A clear case of ad majorem Dei gloriam.

As he warms to the subject, the Rev. Cronin enthusiastically remarks: "Would that those whose minds hav been poisoned by the specious pen and brilliant rhetoric of our American arch-blasphemer could read these 'Notes.'" "With cold, relentless cruelty, Father Lambert pursues Ingersoll in these pages, step by step, piercing him with keen Damascus blade at every turn; aye, dissecting him to the very marrow of his bones." "Oh, that to-day we had more Father Lamberts, especially in these United States, to giv us opportune pamphlets like this!"

Now, the Rev. Lambert comes on the scene, and in his introductory, after comparing Mr. Ingersoll with Paine, Voltaire, Hobbes, Bolingbroke, and others, claims that as the objections Mr. Ingersoll raised were not original, there is no necessity for his answering them. "The proper way to meet Mr. Ingersoll is," says he, "not to defend Christianity against his scattering, inconsequent, illogical, and unphilosophical attacks, but to make his article the subject to be considered," etc—and he proceeds to consider it by taking up various sentences and answering them in this wise:

INGERSOLL. We know nothing of what we call the laws of nature except as we gather the idea of law from the uniformity of phenomena springing from like conditions. To make myself clear, water always runs down-hill.

I thought this a rather clear proposition, and read the following answer with some surprise:

LAMBERT. We acquire a knowledge of the laws of nature by observing the effects of the forces of nature; but we do not gather "an idea of law" from the study of these forces and effects. The idea of law, in general, is, and must be, prior to the idea of particular laws, etc., etc.

This I thought to be mere quibbling. But he goes on to giv his "idea" that as "water runs up in the capillary tubes of every vegetable that grows" (by the by, this is called the force of suction, from which the word sucker is derived), and because "the Mississippi carries its water up an inclined plane, a perpendicular distance of five miles," and "the same is true of a portion of the Nile;" and as "the equator all around the earth is a mountain thirteen miles higher than the surface at the poles," and the "polar regions are vast sunken valleys," he concludes that the saying, "Water always runs down-hill," is incorrect, else the polar regions would be flooded. Therefore, when Mr. Ingersoll made the statement he knew nothing about the subject; in fact, less of this world than of the next. He adds, "You saw, somewhere, a bit of water running down a hill, and you gathered an idea that it always does so."

And so he goes, on, on, on, ever quibbling, till the point is reached where, in speaking of the presumed existence of God, Ingersoll says:

This question cannot be settled by saying that it would be a mere waste of time and space to enumerate the proofs which show that the universe was created by a pre-existent and self-conscious being. The time and space should hav been wasted, and the proofs should hav been enumerated. These proofs are what the wisest and greatest are trying to find.

LAMBERT. I shall produce the argument of a philosopher for the existence of God. It runs in this way: I allow you to doubt all things if you wish till you come to the point where doubt denies itself. Doubt is an act of intelligence; only an intelligent agent can doubt. It as much demands intellect to doubt as it does to believe—to deny as it does to affirm. Universal doubt is, therefore, an impossibility: for doubt cannot, if it would, doubt the intelligence that doubts, since to doubt that would be to doubt itself. You cannot doubt that you doubt, and then, if you doubt, you know that you doubt, and there is one thing, at least, you do not doubt, namely, that you doubt. To doubt the intelligence that doubts, would be to doubt that you doubt, for, without intelligence there can be no more doubt than belief. Intelligence, then, you must assert, for without intelligence you cannot even deny intelligence, and the denial of intelligence by intelligence contradicts itself, and affirms intelligence in the every act of denying it. Doubt, then, as much as you will, you must still affirm intelligence as the condition of doubting, or of asserting the possibility of doubt, for what is not, cannot act.

This much then is certain, that however far you may be disposed to carry your denials, you cannot carry them so far as to deny intelligence, because that would be denial of denial itself. Then you must concede intelligence, and then whatever is essential to the reality of intelligence. In conceding anything you concede necessarily all that by which it is what it is, and without which it could not be what it is. Intelligence is inconceivable without the intelligible, or some object capable of being known. So in conceding intelligence you necessarily concede the intelligible. The intelligible is, therefore, something which is, is being, real being too, not mere abstract or possible being, for without the real there is and can be no possible or abstract. The abstract, in that it is abstract, is nothing and, therefore, unintelligible; that is to say, no object of knowledge, or of the intellect. The possible as possible is nothing but the power or ability of the real, and is apprehensible only in that power or ability. In itself, abstracted from the real, it is pure nullity, has no being, no existence, is not, and therefore is unintelligible, no object of intelligence or of intellect, on the principle that what is not is not intelligible. Consequently, to the reality of intelligence a real intelligible is necessary; and since the reality of intelligence is undeniable, the intelligible must be asserted, and asserted as real, not as abstract or merely possible being. You are obliged to assert intelligence, but you cannot assert intelligence without asserting the intelligible, and you cannot assert the intelligible without asserting something that really is; that is, without asserting real being. The real being thus asserted is either necessary and eternal being, being in itself, subsisting by and from himself, or it is contingent and, therefore, created being. One or the other we must say, for being which is neither necessary nor contingent, or which is both at once, is inconceivable, and cannot be asserted or supposed.

Whatever is, in any sense, is either necessary and eternal, or contingent and created, is either being in itself, absolute being, or existence dependent on another for its being, and, therefore, is not without the necessary and eternal, on which it depends. If you say it is necessary and eternal being, you say it is God; if you say it is contingent being, you still assert the necessary and eternal, therefore God, because the contingent is neither possible nor intelligible without the necessary and eternal. The contingent, since it is or has its being only in the necessary and eternal, and since what is not is not intelligible, is intelligible as the contingent only in necessary and eternal being, the intelligible in itself, in which it has its being and therefore its intelligibility. So in either case you cannot assert the intelligible without asserting necessary and eternal being; and, therefore, since necessary and eternal being is God without asserting God, or that God is; and since you must assert intelligence even to deny it, it follows that in every act of intelligence God is asserted, and that it is impossible without self-contradiction to deny his existence (Brownson's Quarterly Review).

Alas! poor Brownson. I knew him well. Educated a Protestant, he tried in vain to gain an honest living by literary work. Heavy, dull, phlegmatic, his articles were too labored even for his cultured co-religionists; and it used to be said that eternity had been created for the sole purpose of studying his essays. Starvation stared him in the face. In a moment of inspiration he became a Catholic, and the world was electrified with the news that the great, the original, the profound Orestes A. Brownson would publish a quarterly review in the interests of the "Holy Church." In order that the cares of a growing family should not disturb his mental equilibrium, his son was educated by the church, and received holy orders. He is dead now. Peace to his ashes! His foibles, and those of his father, are buried in the grave.

Well, the Review appeared, and no Catholic center-table had its complete outfit unless one or more copies were ostentatiously shown on it. Time crept on; the Catholic world was not prepared or educated to receive these wondrous argumentations, and slowly but surely the circulation of the Review fell off—off—off—till not a score stood on its books. And now, poor Brownson is resuscitated by "an obscure country pastor," and his insane ravings, superinduced by a too lavish use of chloral, are foisted on an American public as the conclusions of an eminent philosopher and incontestable proof of the existence of a God.

It is not my intention to analyze the "Notes." I read them for my own pleasure and profit. I will merely quote the last article, as it contains a proposition which I propose to notice.

INGERSOLL. We should remember . . . that the early Christians believed everything but the truth, and that they accepted paganism, and admitted the reality of all the pagan miracles.

LAMBERT'S COMMENT. In making and printing this statement you lose all claim to respectful consideration. We must brand it in the whole and in all its parts as a falsehood; and he who made it is ignorant or malicious, or both. And yet this falsifier talks glibly of "honesty" and "honor bright." We charge Mr. Ingersoll with falsehood in making the above statement. We call on him to verify it or stand as a convicted falsifier. A falsifier cannot be trusted; his glib talk of honesty and virtue must be looked upon as a snare, like that of the profligate who talks of virtue to his intended victim. We can respect an enemy, but when we find deceit and falsehood in his methods, we relegate him to that disrespectable class which affords remunerativ employment to detectivs and policemen. A falsifier is a manufacturer of base coin, a counterfeiter, a fraud.

We here conclude these notes, believing we hav accomplished what we undertook to do. We hav said enough to convince our readers that Mr. Ingersoll is profligate of statement; that he is not to be trusted; that he is unscrupulous; that as a logician and metaphysician he is beneath contempt; that he is a mere galvanizer of old objections long ago refuted; that he is ignorant and superficial—full of gas and gush—in a word, that he is a philosophical charlatan of the first water, who mistakes curious listeners for disciples, and applause for approval.

Of course, we do not expect him to reply to us, and for several reasons. First, he will not want to; second, he cannot; third, he can pretend not to notice an obscure country pastor. Very well. Then let some of his disciples or admirers try to rehabilitate his smirched character. We hold ourselvs responsible to him and to all the glib little whiffets of his shallow school.

NOTE TO NINTH EDITION. As I anticipated, Mr. Ingersoll has publicly declined to reply.

Thus endeth this remarkable production—remarkable in more ways than one, remarkable in so far that a Catholic clergyman, even though "an obscure country pastor," should raise his voice in defense of a Protestant champion of Christianity. Just think of it—Jere. S. Black, a member of a church which characterizes the Catholic church as "the Scarlet Woman," "the Whore of Babylon," and other pet and suggestiv names, being defended by a Catholic priest—Jere. Black, puffed up to the skies as a defender of Christianity! Well, well, times hav changed, for the publisher, Rev. Patrick Cronin, says "As may be observed, these 'Notes' are written from the broadest Christian standpoint; so that they ought to be as welcome to all who believe in Jesus Christ, and in the revelation he has made, as to Catholics. We need scarcely add the hope that they may hav a large circulation; and we ask all who glory in the triumph of Christian truth, to aid in spreading this pamphlet."

But who ever heard of a broad Christian standpoint—a standpoint so broad that a Calvinist and a Catholic could meet, and, with locked arms, sing the song of the saints? I never did, and Patrick Cronin and L. A. Lambert deserve the kindest considerations of all Christendom for having shoved that plank into the Christian platform.

But what is Christianity? From what standpoint is Jere. Black or the Protestant buyer of the "Notes" to view it? If Black views it from his own, then, according to Lambert's he must be damned: unless—just think of it—unless this mighty champion, with his "great intellectual merit and ability," this cogent reasoner, is willing to accept salvation by pleading guilty to "invincible ignorance."

But I hav more particularly to do with the concluding portion of the "Notes." I hav no doubt that Mr. Ingersoll had good and sufficient reasons for declining to meet Mr. Lambert. It is not customary for a leader to go out of his way to answer every charge, even if made by a clergyman. The intellectual status of Mr. Ingersoll is too well defined to need any explanation from him. The curious reader of the "Notes" will find a reason on its every page, and may possibly determin that Mr. Ingersoll simply declined "to stoop to conquer." But it is different with me, and with thousands of others. Personally I am not—at least, I do not think I am—a "glib little whiffet of a shallow school," but an open and avowed Infidel, and if the Rev. Lambert will hold himself responsible to me, I will, in lieu of a better man, meet him in the columns of the press and argue on the merits of his particular school.

It is eminently fitting that "an obscure country pastor" should be met by one in his own station; by one who desires no higher position than that of a "high private in the rear rank of the Liberal army."

I should ask that we keep in view the truism that "a belief never changes a fact;" that the arguments should be impersonal; that we deal with cold facts, and that the articles appear simultaneously in THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Buffalo Catholic Union and Times—as the originator of this last, the Reverend Lambert, has claims which his admirer, the Reverend Cronin, the present editor, will not ignore.

On the part of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for its thousands of readers, can be promised a respectful hearing, not of sophistries, but of any facts that may be presented, for there are multitudes anxiously awaiting light, and if they hav immortal souls which can only be saved by means of the Catholic church, they want to know it; and want that knowledge right away. And so do I.

Therefore, Brother Macdonald, kindly forward a marked copy to the Rev. L. A. Lambert, pastor of St. Mary's church, Waterloo, N. Y.

Let us hope that the reverend gentleman's keen Damascus blade has not become dull nor he tired of dissecting Infidels to the very marrow of their bones.

To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

NUMEROUS cases of small-pox are reported.

MICHAEL DAVITT, the Land Leaguer, has returned to Ireland.

BOODLE ALDERMAN O'NEIL is now on trial in this city for bribery.

THE fasting girl of Monon, Ind., is said to be dying after ninety days of total abstinence from food.

THE New York Produce Exchange has sent a memorial to Congress urging more efficient harbor defenses.

AN old man kneeling at his devotions in the Catholic cathedral at Portland, Me., died suddenly last Sunday.

THE New York excise commissioners hav decided to raise liquor-saloon licenses from $75 to $200, beginning with Feb. 1, 1887.

LAST year's immigration into the United States amounted to 386,755 persons, an increase of more than 60,000 over the year 1885.

A SENSATIONAL statement has been circulated to the effect that Brigham Young is still alive and intends to appear as one risen from the dead.

IT is reported that the strike in Lorillard's tobacco factory is off, an amicable settlement having been reached between employer and employees.

THE printers of New York will petition the legislature to establish a state printing-office instead of giving the work out to so-called "rat" contractors.

MAYOR HEWITT is steadily recovering his health, though the sciatica troubles him somewhat. He has not as yet been able to devote much attention to the duties of his office.

CASHIER SCHROEDER, of a German savings bank in Jersey City, embezzled so much money that the bank has put itself in the hands of the court. Mr. Schroeder has disappeared.

FATHER DONELLY, the priest who succeeded Dr. McGlynn, reports that McGlynn is owing the servant girls of the parish from $20,000 to $50,000, and that the debt on the church has increased $80,000 under McGlynn's management.

THE fisheries question is causing a good deal of hostil talk between Canada and the United States, and the nations are snapping at each other's heels, with an occasional growl from England. The Senate has passed a Retaliation bill.

THE bodies of the two Tristram boys who shot and killed a man at White Plains, N. Y., a short time ago, and then shot themselvs, were refused burial in consecrated ground because the brothers had committed suicide instead of waiting to be hanged.

EDWARD UNGER, of this city, quarreled with his room-mate, killed him with a hammer, cut off his head and threw it into the river, and then packed the body in a trunk and shipped it to a fictitious address in Baltimore. The crime was traced back to Unger and he has confessed his guilt.

THERE was a terrible riot in the districts adjacent to Belfast, Ireland, last Sunday, between the Catholics and Protestants. One report givs some thirty people shot by the troops, and a hundred wounded. Another says there was no injury done beyond gunshot wounds. A great many arrests were made.

A POLICEMAN found little nine-year old David Dugan, of 99 Charlton street, naked in a hallway, the other day, with a swollen eye and a bruised back and chest. He explained that his mother had beaten him and driven him out of the house. The mother, upon being arrested, claimed to hav had scriptural authority for whipping the boy. She was held in bail for trial.

KIRALFY, who runs a gorgeous spectacular play at Niblo's Garden, this city, sent invitations to all the ministers around New York to come and see his performance. The invitation was generally ignored, but the Rev. Mr. Reed invited the company to come and hear him preach. Only six of the dancing girls accepted the invitation, the rest declining on the ground that they were Roman Catholics.

THE coal strike is still on. The managers of the Old Dominion line steamers hav had the master workmen Knights arrested for ordering the strike. A general strike in other branches is expected if the coal companies do not yield. Fortunately the weather is moderate, or great suffering would be caused among the poor on account of the high price of coal.

Odds and Ends.

SAM JONES told his Nebraska audiences that he is a gentleman. It is only when Sam gets west of the Missouri river that he dares indulge in such flights of fancy.

"DINNY, yez do he drinkin' too much fer a lad o' yer years," said an Irishman to his son. "If it isn't careful yez are, ye'll foind yerself filling a drunkard's grave before you die."

A MANUFACTURER out West informs us, and wishes us to inform the American public, that his patent huzz-saw has just captured the finger of scorn, and that it will never again he pointed at anyone.

MRS. MULLIGAN: "And so you hav no mother now?" Motherless boy: "No, mum." Mrs. Mulligan: "Well, me boy, whenever you feel the want of a good whipping, come to me, and I'll be a mother to you."

LITTLE DOT: "I know what I'm going to get for a birthday present." Little Dick: "What?" "A new doll; big one, too, I guess." "Did your mamma tell you so?" "No, hut I seed her making a lot of clothes, and they is too little for me."

DOCTOR: "What ails you, sir?" Patient: "I don't know, doctor. I hav such a buzzing sound in my ears all the time. Would you like to look at my tongue?" Doctor: "No, never mind. Bring your wife around some day. I'd like to look at her's."

CHRONOLOGY.—Old gentleman (putting a few questions): "Now, hoys—ah—can any of you tell me what commandment Adam broke when he took the forhidden fruit?" Small scholar (like a shot): "Please, sir, th' warn't no commandments then, sir!"

CAPTAIN WALSH of the Salvation Army wears a red shirt, on which is embroidered, "A hurning hell awaits the careless." It is rumored that his wife did the decoration with a view toward making the captain wipe his feet hefore coming in the front door.

AN "impressionist" sent in a "sunset" picture to the Royal Academy. He carefully marked on the hack of the frame which was the right side up; but he added, in a polite note, "Should my work be placed on your walls upside down, please catalog it as a sunrise."

THE farmer leads a pleasant life. "All day long, with a laugh and a song," he drives the alien cow from his corn-field, and repairs the rail-fence. Merrily he swings the ax to and fro, and the chips fly right and left, until, yielding to his well-aimed blows, the tree falls on him and breaks a leg.

IRONFOUNDER: "This strike will cost me a good many thousand dollars." Reporter: "All your men out, eh?" Ironfounder: "Yes, and there's a hig lot of iron solid in the hlast furnace." Reporter: "Now, when did the men strike?" Ironfounder: "While the iron was hot, of course."

"I'M so glad I got mamma to come and liv with us," said young Mrs. Tocker to a visitor. "Charley didn't use to he at all orthodox, hut he is hecoming so. He told me so this morning. You know he used to believe like Ingersoll, hut now he says he thinks there is such a thing, and that it's dear mamma that converted him."

A PENNSYLVANIA farmer who has heen trouhled with crows scattered a peck of whisky-soaked corn in his field. The crows got inehriated, flew away, and never returned. A Connecticut farmer tried the same thing, and now he finds the crows waiting for him every morning. He does not consider the plan a supreme success.

RICHARD COEUR DE LION was one of the most stylish men in Europe in his day. When he donned his suit of shining armor, put on a tin helmet, pulled on a pair of laminated steel hoots, threw a sheet-iron ulster gracefully over one arm, and picked up a club with a spike in the end of it, society dudes said he was "dressed to kill."

A NUMBER of Chicago ministers recently attended the opera in that city with a view to learning the status of the ballet from a moral standpoint, and it is said that when the leading dancer executed a faux pas, or whatever it is called—coup d etat possihly—on her hig toe-nail, several of the excited brothers were heard to murmur "Amen."

A CHINESE gentleman, hearing the simple name of Azurizawa Ryochi Nichome Sanjukanbox Kiohashi-Ku, has discovered the secret of photographing in natural colors. It is hoped he will not, in imitation of Daguerre, christen the new process with his own name. Think of going to a photographer and telling him you want a dozen Azurizawaryochininichomesanjukanbozkiohashikuotypes taken!

THE dreadful nature of tohacco which was made apparent when Grant died of "smoker's cancer," is still more apparent now that John Roach, who never used tohacco, died of the same disease. If it can he shown that tobacco kills alike the man who doesn't use it and the man who does, its destructiv nature will he sufficiently plain to he effectiv in platform oratory and other hysterical performances.—Winsted Press.

OH, BISHOP OF KALAMAZOO!

The reverend hishop of Kalamazoo
Once went behind the scenes,
To see for himself if it were true,
What he'd heard of footlight queens.

He was dazzled at first with the glare of gas;
The carpenters knocked him down;
The prompter forbade him this way to pass;
He was sworn at hy the clown.

He stuck in a groove, and fell in a trap;
Was hoisted to the flies;
But arrived without any further mishap,
As they rang up the curtain's rise.

And there, in the wings, all dressed in smiles,
Stood two pretty ballet maids,
Of symmetric limhs and witching wiles—
Said one of the lively naiads:

"His head is bald—he must he gay:
Say, governor! Who are you?"
"My dears," did the rev'rend wand'rer say,
"I'm the hishop of Kalamazoo."

Gems of Thought.

IN every instance the persecutors who in the past hav been so ready to ruthlessly deprive of liberty, happiness, and life their unfortunate victims, who did not subscribe to the doctrins enjoined by the ruling powers, hav done so in the name of the religion of Jesus, and under the auspices of the highest system of morality said to he known to man.—D. M. Bennett.

"THE monastic movement," Gibbon tells us, "was not less rapid or universal than that of Christianity itself." One small Egyptian city devoted itself almost wholly to ascetic life, and in its monasteries lived ten thousand monks and twenty thousand virgins. At the close of the fourth century, the monastic population of Egypt equaled the entire population of its cities. The empire swarmed with men whose only business was to wander from place to place, asking alms and collecting stories of miracles and peculiarities of the saints, for the benefit of the church. "A hideous, sordid, and emaciated maniac, without knowledge, without patriotism, without natural affection, passing his life in a long routine of useless and atrocious self-torture, and quailing before the ghastly phantoms of his delirious brain, had become the ideal of the nations which had known the writings of Plato and Cicero, and the lives of Socrates and Cato" (Lecky). To separate from his family, if he had one, and to show no regard to the mother who bore him, were thought hy the hermit the most acceptahle offerings he could make to God.—Underwood's Lectures and Essays. [Whoever wishes to know the extravagant hights to which the spirit of asceticism carried the monks of the fourth and fifth centuries, should read the article, "Pillar Saints," in Chambers's Encyclopedia, and also study the whole of Tennyson's poem, of which I can afford to giv only one stanza. —Hylax.]

Although I he the hasest of mankind,
From scalp to sole one slough and crust of sin,
Unfit for earth, unfit for heaven, scarce meet
For troops of devils, mad with blasphemy,
I will not cease to grasp the hope I hold
Of saintdom, and to clamor, mourn, and sob,
Battering the gates of heaven with storms of prayer,
Hav mercy, Lord, and take away my sin.
—Tennyson's St. Simeon Stylites.

I HAD rather think of those I hav loved and lost as having returned to earth, as having become a part of the elemental wealth of the world; I would rather think of them as unconscious dust, I would rather dream of them as gurgling in the stream, floating in the clouds, bursting in the foam of light upon the shores of worlds; I would rather think of them as the lost visions of a forgotten night, than to hav even the faintest fear that their naked souls hav been clutched hy an orthodox god.—Ingersoll.

THE Agnostic refuses to see any more reason for thanking a good God in the heavens for the welcome, fruitful sunshine than for cursing an ugly devil in the skies for the withering drouth or the destroying tornado. To the Agnostic, the good and evil in the world are strangely mixed, and he sees no evidence that God, if there is a God, is infinitly wise and good, in the sense we use the terms of human relations, and any other use of these terms he thinks an abuse of them. If you ask him if it would not he a pleasant and consoling helief that somewhere ahove us is a heavenly father, who is filled with loving kindness and tender mercy, who watches over us as a mother over her sleeping hahe, he prohably replies that it would be indeed a pleasant helief, hut the question is not what is pleasant, hut what is true; and his experience has taught him that if there he a God watching over us, man will stumhle and fall, and go to the bad, unless he looks out for himself. What does it avail if a God watches the falling sparrow? It falls all the same, and no all-seeing eye saves it, if the cat sees it.—W. H. Spencer.

To helieve that God is cruel, short-sighted, capricious, and unjust, is an affront, an indignity, which (on the orthodox supposition that God takes judicial cognizance of such errors) must he immeasurably more guilty and more perilous than to helieve that the Jews were mistaken in imagining that he spoke through Moses, or the Christians in imagining that he spoke through Paul. He is affirmed to he a jealous God, an angry God, a capricious God—punishing the innocent for the sins of the guilty, punishing, with infinit and endless torture, men whom he had created weak, finite, and ephemeral—nay, whom he had preordained to sin—a God who came down from heaven, walked among men, feasted at their tables, endured their insults, died by their hands. Is there no peril in all this?—no sin in helieving all these unworthy puerilities of a creator who has given us reason and nature to teach us better things? Yet countless Christians accept them all with trembling and hasty dismay, as if afraid that God would punish them for forbearing to helieve evil of him.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

IT were hetter to hav no opinion of God at all than such an opinion as is unworthy of him; for the one is unhelief, the other is contumely; and certainly superstition is the reproach of the deity. Plutarch saith well to that purpose: "Surely," saith he, "I had rather a great deal men should say there was no such man at all as Plutarch than that they should say that there was one Plutarch that would eat his children as soon as they were horn;" as the poets speak of Saturn. Atheism leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation; all which may he guides to an outward moral virtue, though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these, and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men.—Bacon's Essays.

CAN I commit a sin against God hy thinking? If God did not intend I should think, why did he make me a thinker? For one, I am convinced, not only that I hav the right to think, hut that it is my duty to think and to express my honest thoughts. Whatever the gods may say, we must be true to ourselvs.—Ingersoll.

THE CASE OF DR. McGLYNN—THE CHURCH TRUE TO HER RECORD.

"He didn't snivel worth a cent,
Nor gush to any great extent,
But labored on a level plan—
A priest but none the less a man."

Notes and Clippings.

THE police of Brussels hav just seized a Socialist paper and imprisoned the editor.

JOHN RUSKIN, formerly an English author, is preparing to enter the Roman Catholic church. Ruskin's intellect has been weakening for some years.

THE remains of James Lick were removed from San Francisco, on the 10th of January, and deposited in his final and appropriate resting-place, beneath the dome of Mount Hamilton Observatory—a most fitting monument to his generous benefaction.

THE Women's Suffrage Party State Committee have sent letters of thanks to United States Commissioner Wilkes Angel for dismissing the charge of illegal voting against Mrs. Lucy S. Baker, and to District-Attorney Daniel N. Lockwood for advising the dismissal.

SANDWICHED between a notice of a meeting at the Methodist church and a notice of a big sponge, we find in the Neapolitan Record a little advertisment of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We thank the editor of the Record, and Mr. John Peck, whose influential good will we recognize.

ANARCHIST AUGUST SPIES, in jail at Chicago, has married Miss Nina Van Zandt by proxy. His brother acted the part of groom at the ceremony, being commissioned to do so by a paper which the condemned man caused to be drawn up, and which he signed. The legality of the marriage is now under discussion.

SAYS the New Theology Herald: "The dodging and downright dishonesty of so many of our professed Christian teachers calls for more than a word of protest from some source. If Christianity can be preserved only by such methods, it will and ought to perish."

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE, primate of Algiers, has interested the pope in a scheme to rebuild Carthage, as a center for Catholic missions. It won't be many years before we shall hav to dig an arcade country under this crust, if we want to get away from the contribution box.—Tidbits.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has obtained a world-wide reputation by its pictures on scriptural subjects, of which it presents two each week. THE TRUTH SEEKER is ably edited by Eugene M. Macdonald, assisted by a well-appointed corps of correspondents. It is cheap at the price of its subscription.—New Orleans Southland.

PAUL BERT'S remains were buried at Auxerre, on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15th, in the presence of about twenty-five thousand people, a large number of whom had traveled from Paris. The weather was exceedingly cold, the thermometer having fallen to 21°, and the attendance of so many mourners must hav been due to something more than the "mere sense of duty," to which the Daily News attributes it. The speeches lasted for two hours. Among the speakers were M. Flourens, the foreign minister, and M. Berthelot, minister of education. The latter, who is a life-long friend of Rénan, and one of the countrymen from the prejudices of the church as well as of the throne. Other speakers were M. Guichard, the senator; M. Millieaux, most eminent scientists in France, significantly remarked that Paul Bert sought to free his mayor of Auxerre; M. Spuller, one of Gambetta's lieutenants; M. Janssen, vice-president of the Academy of Sciences; and MM. Dastre, Dehairin, and Chauveau, lecturers at the Sorbonne.—London Freethinker.

THE Catholic cardinals who hav just arrived at Havre by the steamer Burgoyne carried bad luck to the vessel. The weather was rough going over, and on the first day out three men fell from the foretop, one going overboard and being lost, and the others sustaining severe injuries. It may be some consolation to the surviving friends of the man who was drowned to know that one of the priests on board retained sufficient presence of mind to grant him conditional absolution.

IT would appear that the new pastor at St. Stephen's church is not truthful. He told a reporter that Dr. McGlynn owed the servant girls of his parish from $20.000 to $50,000 on moneys borrowed, and that McGlynn had increased the debt of the church $80,000. It is now stated that the "$20,000 to $50,000" is nearer $15,000; that it is not due to servant girls, but to well-to-do members of the congregation, and that it was loaned to the trustees of the church instead of Dr. McGlynn. The $80,000 debt is for improvements made by the trustees.

"A ROMAN Catholic layman," certified by the editor as a distinguished Roman Catholic of great experience in and knowledge of that church, writing in the Independent on Dr McGlynn's case, says: "It may seem a strange assertion, but I believe it true, that a priest who brought a legal action against his bishop, no matter how just his case might be, could not get a fair trial. One of several reasons would be that Catholics hav a strong feeling against any condemnation of ecclesiastical authority, and some would inevitably be judge or jury. It would need a thorough knowledge of the inner workings of the Catholic church to understand this subject fully. The vast majority of Catholics know nothing whatever of the private troubles, sins, or wrongs of the Catholic clergy. The present writer heard a priest say, long before the McGlynn case became known, that he considered it a special mark of the divine character of the church that the greatest scandals were never known, while trifling matters, easily explained and soon forgotten, were alone made public. It may be said, however, that a good priest can always appeal with certainty of justice to the holy see: There never was a greater or more mischievous fallacy. It is true, and I could bring forward many cases in proof, that at the present day justice can generally be obtained at Rome. But the favor or right is purchased at too dear a cost. The priest who dares to take a case against his bishop to Rome is a marked man. He may gain his case in Rome, but he comes back to break his heart in America. A little knowledge of human nature will suffice to justify my assertion. Consider the tremendous power of a Catholic bishop over priests and religious. He is an autocrat; he may be a benevolent man, but his whole training and position tempts him to be the very reverse. I am far from asserting, nor do I believe it to be so, that every Catholic bishop acts tyrannically, but the habitual mode of action of a Catholic bishop in regard to his priests tends to the exercise of chronic tyranny."

Ethics.*

II.

To return to our metaphor of the pyramids. All the past is expressed by the pyramid A. All the freedom and power of our self-developed personality is expressed by the pyramid B.

Each influences the other, and is in turn influenced by it. In some minds the Past dominates. They are all Experience, but no Creativ Invention. In others the Present is full of Inspiration, and the past, only of Error. In the same mind the Past rules at one time, and the evolving self at another. The power of each over the other may be represented by third lines of influence x and y. These two lines varying in their angle result in a third Pyramid of converging Influence—C, or Ethics.

As each generation enters upon its career it is pressed upon not merely by the old religion, but by the old industrial methods, or the old work and the old science and philosophy, or the old thought. From each of these it makes its own Exodus, under its temporary Moses and Joshua, away from its task-masters, apast the bitter lakes and through the sea of weeds, and by help of the manna and the quails, until it looks down from Pisgah and from Nebo, and then, with strength unspent and eye undimmed, it dies with its face turned toward its Canaan.

But, on his passage out from his old Egypt to his new Canaan, to every man there is delivered his two tablets of stone containing his decalog, or his system of ethics, in three handwritings, viz., some of them in a hand which he can read and nobody else can—these are his rights; some in a hand which he can't read but everybody else can—these are his duties; and some in a hand which neither he nor anybody else can read. These are the book of the consequences of his acts, or their ultimate utilities.

In the race, as in the individual, a threefold tendency toward emancipation accompanies the unfolding of man's powers, but this emancipation is always an emancipation from the thraldom of the past into a degree of relativ present liberty, in which present liberty lies involved the conception of those changes and that new birth which, as we look forward to it, assumes the aspect of the evolution of the future. This threefold emancipation from the old religion to the new, from the old industry to the new, and from the old science, philosophy, or thought to the new, goes on in an ever-recurring circle essentially the same as the circle of life, in which infancy brings with it subjection, maturity brings liberty, liberty brings love; love involves the ovum, and the ovum passes through gestation into infancy again. This is the circle of life; this, also, is the circle of thought, and in this circle ethics marks the point of always imperfect union, where the old givs way to the new, or law yields to liberty, or the rights of others consist with the evolution of self. Let us, for greater simplicity, consider the three aspects of man as a worshiper enchained by the past, man as a worker energizing the present, and man as a thinker giving birth to the future.

It might seem at first as though religion, being essentially the voice and thraldom of all the past, could involve no evolution of the new; and yet underneath the robes of the Roman bishop, whose vestments embody designs which carry us back to that early morning when the names were not yet given to the constellations, and when in our Northern sky the poetic fancy of the Hindoo shepherds had not yet beheld among the scattered and formless stars the savior bruising the serpent's head as they swung together around the icy pole—underneath, I say, these priestly vestments which carry us so far into the past there lurks always a latent reformer who dreams of a new and holier Rome—

> Proud views of human kind,
> Of men to gods exalted and refined;
> False views, like that horizon's fair deceit,
> Where earth and heaven but seem, alas! to meet.

Superstition, in all its forms, seizes upon the prevailing ethics of every period, and adopts it as its own. Thus Catholicism in America proclaims that its sympathies hav always been republican; Protestantism in America stoutly asserts that a faith which uses alcoholic wine to typify the blood of Jesus is a "total abstinent" religion; and both forms of superstition declare that a faith which resists the dissection of a dead body is scientific; that one which denies the possibility of communication with the spirits of deceased persons demonstrates immortality; that one which relentlessly pursues every Magdalen with its scorn imitates Jesus, whose chief friend was a Magdalen; and that one which preaches a holy crusade against polygamy in Utah is in strict harmony with the ethical example of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, and Solomon.

Fashionable superstitions strengthen themselvs by intermarrying with the first families, the best corner lots, the people in power, and the prevailing ethics. The two run in parallel lines, because success associates with success. The successful priest sells a different commodity, but he belongs to the same set, because he sells to the same customers with the successful in all other occupations.

A very extensiv idea prevails among Christians that a man cannot know what is right, or if he does know it, cannot do it, unless he has some sort of experimental acquaintance with a deity. The Chinese opinion is that he must hav money in the bank, and must own his own home before he attains to a good ethical position. The Greek view was that he must hav known the philosophers. The basis of unity in these three views is found in prosperity and thrift. Among Christians a prosperous and thrifty man will generally hav an experimental acquaintance with deity. It is not wholly unnatural that a man who finds all his wants provided for, without the consciousness of having created by his own labor any considerable fraction of the wealth he enjoys, should attribute the excess over what he has created to the beneficence of a superintending providence.

Among the Chinese a prosperous and thrifty man will hav money in the bank and will own his home. Among the Greeks such a man only had leisure for philosophy. So in each case we find the best ethics associated with the man who has prosperity. Two centuries ago the good all believed in burning witches. Five centuries ago the extremely ethical all believed in rescuing the Holy Sepulcher from the Unitarians, sometimes called the Mohammedans. Ethical Europe was convulsed with agony and seven million lives were sacrificed because a rock in Judea, in which the body of a Hebrew peasant was supposed to hav lain for a day and a half, should be permitted to remain in the hands of gentlemen of Turkish extraction who did not perceive that this deceased Jewish peasant had been, prior to his birth, the creator of the universe and continued after his death to be the ruler, and that a large portion of his virtue still inhered in the rock from which he had risen.

In all, fifty millions of persons hav been slaughtered under the Christian dispensation in the various wars, persecutions, and punishments which hav had for their authors the highly ethical, and for their object to teach us that we could not comprehend right from wrong without knowing Jesus, and without an experiential acquaintance, either in our own persons or by proxy through a priesthood, with a personal creator. Meanwhile the industries, agriculture, manufactures, and the arts hav been saved to us by the selfish passion of gain, which the church, the truly good, the highly ethical, tried to stamp out of the human heart but could not. The populations needed to carry on these industries hav been saved to us by the passions of the uncalculating, the unreflecting, and the poor, whose simple hearts and ardent tempers could neither be extinguished for the salvation of their immortal souls nor held in check by the frigid calculations of economists. Society has been rescued by its lower, humbler, animal class from the annihilation that its higher, spiritual, ethical class would hav brought upon it—the whole sinfulness and deviltry of the world being absolutely essential to save us from depopulation at the hands of those whom the rigid pursuit of the higher ethics consigned to the barren, unproductiv virtues of poverty, chastity, and humility—the three qualities so highly calculated to send the race to the next world for lack of the means of existence in this.

And this brings us, like a ship drifting toward the breakers, upon the hidden rock of ethics, the true mystery of the moral world, the appalling fact that, while the little burglaries, thefts, larcenies, and single murders by which the ill-balanced weaklings of society end their individual wretchedness in solitary tragedies are committed by bad people, the stupendous felonies over which the ages bleed and weep, the great wars, the widespread tyrannies, the oppressions, the persecutions, the crusades, are all committed by the aggregated good people of society, by the refined nobilities, the praying devotees and saints, the holy priesthoods and churches, the righteous governments, the great armies, the large fortunes, the principalities and powers which all the world respects.

There are two principles in ethics that render this result inevitable, viz., that the commission of great wholesale crimes, of vast social enormities, requires the concurrence of so large a number of persons in the crime that none but those whom popular frenzy assumes to be the good people can hav the influence essential to leadership in such crimes. A man who was raising crops, smelting iron, or weaving wool would never hav made a leader for the Crusades. It required a Peter the Hermit, a man of prayer, to lead in so vast a crime. One or two cobblestones may occasionally be laid down toward the pavement of hell by people who are passionate, who destroy their local influence over their immediate neighbors by lewdness, profanity, selfishness, and avarice. But when hell is to be paved all over from end to end, and roofed in and weather-boarded, it must be done by prayerful and self-denying ascetics who never earned a dollar by industry, but whose lives hav been wholly devoted to making men better by prayer. The world is wholly dependent for its vast aggregated social crimes on its first-class saints, because these social crimes require extended organization, and this involves elements of leadership which command wide respect among the fools, and this kind of constituency of respect none but the pious can ever obtain. Hence, we see the Southern rebellion, a bad movement, led by Jefferson Davis, a saintly man and thorough Christian; while emancipation, a good movement, was led by Lincoln, who was neither a saint nor a Christian. The unification of Italy was led by Garibaldi, an Atheist, and the republicanization of France by Hugo and Gambetta—more Atheists. The reformation in England was led by the sensualism of Henry the Eighth, and the Christianization of Europe and the origin of the Christian Sabbath dates from Constantine, a murderous beast below the moral level of Nero or Caligula. Thus, often, the best movements are led by the impious and dissolute; the worst movements by the sanctified and prayerful.

Our great crimes also come from our good people from a second cause, viz., that, all straining after excessiv righteousness, necessarily strands the striving saint upon some excess of iniquity. In trying to get as far from nature as possible, and in asserting the depravity of nature, the would-be saint drenches his soul in the unnatural without discovering that his unnaturalness is a form of self-murder and of inhumanity to man. All the varieties of asceticism, including celibacy, self-mutilation, self-torture, fasting, stripes, renunciation of the world, the surrender of one's wealth and liberty to the church so extensivly practiced in the long night of ecclesiastical ascendancy known as the Middle Ages, persecution for producing unity of faith, and all the varieties of intellectual intimidation practiced by the holy, are independent and original forms of wickedness which only exist in connection with and as the immediate outgrowth of sincere and well-meant efforts to attain to a superior degree of holiness. There is, therefore, in human nature a law of natural ethics to the effect that all efforts to monopolize holiness in excess, to corner the market on virtue, to fix things so that all who want virtue will hav to get their supply from your particular crib or perish—all these efforts of the "unco guid" defeat themselvs by turning out only moral monstrosities.

On the other hand, the great deliverances and blessings which bloom like flowers till their sweetness clothes the moral world in fragrance, all grow upon the rank and fetid compost heaps of sin. But for our crimes, what would hav given birth to jurisprudence? And yet nobody cares to be assassinated in order that our legal friends may add another brick to the edifice of jurisprudence. But for our diseases, what would hav developed the natural sciences? And yet who cares to pine on a sick bed in order that the pilgarlics may grow wiser as to the cause of his sickness? But for our superstitious fears, who would hav studied the stars? And yet does it pay to be superstitious when the end of the superstition is the inevitable discovery that it is not in our stars, but in ourselvs, that we are underlings? But for our famins, who would hav developed luxury? And yet to see these suffer, and those riot in needless wealth, is the profoundest of all lessons in Atheism. And but for our worship, how could we hav arrived at philosophy? And yet the chief zeal of worship is to crucify philosophy.

> Who ponders national events shall find

> Joy based on sorrow, good with ill combined,
> And proud deliverance issuing out of pain
> And direful throes.

And again:

> Sometimes the arrowy sharpness of a sorrow,
> Piercing life's common calm,
> Smites hidden rocks of comfort, which to-morrow
> O'erflow in healing balm.
> 'Neath burdens that we stagger in the taking

> And bitter blows that bow almost to breaking,
> Reveal our secret strength."

The Epistle to the Romans.

Paul's epistle to the Romans is doubtless substantially genuin, but there is room for grave doubt whether it was addressed to the Romans. The caption itself is no evidence, and it is remarkable that the words "at Rome" in chapter i, verses 7 and 15, are omitted in MS G (Farrar's St. Paul, p. 450). The only other evidence to prove that the letter was addressed to the Romans is contained in chapter xv, which did not exist in Marcion's copy; and Marcion first brought the Pauline epistles to Rome about

A.D. 138. The last two chapters, xv and xvi, were wanting in Marcion's copy, nor did either Irenæus or Tertullian, who quoted frequently from the epistle, make any reference to those two chapters.

For these and other reasons the authenticity of those chapters is rejected by many able critics.

But there are further cogent reasons for believing that the body of the epistle was not addressed to the Romans.

In the first chapter, which contains the words "at Rome" twice, but which are wanting in MS G, the writer says, "Your faith is heard of in all the world.' This could not be true, if there is any truth in the account given in Acts xxviii of Paul's arrival and reception at Rome.

Eliminate this doubtful portion of chapter i, and the last two chapters, which the ablest critics hav rejected, and all the rest of the epistle might hav been addressed to the Romans.

But mark how this epistle differs from others. It is not addressed to a church like those written to the Corinthians, Galatians, and Thessalonians; nor to elders and deacons, like the epistle of Philippians. The words bishop, elder, and deacon are not used, and the word church occurs only in chapter xvi, which does not belong to the letter. And of the numerous persons saluted or commended in that last chapter, not one has ever been identified as a resident of Rome.

These and other considerations (aside from the omission of a salutation to St. Peter) hav compelled even orthodox critics to believe that the last chapter of Romans is a fragment of a letter to some other place than Rome (Farrar's St. Paul).

In chapter xv (which Marcion's copy did not contain) Paul promises a visit, and says, "I will pass by you into Spain." Hence the tradition that the apostle visited Spain also. But the writer of Acts says that Paul "hired a house at his own cost and resided in it two years, and there he received all who came to him."

So then the only tangible evidence concerning the primitiv church at Rome is to be found in the last chapter of Acts, and from that it appears that there was no church organized there when he arrived, and he was only able to bring a few Jews into his lodgings for the purpose of expounding to them his new doctrin, which, as they said, "Was not received by anyone." Nor does it appear that the little Christian society which Paul may hav organized about fifteen years B.C. made much, if any, headway for nearly a century; for when Josephus came to Rome, A.D. 62 or 63, to intercede with Nero for certain Jewish priests who had been sent to Rome in bonds by the persecutor Felix, he knew nothing of the existence in Rome or anywhere else of any Christian sect.

ANTICHRIST.

Christian Absurdities.

"Though an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."

This is a death-blow to all inquiry and investigation. Anything contrary to the New Testament brings down the curses of the church here, and consigns the one who differs to everlasting torments hereafter. The Mohammedan, the Brahman, and the believers in every other system of religion can find no escape from hell, however innocent and conscientious they may be. Is it any wonder that Martin Luther defied the pope, and quarreled with the bishops and cardinals, and left the church; that he then turned round and called on the flames of hell to devour those who dare differ from him? Is it any wonder that the world has been filled with bigots and Christian cranks when such stuff has been taken for the word of God?

"And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave to them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of diseases."

A greater lie was never uttered. Power was never given to mortal man to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of diseases, and everybody knows it. Most people die of some sickness or disease. But with such power, why should anybody die? What would a doctor's diploma amount to if such power had been given to men? For hundreds of years this was believed, and the only treatment for the sick were old relics and shrine cures, and the laying on of hands, and the people died by scores and hundreds. Epidemics were disastrously frequent, and swept off the people by the thousand. As many live now to the age of seventy as lived then to the age of forty. Such are the penalties for forcing such holy slush down the throats of the people. If Dr. Foote had lived then, and attempted to treat disease in a common sense way, it would have cost him his life. Science has triumphed. Ecclesiastics have been forced to take a back seat. The death rate has been changed from about twenty-six years to nearly forty.

"Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. Of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again."

We are first taught that we must ask even God not to lead us into temptation, and then told not to resist evil. How are we going to avoid temptation if we do not resist evil? The full meaning of this text is that if a man sue you, and by bribing the court or by false witnesses defraud you out of half your possessions, you are to hand over to him the balance. If a man steal your horses, you are to call him back and give him your cattle also. If a slugger break your nose, just encourage him to knock an eye out also. If this is God's word, who can respect him or what he has written? The fact that nobody gives heed to these commands shows that even Christians have outgrown them. God's law has been superseded by the law of common sense, and if the gods want to be respected, they must keep abreast with the times.

"And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them."

Out of a legion of devils, might not some one have sprung a net over one, or caught him in a trap, or lassoed him? What an acquisition a good, healthy, robust devil would be at the present time! I will sign over my claim to the New Jerusalem, not for a live, kicking devil, but just for a fossil. Let all who are "weary and heavy laden" gorge themselves on such ecclesiastical "offal." It may give them rest. "Let the anxious souls come up to the altar."

"They shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and in the presence of the lamb. And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night."

How does this comport with the idea of a merciful God? Think of a young child not among the elect suffering such punishment through all eternity! Who can respect a God who brings a child into existence only to damn it?

> Since it was so badly done for,
> I wonder what it was begun for.

If God knew that a certain portion of the human family would be damned, why bring them into existence at all? How long will men worship a phantom of the skies, marked by every trait of a savage?

> O thou, wha in the heavens dost dwell,
> Wha, as it pleases best thysel',
> Sends one to heaven and ten to hell,
> A' for thy glory,
> And no for any gude or ill
> They've done afore thee.

Can the human mind conceive anything that would so shame a devil as a god, possessed of all power, glorying because creatures of his own creation were writhing in eternal torment?

"Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat, or, What shall we drink, or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? Take no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself."

Yes, God is the good shepherd; he will provide for the wants of his sheep, and see that the wolves do not get away with the lambs. "Those who trust in the Lord shall not come to want." These promises are not worth a rupee; they have never been made good. Thousands have starved, and frozen, and died of disease, trusting in God, and calling upon him for help to the last. What would become of the human family if all should try to live by trusting in the Lord? There is entirely too much trust; God never pays down.

"Ask, and it shall be given you." I tell you it is a big lie. Hundreds of mothers who have seen their children die of starvation know it is a lie. All who were down upon their knees, praying for the life of Garfield, know it is the blackest kind of a lie.

"If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you."

Calling things by their right names, I score another lie against the New Testament. With a mountain of faith, I defy the Christian or anybody else to move even a grain of mustard-seed without physical force. And as for men overcoming impossibilities, faith or no faith, it is too silly to talk about. No man can annihilate space or check the flight of time. There are a hundred and one other things which man can never accomplish. Heston's cartoon is to the point. Faith will never help a man to lift himself over the fence by his boot-straps.

According to these passages of scripture—and I cannot see why Christians are not bound by them—there is not a Christian in all this broad land. Is there one Christian who can move a mountain? Is there one who can take poison, and not be hurt? Is there one who can cast out devils? When he is smitten on the one cheek, is there one who will give the offender the opportunity to bite off an ear? Is there one who will give a thief a yoke of oxen because the thief has stolen from him a team of horses? Show me a Christain who takes "no thought of the morrow," and I will show you a man who cannot tell an angel from a bluejay. Where are the Christians who can cure "all manner of diseases?"

According to these rules, there are no Christians. The truth is, Christianity is dead, and Christians are only praying around the corpse. When they are warned by the unpleasant odor, it is to be hoped that they will put the putrid carcass decently out of the way.

The New Testament is held up before the world as a moral guide, a marvel of pureness, and a model of wisdom. Over and over it has been asserted that it is the only faultless book ever written; that it is impossible to point out one erroneous passage, or find a false precept; that if all would follow its teachings there would be nothing but happiness in this world, and not a soul lost in the world to come. Such are the ideas taught to the young in regard to the New Testament, whereas, it was such a firm belief in such terrible passages as I have quoted that reduced them to actual practice, and produced the ignorance and beastiality of the dark ages. A firm belief in these hellish dogmas turned all Europe into a lazar-house for more than a thousand years.

Paying no attention to the laws of health, having no regard to cleanliness, living upon insufficient and unhealthy food, and depending upon prayers, and shrine cures, and old relics, and faith when they were sick, sent epidemics over Europe so frequently that the population did not double in a thousand years. So besottedly beastly did the believers in the New Testament precepts become, that "He stinks like a Christian," passed into an adage, even among Mussulmans.

A firm belief in these unnatural doctrines will dry up all the sweet juices of humanity, and choke out all the manhood of any people in any age or in any country.

The clergy have ever regarded the natural affections of the heart, all social pleasure, all amusements, in short, every joyous instinct, as sinful. To be happy was to be in danger. Whatever afforded comfort and joy was of the devil. To be on your knees bathed in tears, to be afflicted and in sorrow, was most pleasing to God. In short, nothing could be right which was natural.

Salvation depends not upon meritorious acts (for ministers tell us that "hell is paved with good deeds"), but upon belief in the anti-natural and supernatural. It is mainly owing to Christian teaching that the minds of men have been soured to such an extent as to make them desire to murder and torture each other.

One writer says that "the unhappiest nations of the earth are the most immoral, the most selfish, and the meanest in every ugly sense of the word."

If this be so, then the Christian countries must bear the palm for immorality, selfishness, and meanness over all other nations on the globe. For, according to all history, a more miserable condition than fell to the lot of the Christian during a period of more than a thousand years, known as the "Dark Ages," could not be imagined. Ignorant of the first rudiments of learning, ignoring every law of health, relying upon the most degrading superstitions for the cure of diseases, believing that he must afflict himself to please his God, looking upon this life as a "vale of tears" and "a scene of sorrow," believing that God looked on approvingly when he killed a man who disagreed with him in belief, starving every day, and tortured by the horrid nightmare of superstition every night, believing that the more he suffered here the happier he would be hereafter—in short, that a hell of a life on earth was the only way to escape hell after death—is it any wonder that Christian countries found no parallel for ignorance and suffering and brutality for more than a thousand years?

Mohammedanism in Central Africa.

In the Contemporary Review Joseph Thompson describes the new civilization wrought by Mohammedan influence upon the naked negroes. He says:

When I reached Central Soudan, the sights and scenes I there witnessed burst upon me like a revelation. I found myself in the heart of Africa, among undoubted negroes, but how different from the unwashed, unclad barbarians it had hitherto been my lot to meet in my travels in Africa! I could hardly believe I was not dreaming when I looked around me and found large well-built cities, many of them containing 10,000 to 30,000 inhabitants. The people themselvs, picturesquely and voluminously dressed, moved about with that self-possessed sober dignity which bespeaks the man who has a proper respect for himself. I saw on all sides the signs of an industrious community, differentiated into numerous crafts, evidence sufficient to show how far advanced they were on the road to civilization. I heard the rattle, the tinkle, and the musical clang of workers in iron, in brass, and in copper. I could see cloth being made in one place, and dyed, or sewn into gowns or other articles of dress, in other places. In the markets, crowded with eager thousands, I could see how varied were the wants of these negro people, how manifold the productions of their industry, and how keen their business instincts. Almost more remarkable than anything else, no nativ beer or spirits, nor European gin and rum, found place in their markets. Clearly there were no buyers, and therefore no sellers.

Outside the towns, again, no forest covered the land; the density of the population and its numerous requirements had made the virgin forest a thing of the past, and its place was taken by various cereals, by cotton and indigo, and other vegetable productions which minister to the inner and outer man. What could hav produced this great change?—for that a change had occurred could not be doubted. Certainly contact with Europeans had had nothing to do with it. The character of the industries, the style of art, indicated a certain amount of Moorish influence, giving them the direction which they had assumed. How had the first great steps been taken? No Moors or Arabs were to be seen among the people. No such races held the reins of government, and by their powerful influence caused the introduction of new arts and industries. Evidently, whatever had been done had been done through the free aspirations of the negroes toward higher things. I was left long in ignorance of the agency which had thus transformed numerous tribes of savages into semi-civilized nations, ruled by powerful sultans, who administered justice of a high order (for Africa), and rendered life and property safe. That agency was almost exclusivly Mohammedanism.

If such a reclamation of a whole people from barbarism had been accomplished by Christian influence, the religious press of the country would trumpet it far and wide. Every minister of the gospel holds that civilization is a positiv proof of the divine character of Christianity. Is it possible that Mohammedanism is "divine" also?

News and Notes.

In spite of the stormy weather, a good houseful greeted me on Friday evening at Waterloo, Ind., and with the aid of exhilarating music there was no lack of "dynamics." Things kept a-moving. Professor Bergman, who knows how to bring music out of every string of a violin, was once a minister, but he left the pulpit for the fiddle, and much more music and joy has he given the world since; and at seventy years is jubilant in spirit because free in thought. There is more march of human progress in the notes of a violin than in all the prayers of the clergy.

My friend Kelly, of Waterloo, criticised my "New Heaven and Earth" from the Spiritualistic point of view, but only enough to show that our difference is simply one of evidence, and not of philosophy. In fundamental conceptions of life and duty, and the real glory of humanity, there is no divergence. It is simply a question of the continuation of life, and not as to its quality, or how it can be most worthily manifested. The profound thought in regard to human destiny is identical in the Materialistic and Spiritualistic view of universal being. On the plane of actual existence there is no disagreement.

Again I had to sit up and wander through the shades of night until half-past two in order to take the train for Chicago to be in time for the brilliant Paine Anniversary that was coming off Saturday evening. It was a happy and successful gathering indeed, and the variety of entertainment was enough to keep me in courage and good spirits for the rest of my journey. About four hundred were present, and the exercises consisted of music, recitations, dramatic performance, etc. I had the honor to giv the oration of the evening in memory of our hero. The opening address was made by E. A. Stevens. Mesdames C. Izard and G. L. Baldwin gave a charming duet with an excellent instrumental accompaniment by Mr. O'Connor. Prof. J. J. Ely enchanted us with an exquisit violin solo, and Prof. H. F. Scully's humorous recitations won most hearty plaudits; and Mr. Atherton's "Behind the Scenes" mingled comedy and pathos with the skill of the trained artist. Miss Mildred Holland's happy song voiced the noble feeling, while Miss Grace Hayward's hilarious but beautiful negro melody to the lightsome tones of the banjo filled the round of gaiety with rapturous greeting. Then came the well-acted farce, "Stage Struck," by our friends, Mrs. Josephine Tarbell, Douglass E Atherton, and James Murphy, who showed the genius of comedy with grace, brightness, and dramatic life. All was merry indeed, while the flying feet kept time to the swift strains that ceased not with midnight's solemn hour. Thus with joyous heart we keep the memory of those sublime heroes who in days of suffering and peril forgot all pleasure in the dread performance of duty. Thus the glory of life is attained by being happy when we can be happy, and thus out of fleeting delight we gather power for the noblest labors, and strength for suffering.

E. A. Stevens, president of the Chicago Secular Union, is a live man, indeed, and by his efforts the society here has accomplished a marvelous amount of work considering the means at hand. There are meetings every Sunday at which lectures of the highest order on literary, scientific, and political subjects are given by the first talent in the city. From five hundred to a thousand dollars are raised every year for local expenses, besides generous contributions to the national organization. The Chicago Union sets a good example to other auxiliary associations by its subscription of fifty dollars to the fund of the American Secular Union. If all would do as well in proportion to their ability, we might hav plenty of means for aggressiv legislativ work. and the printing of documents, facts, statistics, etc., in regard to the Nine Demands, which is of the highest importance to our cause. While the lecture work is absolutely necessary for interest and enthusiasm, this work, in order to be practically successful, must be backed up by documents, official correspondence, legislativ action, etc., and this is what I hope will be achieved in the future. Mr. Stevens, as chairman of the Finance Committee, is ready to put his shoulder to the wheel, and I believe that he will do invaluable service. While I am in the lecture field all official correspondence, etc., should be sent to 750 W. Lake street, Chicago, either to my name or to Mr. Stevens. This will be my permanent address until my return. All money contributions can be sent directly to Charles Eckhard, treasurer, 28 Layfayette Place, New York. I delivered my lecture, "The New God," on Sunday evening before the Union, and his majesty was quite well handled by Mr. Long, Mr. Sawyer, Mr. Zimmerman, Mr. Simpson, General Trumbull, etc., and my ideas as to what a god should be, if we must hav one, were cordially accepted.

I hav had pleasant meeting with friends while here, and can go westward with brighter hope than ever. Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, M. S. Card, Miss Stella Campbell, A. C. Berg, W. J. Horne, Mr. and Mrs. Brainard, Mrs. Josephine Tarbell, Douglass Atherton, E. S. McComas, Charles J. Sundell, Dr. Clavinger, Dr. E. S. McLeod, one of our stanchest supporters and always ready to lend a hand; Wm. Zimmerman, Olaf Olsen Ray, who has translated all of Ingersoll's works into the Scandinavian language; Frank Smead, Mr. C. A. Frankel, and others whose names are legion, I guess, are allies who bate no jot of heart or hope for freedom and humanity.

I was pleased to meet a good friend, Mr. Richardson, of Oshkosh, Wis., who came nearly two hundred miles on purpose to attend the festival occasion; also Mr. Wm. C. Howard, of Valo, Ill.

Mr. James B. Stoddard, of Ogden, Utah, one of my right-hand men in my last year's campaign in that country, gave me an unexpected grasp of the hand. and I was glad to meet so brave and strong a comrade. He is now lecturing with marked success on "Mormonism vs. Americanism." He is a good thinker and eloquent speaker, and understands his subject thoroughly, and is dealing some sturdy blows against this oriental despotism into which he was born, and whose shackles he has felt.

I am now at the delightful home of Mr. A. D. O'Neill, a vigorous Freethinker, out of the fold of the Catholic Church, one of the pioneer citizens of Chicago, and who has done his share in building up its metropolitan splendor. His wife and daughter are still Christians, but of so generous a spirit that if all were like them I should feel disposed to put my armor down. The Golden Rule would surely prevail. The fireside is comfortable here, and all is like a stream of delight, and mind and body receive ample supply for the toilsome journey before me up and down the mountain hights and the shores of the restless ocean. Mr. O'Neill has one of the finest bird collections in the city, which he himself made by his skill as hunter and taxidermist. Very few men are better posted than our friend in the natural history of birds, deer, etc., and his beautiful museum, so life-like in appearance, is a treasure for those who delight in nature's infinit variety, with its resplendent colors and curious forms.

To-morrow I again set my face westward, with the sincere hope that no cyclones or blizzards may cross my path as I traverse the plains of Kansas to the snowy summits of the Rocky hills. I lecture at Fort Madison, Iowa, Feb. 5th and 6th; Belton, Mo. Feb. 8th; Bavaria, Kan., Feb. 9th and 10th; Salina, Kan., Feb. 11th, 12th, and 13th; Brookville, Feb. 14th and 15th. I hope to be at Haven, Kan., Feb. 17th, and at Windom, Kan., Feb. 18th. I shall be at Dodge City, Kan., Feb. 20th, and at Garden City, Feb. 21st and 22d.

I shall perhaps be at Greeley, Colorado, Sunday, Feb. 27th, but the date is not certain. I shall be at Longmont, March 2d; at Denver, March 6th and 13th. I hope to lecture at Boulder City, Central City, and other places while in Colorado, but arrangements are not yet perfected. I expect to be in San Diego, California, March 16th and 17th; at Los Angeles, March 20th and 27th; at Santa Ana between these dates; at Tulare about March 30th and 31st; at San Francisco and Oakland the first two Sundays in April; at San Jose, Sonoma, and other places in California as arrangements can be made until June. In June I expect to be in Oregon; in July in Washington Territory, and then turn Eastward by way of Baker City, Boise City, Butte City, Salt Lake City, etc. If the field keeps opening before me as it has since I left New York, I do not know when I shall see that city again. However, the more there is to do the better, and we will keep on the harness until the Christmas turkey begins to doff its feather; then, I guess, we will take a good square meal in Gotham.

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 3, 1887. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

The man with the badge-pin has been officially apprised that if he does any more such reporting in the future as he has done in the immediate past, he will not be welcome to the regular meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club, but, on the contrary, will be hung up on the outer wall of the building. As the weather just now is rather cold, this is not a pleasant prospect, but it is better than no prospect at all.

The 443d meeting of the club was addressed by Dr. R. G. Eccles, of Brooklyn, and attended by a good audience. The lady secretary was back at her post, and sold THE TRUTH SEEKER and Henry George's Standard in about equal numbers. After the secretary had read the minutes of the previous meeting, Mr. Wakeman told about his trip to Boston, and the way Uncle Horace Seaver accepted the cane made from wood that grew over the grave of Paine, and which the Liberal Club had forwarded by its president to the Nestor of Liberalism. The cane was supplied with a silver ring bearing this inscription:

Horace Seaver. From Thomas Paine's Grave. Presented by New York friends Jan. 29, 1887, Paine's 150th birthday.

Mr. Wakeman said it was worth a trip to Boston to witness the venerable editor's delight at the gift and the fraternal spirit which prompted it, and to hear his eloquent words of thanks and appreciation. In the Investigator Mr. Seaver says:.

The kind donors will please accept our fraternal thanks, and the assurance that the historical cane will be carefully preserved in the stronghold of the Paine Memorial.

After these preliminary matters, the Chair introduced Dr. Eccles, who would speak upon "Evolution Illustrated by a Flower." The lecture was illustrated by colored charts. Dr. Eccles produced a small moth-shaped orchid which he passed around through the audience. It looked much like a little butterfly, but was in fact a plant. Dr. Eccles afterward explained why it was of that shape. It depended, he said, on the butterfly or moth to carry its pollen dust from one plant to another. Unless the moth performed this office, the orchid must die. The moth, on the other hand, was in the habit of screening itself beneath the orchid for protection from the birds which would otherwise make a meal of it. In hiding, the moth selected orchids that most resembled itself, so as to deceive the birds, and in return for the protection thus afforded, the moth fertilized the plant. Plants which, owing to dissimilarity, the moth did not patronize would perish, and thus the moth-like orchid survives. Many other plants depended upon insects like bees to carry the fertilizing pollen from one to another, and the wind performs the same office, as in scattering the tassels of corn upon the silk. There are few self-fertilizing plants, and these are of the most degraded character. Nature has erected a barrier against such a process, and the fertilizing point of a blosson is nearly always located in a spot inaccessible to its own pollen. Dr. Eccles said that the man who put it down in the sciptures that flowers toiled not, made a mistake. They had to struggle for their existence, and use all sorts of devices to protect and perpetuate themselvs. They hav their likes and dislikes, their favorits and amours. The doctor pointed out that the medicin which we extract from some plants exists there evidently to protect the plant against the very disease which it is designed to cure in ourselvs. We get quinine from the bark of the cinchona-tree, which grows mainly in malarial districts. The cinchona-tree is also found in non-malarial districts, but in such cases its bark contains no quinine. Dr. Eccles very appropriately closed his lecture with following lines, adding to the rhyme of the poet the beauty of his voice:

Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies;
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.

The audience applauded the speaker long and heartily at the close of his remarks. The lecture had been both interesting and instructiv. The doctor avoided technical terms as much as possible, but when it became necessary to giv the Latin names of plants, he showed himself equal to the occasion, and wrestled with polysyllabic terms without extra effort.

The Chair invited discussion of the lecture in speeches of ten minutes each, members of the club having preference. Members did not respond with their usual alacrity. The subject required special knowledge of botany, and the speakers at the club are more inclined to generalize on great questions than to go into details Dr. Eccles is known to be an anti-Socialist, and Herr Oppenheimer was inclined to regard the lecture as a covert attack upon the theories of Karl Marx, but as he wasn't sure on this point he refrained from criticism.

Dr. Leverson made a plea for the introduction of botany and other natural sciences in our schools. Nothing could develop the powers of analysis like the study of practical botany. This should be taught the young in place of the present word grinding called botany, and the teaching of lies called grammar.

Nobody wanted the floor when Dr. Leverson retired, but the audience was interested in the subject and waited patiently. The Chair, therefore, made some brief remarks. Mr. Wakeman regretted that teachers had rarely been found who could make the subject of botany interesting. Dr. Eccles had shown how that could be done. Mr. Wakeman objected, however, to the expression "the barrier of nature." The idea was a mythological one. The objection to self-fertilization of plants was a chemical one, not sentimental. The stigma and pollen of one plant were so much alike that they could not fructify each other. Mr. Wakeman again complimented Dr. Eccles on his avoidance of technical and other hard words, and recommended that others should follow his example. Mr. Wakeman then proceeded to a development of his theory of plant life, in the course of which he used the words exogeny, osmosis, exosmosis, cellular genesis, and capillary interfusion.

There was no one to continue the discussion, and Dr. Eccles closed the debate. He had not used the words nature's barrier in a mythological or theological sense. He did not believe that the ruler of the universe used design or accomplished things by manual dexterity. He used "barrier of nature" as a short phrase to express what others expressed with a great number of large words.

This was one of the most interesting meetings the club has had, and the audience were nearly unanimous in indorsing the Chair's request that the doctor would prepare and deliver a similar lecture on the development of animal life.

At the next meeting Col. A. H. H. Dawson, of Kentucky, speaks on "Capital Punishment for Women and Men," when the case of Mrs. Druse will doubtless be considered.

Some Aspects of the Druse Case.

The argument that judicial proceeding are too fallacious to warrant decisions upon which human life or death shall depend has a strong exemplification in the Druse case. The record in this case contains fourteen solid consecutiv pages narrativ of neglect, cruelty, and foul and abusiv outrage endured by this wretched woman from her husband for twenty years. This culminated in a blow, immediately preceding his murder and provocativ of it, which he dealt his wife with such violence that her eye was closed for over a week. Three witnesses testify to the effect of this: 1. Mary: "After father struck her she acted as though she was crazy. She acted like a wild person. Her eyes looked wild. She talked very fast. She acted different than I ever saw her before." 2. Gates: "She was excited. She appeared just like a crazy person." 3. George: "She looked wild. She was frightened." Apart from this evidence the atrocious details of the crime are enough to suggest to any thoughtful person serious doubts of the mental integrity of the murderess. The shooting in the presence of witnesses, in the family circle, all the children assisting, indicates a very peculiar psychic condition. No sane woman would do such a thing without great provocation, and the provocation shown, taken in connection with twenty years of outrage, and the fact that Mrs. Druse had reached a critical period of life (about forty-five years of age*), was certainly suffi cient to produce insanity. The manner of the disposal of the body was preëminently the act of an insane woman. With the testimony of the children superadded, all the evidence points directly to an unsound mental condition of the defendant, and it is a reproach to the administration of justice that this woman has exhausted all her legal remedies, and been finally sentenced to be hanged, and that up to this time no intelligent investigation has been made, nor even attempted, into the question of her mental and moral responsibility. This woman was poor; and lacking means to adequately prepare a defense, which requires great elaboration and expense, and which is at all times unpopular and difficult of explanation to the average juryman, her counsel, in the exercise of their best discretion, thought it prudent to forego a defense which, when incompletely presented, surely works disaster, and resolved to rest upon other grounds.

The counsel in the case cannot fairly be censured for this. Their position was a difficult one. Overwhelmed by a morbid prejudice which pervaded the whole community and clamored for a victim, their skill was of little avail, without the fairness which we hav a right to expect in a court. But these reasons should hav been urged upon the application for commutation of sentence, and it was the duty of the judge whose attention had been called to these facts to save this woman from death, or at least to make some ef fort to ascertain her true condition. The old law books tell us that it is the duty of the judge to protect the rights of the prisoner to the uttermost, but we hav drifted far away from this principle, and it seems to be now considered quite a feather in the cap of a judge if he can by any means procure a conviction.

There are other features in which this case was grossly unfair, yet this judge is reported as saying that he is "aware of no reason why an application for commutation of sentence should be granted." If a trial is a search after the truth of a matter, the most important part of this trial has been omitted, namely, the inquiry into the sanity of Mrs. Druse, and until it is proven beyond all question that she was morally responsible for her acts, it will not be well for the state to proceed to extremes in her case. The safeguards of life and liberty are already too few, and the people will resent the unwarrantable and wanton taking of life upon such superficial judicial proceedings. The governor has been badly advised in this matter, and a reconsideration is in order. If this woman is hung, the shame and indignation of the people will find vent in such an expression as this state has not heard for many a day. To prevent this the wisest of our statesmen should intelligently interest themselvs.

The Anathema Maran-atha.

The following, taken from the Philadelphia Morning Post, is the everlasting curse of the Roman Catholic church against Victor Emanuel, king of Italy. It is the perfection of scientific swearing, and if the curses hav the desired effect, it is certain that the king of Italy is now very uncomfortable:

By authority of the Almighty God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and of the Holy Canons, and of the undefiled Virgin Mary, mother and nurse of our Savior, and of the celestial virtues, angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, powers, cherubims, and seraphims; and of all the holy patriarchs and prophets; and of all the apostles and evangelists; and of the holy innocents, who, in the sight of the Holy Lamb, are found worthy to sing the new song; and of the holy martyrs and holy confessors, and of the holy virgins, and of all the saints, together with all the holy and elect of God, we excommunicate and anathematize him, and from the threshold of the holy church of God Almighty we sequester him, that he may be tormented in eternal excruciating sufferings, together with Dathan and Abiram, and those who say to the Lord God, "Depart from us; we desire none of Thy Ways." And as fire is quenched with water, so let the light of him be put out forevermore. May the Son who suffered for us curse him. May the Father who created man curse him. May the Holy Ghost which was given to us in our baptism curse him. May the Holy Cross which Christ, for our salvation triumphing over his enemies, ascended, curse him. May the Holy and eternal Virgin Mary, mother of God, curse him. May St. Michael, the advocate of holy souls, curse him. May all the angels and archangels, principalities and powers, and all the heavenly armies, curse him. May St. John, the precursor, and St. Peter, and St. Paul, and St. John the Baptist, and St. Andrew, all other Christ's apostles together curse him, and may the rest of his disciples and four Evangelists, who, by their preaching converted the universal world—and may the holy and wonderful company of martyrs and confessors, who by their holy work are found pleading to God Almighty—curse him. May the Choir of the Holy Virgins, who, for the honor of Christ hav despised the things of this world, damn him. May all the saints who from the beginning of the world and everlasting ages are found to be beloved of God, damn him. May the heavens, and the earth, and all things remaining therein, damn him.

May he be damned wherever he may be; whether in the house or in the field, whether in the highway or the byway, whether in the wood, or the water, or whether in the church May he be cursed in living and dying, in eating and drinking, in fasting and thirsting, in slumbering and sleeping, in watching or walking, in standing or sitting, in lying down or waking, mingendo, cancando, and in blood-letting. May he be cursed in all the faculties of his body. May he be cursed inwardly and outwardly. May he be cursed in his hair. May he be cursed in his brains. May he be cursed in the crown of his head and in his temples. In his forehead and in his ears. In his eyebrows and in his cheeks. In his jawbones and in his nostrils. In his foreteeth and in his grinders. In his lips and in his throat. In his shoulders and in his wrists. In his arms, his hands, and in his fingers. May he be damned in his mouth, in his breast, in his heart, and in all the viscera of his body. May he be damned in his veins and in his groin; in his thighs and genital organs; in his hips and in his knees; in his legs, feet, and toe nails.

May he be cursed in all the joints and articulations of his body. From the top of his head to the sole of his foot may there be no soundness in him.

May the Son of the living God, with all the glory of His Majesty, curse him, and may Heaven, with all the powers that move therein, rise up against him—curse and damn him! Amen. So let it be! Amen.

A Fable for the Times.

One Cold Day in the latter part of January, 1887, a plainly-dressed but Intellectual looking Individual walked up the marble steps of a building in which a Religious Paper was published, and inquired of the slave in attendance if he could direct him to the Editorial Sanctum. The slave ushered the stranger into the presence of a small and bald-headed man, who had just picked up a pair of Shears with which to write an Editorial Article. The baldheaded man asked what he desired, and the stranger explained as follows:

"My name is Historical Accuracy. I hav worked for several years as Assistant Editor on an Infidel Paper, and although the atmosphere was congenial, and my efforts appreciated by both the Editor and the Readers of the paper, yet, owing to the prevalence of Religious Prejudice, the circulation of my writings has not been greatly extended, and the Salary is not large. I hav called to say that I would accept a position upon your valuable and widely read journal if you should happen to hav a Vacancy."

"Sir," said the Editor of the Religious Paper to the stranger who had given his name as Historical Accuracy, "you hav called at the Wrong Number. We hav no use for you here. Do you think we want to ruin our Business? Begone at once;" and the Editor reached for a large and dangerous looking Club.

"Yes, sire," replied the stranger, "I see that I hav committed an Error. I will go immediately, as you suggest."

As he turned to depart, he observed near the door an expensivly dressed and evidently prosperous Person, who was writing very fast with a Gold Pen. He inquired of the slave who this luxurious individual might be, and was told in reply that he was the Religious Liar of the Establishment. Above the desk at which the rapid writer sat was the legend:

JANUARY 29TH. THIS IS MY BUSY DAY.

As the scribe paused to consult the last year's file of the paper of even date, the stranger made bold to ask to what subject he was now turning his Intellectual Forces. The Religious Liar replied that he was re-writing the Annual Slanders concerning the Life and Death of Thomas Paine.

"I hav just written," said he, "that Paine lived a cowardly and beastly Life, and died a cowardly and beastly Death."

"But," said he who was called Historical Accuracy, "the statement is a cowardly and beastly Lie."

"I am aware of that Fact," responded the Religious Liar, "but our Readers are not, and you should remember that Lying is what I get big Money for."

"So I should judge," said the stranger; "and when you hav exhausted your repertoire upon this subject, to what will you next turn your Attention?"

"It will be my next duty to record that Robert G. Ingersoll has been converted, and will never again write or speak against Christianity. I shall also Casually Observe that during his residence in New Mexico he was in the habit of Stealing Sheep."

"That again," replied the stranger, "is an adult falsehood. It seems to me that your Zeal is more robust than your Discretion. Mr. Ingersoll is alive, and will be able to refute your Assertion. Why do you not wait until he is dead? You can then lie about him without so much fear of Successful Contradiction."

"Because," said the Religious Liar, "Mr. Ingersoll may liv longer than myself. I am troubled with Dyspepsia and a Disordered Liver, while, in spite of the divine assurance that the wicked will not liv out half their days, the Colonel seems to be enjoying a tolerable degree of Health. Should I sin away the hour of grace and neglect to falsify his character while I tarry here, I might miss the reward which will be paid in heaven to those who lie for the glory of God. I must therefore improve the shining hour and get in my work."

"Well," Historical Accuracy answered him, "you are indeed a precious rascal. To sheol with you and your paper!" and he advanced toward the Door.

"Out of my sight!" thundered the Religious Liar, taking down a blunderbuss, which he pointed at the visitor.

"Yes," said Historical Accuracy; "I will return to the Infidel Publisher. Better a small Salary and a clear Conscience there than Luxury in a Den of Thieves who steal men's reputations. But remember," he observed as he closed the door, "one day I shall return and Knock you Out."

ON January 30th C. B Reynolds lectured before the Ansonia, Conn., Secular Union. He had a good audience and a lively discussion with some local Christians, of which he has written an entertaining account for next week's TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Reynolds says: "Now, that I am free till May from the bigots of New Jersey, I should be glad to discuss with a New England divine. Meantime I hav some calls West—engaged for Kent, Ohio, February 26th, 27th, and 28th. Will friends between here and there, and in that vicinity, desiring lectures write me at once to 33 Clinton Place, New York?"

A DEEPLY religious journal of this city learns with grief of the publication of Sunday-school cards by the proprietors of a patent medicin with the consent and knowledge of a certain Methodist superintendent and pastor. The cards are for distribution in New Hampshire. On one side of the card is printed the Lord's Prayer. On the other side, pictures of the two Edens; from the trees of one garden monkeys hang suspended by their tails; underneath is the statement: "These are the ancestors of Darwin and Huxley." Among the trees of the other garden are two figures representing Adam and Eve. Beneath is a statement, "These are the ancestors of ——." Then the name is given of the proprietor of a certain quack medicin. Accompanying the same is the statement: "These cards are to be distributed in the Sabbath-schools, so as to secure uniformity in repeating the Lord's Prayer in concert. Sent out by a Methodist superintendent, Rev. Mr. ——, pastor."

FRIENDS from various parts of the country hav sent us the story of an alleged blasphemer's punishment by an alleged angry God. The affair is said to hav happened at Douglas, Ga. William Burklett is the alleged victim. He is said to hav been a profane man, and on one occasion exclaimed, "I hope that God will paralyze me," when at once "his hands dropped to his side, his legs refused to move, and his eyes rolled wildly around. His prayer was answered, and he stood paralyzed on the spot where, but a few moments before, he was a magnificent type of physical manhood. He tried to speak, but his tongue would not move. Half a dozen men who were present were rendered motionless by the evident visitation of the hand of God." All this is, of course, a lie. But we hav grown tired of chasing down the liars in these cases, and do not propose to take any trouble in the matter. Only fellows like Talmage will believe these stories, and until he earns that thousand dollars we offered him, we shall let him and his like hav all the fun they can get out of these ghost stories.

"THE Bible theory is not that man is by evolution the descendant of a monkey, or any other inferior form of organized life, but the product of divine power by a special act in the creation of Adam and Eve. Such is clearly the meaning of the record as given in the book of Genesis. The truth of this record is distinctly recognized in the New Testament. The church of God, resting its faith on what the Bible so clearly teaches, has in all ages adopted this view, and is not likely to abandon it for any other view. The view abundantly accounts for the existence of the race of men on this globe, and is far simpler in its character, as well as much surer in the evidence supporting it, than the speculation of evolution from a lower order of animals. We say speculation, for no one will pretend that evolution, as applied to the origin of man, is actually a demonstrated truth. It is almost wholly a mere guess in the name of science: and being opposed to the word of God, it ought to be rejected." These are not the words of John Jasper, but of a journal which advertises itself, not without reason, as "the largest, the ablest, and the best religious and literary weekly" of the country. But if the Independent is the best, what must the worst be!

After Eighteen Christian Centuries.

A SERMON.

There is a good deal to attract our attention in the words of Paul to the Galatians:

Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting (chap. vi., 7, 8).

Adam, Cain, and David all lied to God, and "a pretty how dee do" they hav made by their deceptions. Jacob killed a kid, and went and lied to his father. His ten sons killed a kid, and went and lied to him. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Jacob sowed the wind and reaped the cyclone. He did not sow wheat and reap tares; he sowed tares, and he reaped tares till he could not rest. Now, my friends, the Bible of the Christian peoples makes its first man prominent as a liar to God, and a defamer of woman to our race; its second man killed his brother and lied about it; and David, "a man after God's own heart," murdered Captain Uriah, and took Mrs. Uriah to himself; and all through our peoples' sad, horrid, awful story of wrongs and crimes, of gory gloriousness, and of glorious goriousness, liars and defamers, murderers and seducers, hav been the leading characters; right has given way to might, honest worth to cunning trickery, light to darkness, virtue to crime, truth to error, kindness to savagism. During all the ages of recorded time, in the midst of the creations of man, whether in Egypt, where all was grandeur, or in Greece, where beauty led art, every act has been to produce and to possess. There has not been any attempt to refine and to elevate the individual; physical force, not moral character, has been made the stepping-stone to so-called civilization, and as the peoples of the earth hav sown, so hav they reaped. Their ways and means of advancement hav been lies, thefts, murders, deceptions, wrongs, wars, and their harvests hav been and are prolific. In the blood of their youth and beauty it is written: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption."

In the United States, where "peace" is the order of the day, it is estimated that four per cent of all our labor is used to erect fortifications, to make gunpowder, bullets, cannon-balls, etc.; four per cent of our efforts are given to organize destructiv measures. This is bad enough, God knows! But look at the standing armies of Europe and Asia—at the millions of men training for destruction; think of the thousand millions of dollars yearly worse than wasted to support these mad, wild, criminal policies. Wars hav been the principal seed sown by the church and state, and the harvest never fails; dead men, ruined lives, wasted time, desolated homes, attest the truth of the text: "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

The Nation's correspondent at Vienna, alleges that the European coalition against Russia has been concluded, and even givs the details of the joint action as fully decided upon. The allies are England, Austria, Hungary, Italy, and Germany. If Russia should declare war, the plan of action is for Austria to occupy the south of Hungary and Servia, the English and Austrian fleets to occupy the Black sea, while Germany makes ready a half a million of men to watch the Polish frontier, and to come to the rescue in case of an Austrian defeat. If Turkey should join the coalition, her integrity will be guaranteed, and cost of her armaments will be paid, but if Turkey joins Russia or attempts to close the Bosphorus, the Balkan states and Greece will be supported by an Austrian army from Bosnia in sweeping Turkey out of Europe. If France joins Russia, a million of Germans will cross the frontier, and 200,000 Italians will watch the Alps. The reward of Italy will be the restoration of Nice and Savoy. The correspondent declares that so confident are the members of the coalition that the only fear is that the Czar will retreat instead of advancing. The whole influence of the Roman Catholic church is said to be employed on the side of the coalition.*

What a picture this is for the wife, mother, sister, and father to look upon! What a condition of affairs this is for husband, son, and brother! And yet, while all of Europe and half of Asia are engaged night and day drilling and accumulating for battle, to the neglect of every decent calling, our editors hav such headings to their European cablegrams as, "The Russian Bear is About to Dance!" Well! The same heartlessness is shown by some of our leading dailies in their announcements that they hope that the Chicagoans will make short work of the Anarchists, and that they hav their headlines already set in big type, "Seven Up," and that they do not wish to hav so good an editorial spoiled. This spirit exemplifies the text, "For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption."

* The Press, Philadelphia, Jan. 10, 1887: "All Europe arming.—A prominent diplomatist givs his views of the situation.—A terrible war threatening.—Russia building railroads; England massing troops and building ships; France, Austria, and Italy bristling with weapons; Turkey concentrating troops; Europe one vast arsenal."

Take the New York Sun for a month, and the chances are that on an average one column per day will not giv space sufficient to cover a brief notice of the murders, fratricides, suicides, homicides, arsons, stealings, etc., which run riot through the length and breadth of our land. During the decade just passed, there was an increase, in the United States, of eightfold over the idiocy of the decade just before. "In no period of our history," says the Indianapolis News, "has wealth centralized so rapidly in the hands of non-producers as during the past ten years in the United States. Every millionaire makes a thousand paupers and five hundred imbecil idiots, lunatics, and criminals. Millionaires are flourishing like gourds: the delinquent classes increase like June flies; and the politicians put another coat of kalsomine on the whited sepulcher of party, and the minister of God, who ought to apply the cauterizing iron to the social ulcer, prays for the heathen." Is it to be wondered at, in the face of the facts which stare us out of countenance in every direction, that in Niles, Mich., a man should hav inscribed upon his wife's tomb the following?—

The more saints, the more hypocrits;
The more peace, the more plenty;
The more priests, the more poverty;
The more religion, the more lying.

This is an odd epitaph—odd because it is true. When a truth is spoken, even in the presence of the dead, it is questioned. It may be that the editor who published this item lied. The merchant, lawyer, banker, minister, liv by lying; by their deceptions, trickeries, and robberies do they all thrive and grow fat; and the editors hav to follow to keep in fashion and in funds. We do not stop to censure the individuals. They are so besotted in self craft, so custom-bound and minister-driven, that ninety-nine hundredths of them do not for a moment think that they are not engaged in the most honorable of callings; but for the institutions, be they republican or be they monarchical, which permit such a state of things to exist, our contempt has no language to express itself.

"When a man in New York," says a recent observer, "shows a disposition to be honest, he is set down to be a stranger." During eleven months in 1886 there hav been fifteen hundred strikes in New York city. Never was labor so crowded. Its mutterings are heard in every district of the United States. How much longer do our incorporated classes think they may steal, pillage, and misuse? One hundred thousand little children are driven to the mills of Massachusetts every day—driven by necessity, by a force more exacting, more cruel, than the lash of the planter was when slavery was most black with its horrors. What education will these children hav when they become women and men? Under the enforced idleness of machinery and low wages, is it to be wondered at that Boston should be said to hav more prostitutes than any other city of equal population in the United States? Why do not the blue-bloods of Beacon Hill deny such statements as these when their statisticians publish them? The New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children during the last twelve years has convicted 8,545 persons and rescued 15,812 children. In the last six years it has had to care for and clothe 3,338 destitute children and furnish them with 27,100 meals. Do wild animals, even, in rearing their young, leave them so dependent upon other animals? Is instinct better than intelligence?

A traveler recently from a trip through the interior of Russia writes that the civilization of Moscow reminded him of "some wild Indian chief who in his old age puts on a pair of epaulets or a high hat—it simply emphasizes savagery;" and it might be said of us Americans that we, in our youth, hav heaped almost as much misery upon our laboring people as Russia has after many years of continuous wars and peaceful tyrannies.

And now let us turn for an instant to that hypocritical set of Christian pirates over across the water:

A singular and significant exhibit of the march of immorality in the United Kingdom of Great Britain is made in a recent number of the Pall Mall Gazette by means of a series of diagrams, in which the record of twenty odd years is placed before the eye in one glance, and it is not a record which can be contemplated by churchmen or philanthropists without sadness. Since 1861 the apprehensions for drunkenness, and on charges of "drunk and disorderly," which were reported in that year at 82,196 in England and Wales, hav steadily increased until in 1884 they numbered 198,274. Had the increase only kept pace with the growth of the population the figures for 1884 should hav been about 105,000, so that the rapid stride made by this kind of offenses against law and decency is palpably due to a lowering of the moral character of the community. As bearing on the same general subject, and as presenting an astounding condition of affairs, the figures of the nation's drink bill are even more significant. In 1861 the citizens of the United Kingdom paid for drinks nearly £95,000,000, or $475,000,000. They should hav paid in 1876, according to the ratio of the increase of population, about £107,000,000, but they did pay the astonishing sum of nearly £148,000,000. Some hope for the temperance people may be gathered from the fact that the bill since 1876 has decreased to £125,000,000 in 1883, but this will be regarded as cold comfort when it is considered that the natural increase according to population should hav made the sum paid for liquors in that year but about £107,000,000.

The record of the divorce courts shows also the steady demoralization of her majesty's subjects. In 1861 but 263 petitions for divorce were filed in England and Wales. In 1884 the number had risen to 703, though the normal increase, according to population, should hav brought it up to only 340. With the growth of immorality the passion for self-destruction has also grown naturally, and while but 1,533 attempts at suicide, successful and unsuccessful, were reported in 1861, the number had swollen to 3,212 in 1884. The census of idiots, lunatics, and persons of unsound mind showed 76,765 such unfortunates in 1883, against 39,647 in 1861.

In crimes of a repulsiv nature, which show their perpetrators to be wholly devoid of moral principle, the increase in the last twenty years, especially in London and the larger cities, has been startling in the extreme, but it is not necessary to specify these classes of offenses more particularly. The drunkenness, pauperism, and idiocy to be found in the United Kingdom are indications that the morality of the people is declining rapidly. The church and the philanthropists may wisely ask themselvs whether it is not expedient to begin mission work at home, and spend some of the money which is now used for Christianizing the heathen in reforming the outcasts of society who pass under their own eyes daily.

And here is an extract published within a few days in the San Francisco Chronicle:

On all hands it is agreed that never has greater distress prevailed in London than at present. It is not only among the unskilled, but the suffering extends to the skilled working class, and there seems to be no prospect of employment for them in the coming winter. Foremen who hav been in constant employment in the same firm for fifteen or twenty years hav been turned off, owing to bad times, during the past few weeks. By the river side and in the vicinity of the docks the crowds of unemployed are daily growing greater. Hunger and want hav driven them almost to desperation. If some steps are not taken to relieve the distress the consequences during the coming months are likely to be terrible in every sense of the word. All the thousands who are now sleeping in the open air will be driven to seek shelter when the cold weather sets in, and the workhouses and charitable institutions which are available are totally inadequate in number. The Socialist leaders are taking advantage of all this distress to press for the adoption of several measures, one of which, at least, is worthy of special mention. It is that one free meal a day in the local board schools be granted to all children who desire to partake of it. It appears from a report published by the Daily Telegraph that over thirty per cent of the children who compulsorily attended school last winter were there without having any food.

Well may Spurgeon hold up his hands and pray, as it is reported he lately did, and end in these words: "O Lord, shut the mouths of the blasphemous, especially those pretending to be preachers of the gospel, and who are yet blasphemous! Turn their hearts that they may know thy truth and be able to preach in favor of it."

And now let us spend three minutes in modern Italy and glance at the result of sowing wars, superstitions, and deceptions:

In the November North American Review Ouida says that "whatever may be the opinion of Europe as to the political advantages accruing to it from the independence of Italy, it must be mournfully confessed that the losses to art and to history through it are greater than any which could hav been caused by centuries of neglect or long years of hostil occupation and devastating war. It is scarcely to be measured, indeed, what these losses are, so immense are they in their extent, so incessant in their exercise, so terrible in their irreparable infamy. No doubt it could never be foreseen, never be imagined, by those who brought about and permitted the consolidation of Italy into one kingdom, that the people, nominally free, would become the abject slaves of a municipal despotism and of a barbarous civic greed. None of the enthusiasts for Italian independence possessed that power of foresight which would hav told them that its issue would be the daily destruction by hordes of foreign workmen of its treasures of art, and its landmarks of history. Yet there is no exaggeration in saying that there is nothing less than this.

"Italy cannot be narrowed to the petty bounds of a kingdom created yesterday; she has been the mistress of all art, the muse and priestess of all peoples. What are the Italians doing with her? It is sickening to note and to record. Nothing can ever giv back to the world what, day by day, municipal councilors having houses to sell, syndicates and companies merely looking for spoliation and speculation, contractors who seize on land as a trooper seizes on a girl in a sacked town, are all taking from the fairest and most ancient cities and towns on earth.

"I wholly fail to account, on any philosophic or psychological grounds, for the utter deadness of soul which has come upon the the Italians as a nation. Born with loveliness of all kinds, natural and architectural, around them, the esthetic sense should be as instinctiv in them as their movements of limbs or lungs. Instead of this it is entirely gone out of them. They hav no feeling for color or sense of symmetry, and little or no sense of reverence for the greatness and the gloriousness of the past."

Of Rome, Ouida says: "The leaders of an invading and victorious army would hav been ashamed to cause the havoc and the blasphemy which the Roman municipality hav carried out with shameless callousness; the indignant voice of Europe would hav bidden a Suwarrow, a Napoleon, a Constable de Bourbon stay his hand had he dared to level with the dust the august monuments of which neither the majesty nor the memories hav power to daunt the impious hand of the nineteenth century Edilizia."

The Italians themselvs are "insensible to the horror of their work, just as they are unconscious why yellow, blue, and green chairs on a red carpet offend a delicate taste. To whitewash frescoed walls, to make old monasteries look brand new, to scrub aad peel and skin sculptured marbles, to daub over beautiful arches and columns and cloisters with tempera painting, mechanically reproduced in one set pattern over and over again, over miles of stucco, to outrage the past and vulgarize the present, to respect nothing, to set the glaring seal of a despotic and bourgeois administration over all which ages hav made lovely and reverent—all this they think an admirable and hygienic work, while they let human excrement be strewn broadcast over the fields and emptied into the streets at midday under a boiling heat, and set the guards of their rivers to drive out with blows of the scabbard the poor children who would fain splash and bathe in them under canicular suns. The excuse of hygiene is only the parrot cry which covers the passion for iconoclasm and destruction. To make their own interessi while the moment lasts is the only desire at the heart of all these civic councilors and engineers, architects and contractors, house-owners and speculators. To petty personal purposes and selfish personal profits everything is sacrificed by the innumerable assessari, consiglieri, and sindaci by whom Italy is regarded as the Turkish pashas regarded the Egyptian fellah.

"Could Dante come to life, no curse that he ever breathed upon his countrymen would be one-half so fierce and deep as that with which he would devote the Italian of the close of the nineteenth century to the vengeance of the offended gods. But Dante's self would say his curses to deaf ears, wadded close with the wool of vanity and greed."

THE MORAL.—"For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption."

This means, if it means anything, that selfishness, selfcraft, and competition are seeds which, if planted and fostered, will eventually break "the law and the prophets," and crush out every particle of manhood and womanhood under any form of government possible to be practiced. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

"But he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." This commands us to act one his part toward the other, to forget self in the common interest which each has in making the incorporated commonwealth worthy of its trust; to cooperate so that the weak and needy can hav the instruction and the assistance of the strong and talented; and to become interdependent to the end that the able and experienced may be advanced to and retained in those positions for which they are best fitted.

Sowing to the flesh means catering to one's animalism; it means brute force; it means savagism.

Sowing to the spirit means the cultivation of man's better nature; it means equity, interdependence, love.

Chaplain Photius Fisk.

I hav often queried in my own mind whether or not the readers of the Liberal papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, etc., hav any idea of this man, Photius Fisk, and how much we are all indebted to him for his generous help whenever the call is made for money for any worthy object. If a meeting of the Secular Society is called, and aid is solicited to pay expenses, you will always see, or almost always, opposit his name, ten dollars given. Is a Liberal sick, or aged, or without means of support, you may, if you inquire, find that a monthly donation from this same man is sent "to keep the wolf from the door." Thus much I know, as I hav seen the subjects of his charity, and more than once found them quite near home.

Does some one wish to put in print something that the Liberals ought to know, Mr. Fisk's purse is opened, and a donation made for that cause. I know a woman who worked hard in the Antislavery times for the slave, and who is now in the South, teaching among the freed people, who finds her work much lighter from her acquaintance with this generous man; and these freed people, for whom her daily work is done, are always remembered with barrels of food once at least every year. Does some one of the old Abolitionists die, who suffered torture and imprisonment at the hands of the slaveholder, like Captain Jonathan Walker (he of the "branded hand"), Mr. Fisk originates and pays for an appropriate monument, sends it to the burial-place, and has it placed upon the grave. I do not know how many stones he has thus erected—I know of three. I think he has paid for a thousand dollars' worth of shares in the Paine Memorial building in Boston, and a munificent donation of valuable pictures, gathered from many parts of the world, are already occupying the walls of some of the rooms of "Paine Hall." But all this does not tell my readers who this remarkable man is.

I hav before me a Missionary Herald of 1822, given me by Mr. Fisk himself while I was making him a short visit the past summer. I asked him to tell me something about himself, and he gave me this book, in which I find that he is a nativ Greek, by name Photius Ravasales; that he is the only one of his family that escaped death in Smyrna from the plague which ravaged the country in 1814, father, mother, two brothers, and two sisters falling victims. His age is a disputed matter, one writer making him, in 1822, twelve or thirteen, another sixteen. His uncle, who had him in charge, says he was born in Hydra.

This Missionary Herald has a report of a conversation with this young Greek boy in reference to his being sent to America, from which I copy the following: "When I asked him," says the writer, "if he would like to go to America, his eyes sparkled with joy. I asked him why he wished to go. He replied, 'To learn.' 'How long are you willing to remain?' 'Till I am learned.' I named several branches, and asked if he could learn all those. He answered modestly, 'Quanto posso (As much as I can).'" The writer adds, "The boy speaks Maltese and reads and speaks Greek and Italian." This account is taken from a letter dated, "Malta, Oct. 12, 1822," and signed, "Pliny Fisk." It seems Mr. Fisk gave his name to the young lad, perhaps thinking he would be a great acquisition to the cause of the missionaries. He was put under the care of the Rev. Mr. Cornelius, of Salem, Mass. So much I take from the Herald.

I believe Mr. Fisk was first sent to a mission school in Cornwall, Conn., and afterward to New Haven, and finally to Amherst, Mass., to the academy which today is a college. Mr. Fisk was not pleased with the strictness of the rules at these several places, and failing to keep them he was sent back to Malta. He then concluded to be his own master, worked his way back, educated himself, was converted to Presbyterian Congregationalism, ordained a clergyman of that order, and for a time preached in Vermont. Mr. Parker Pillsbury, in a short sketch which I find in the pamphlet, "The Man With the Branded Hand," says: "The severities of the winters in a place so far north as Vermont proved to be too much for his constitution, he being of a race born, and for many generations living, under so much more indulgent skies. He soon became unable to discharge the many duties and responsibilities of a minister, especially so far north as Vermont." Mr. Pillsbury also says Mr. Fisk was too much of an Abolitionist to be tolerated in an American pulpit.

In 1842 Mr. Fisk obtained, or rather received, the appointment of chaplain in the United States Navy, which he still holds, though retired from activ service. On my table is a photograph of Chaplain Fisk, taken in Malta some years ago. I am often asked whom the picture represents, but before I can answer comes from the person asking, the declaration, "What a benevolent face! He must be a good man;" all of which is true. Mr. Fisk was on the other continent when the great fires which destroyed so much in Chicago and Boston occurred. He immediately telegraphed to Wendell Phillips, who had charge of his funds, "Do as I would do." This good man was never married, and having no family he seems to hav adopted as his own all the poor, and especially the oppressed, whom he can reach. He has great pity for orphan children, as he "remembers that he was kicked about as a football, or showed off in some church like a monkey, to raise missionary funds."

I hav written what I know of Chaplain Fisk, but I hav no doubt that he is more remarkable in what I do not know than what I do. He seems to follow the scriptural injunctions, "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them;" "Let not your left hand know what your right hand doeth." I hav never met a more pronounced Liberal than is this man of whom I am writing. He has very little patience with anything "namby pamby," but is thoroughly outspoken and candid.

Worth Reading.

We think the following is a good thing, indeed. It appears that Chicago's mayor closed up Jerry Monroe's saloon. Some Freethinking man, who could and would look on both sides, wrote his honor the following letter, which we find in the Chicago Times of the 8th of January, 1887. We commend it—let it be read—as showing how people are thinking, and, what is important, what intellectual men are saying.

SLO HYCUM.

Lincoln, Ill.

NO. 3,000 MICHIGAN AVENUE.—HON. CARTER H. HARRISON, Mayor of the city of Chicago: It is reported upon the authority of this morning's papers that your honor has deprived a citizen of a political office upon a religious ground. If this be true I desire to enter my protest. First, because it is in plain violation of the highest law of this state; second, because it is in violation of every principle of justice, and last, because it is in violation of common sense. I claim that a man who sells rum is a man holding a political office, because he has to be licensed as much as does an attorney, who is an officer of court, or a minister, who is an officer to perform marriages. The man who in the name of the city is licensed to make drunkards is compelled to pay enormous taxes. The man who is licensed to make lunatics receives enormous fees, but pays no taxes. I submit that the man who pays large taxes for the privilege of making drunkards can't hav his license revoked and his place closed under the pretense of a morality which is defined by a religious sentiment rather than by the plain provisions of the laws, while the place of the man who makes lunatics is allowed to be open on all days of the week, all hours of the day, and whose place, according to the uncontradicted statement of Rev. D. L. Moody, is infested with unfailing regularity every Sabbath with the presence of the devil—a place which is notoriously infested at all times with the vociferators of lies, where the public press charges that bribers of councils, legislatures and judges, wreckers of railways, and defaulters are constantly in the regular habit of assembling, and places where the pockets of the poor are constantly picked by holding hell and damnation before their eyes as the highwayman holds his dagger and revolver before the eyes of his victim. Nor is this done, your honor, by the sneaks who sit in the pews, but by the man who stands in the pulpit; and it is a matter of regret that Mr. Moody has not made himself more certain, at least to a certain intent in general, as to whether the devil, when he enters the church, does not make straight for the pulpit. I ask your honor either to restore Jerry Monroe's license or else, in the same name as that in which you closed his place, to close the churches. I ask it in the name of the just and equal protection of the law. I ask it in the name of a taxpayer, who is not only called upon to support drunkards and religious lunatics alike, which may be done under law, but who is called upon indirectly, if not directly, to support churches, which he cannot be called upon to do in any such name. I do not know Jerry Monroe. I was never in his place. I do not know any man, woman, or child, to my knowledge, who ever did go there. I am no way related to him by blood or marriage, no wise professionally, or in any capacity his agent or attorney, nor by any of these ways with the owner of his place, or any person who ever visited it. I am not an officeholder. I hav no political ax to grind, no favor to curry with religion. I am a citizen; a large taxpayer, hav children of my own, and only ask to be allowed to liv in a society where every man shall be guaranteed the just and equal protection of the law, and not subject to the clamor of cranks, who preach temperance and religion in one or two directions while at the same moment are themselvs the most intemperate and immoral in all others. I hav been your honor's political well-wisher. I never stood up to defend any man, except when it seemed that all others had forsaken him and fled, and then only because I felt that then was the moment in which might most fittingly be remembered the cause for which Socrates and Jesus died—the truth. I trust your honor dares to be just and fear not. Yours, ——.

Pius IX.'s Blessing Upon the Confederacy.

From the Chicago Daily News.

At the treasury department the other day, Mr. Crites, of Nebraska, the chief of the division of captured and abandoned property, unearthed a time-worn paper which was found among the records captured at the time of the evacuation of Richmond that will settle the controversy forever. It has lain all this time in the pigeon-holes of the department, unknown and unnoticed, while the historians and theologians hav been disputing its existence. Attached to it is the following letter of transmittal:

BRUSSELS, May 9, 1864.—To the President: Herewith I hav the honor to transmit the letter which his holiness Pope Pius IX. addressed to your excellency on the 3d of December last. Mr. W. Jefferson Buchanan has obligingly undertaken its conveyance, and will deliver it to you in the person. This letter will grace the archives of the executiv office in all coming time. It will liv, too, forever in story as the production of the first potentate who formally recognized your official position, and accorded to one of the diplomatic representativs of the confederate states an audience in an established court palace, like that of St. James and the Tuilleries. I hav the honor to be, with the most distinguished consideration, your excellency's obedient servant,

A. DUDLEY MANN.

To His Excellency, Jefferson Davis, President C. S. A., Richmond.

The letter of the pope is written upon parchment in the quaint, ecclesiastical style, in Latin, of course, and is addressed as follows: "Illustre et Honorabile Viro Jefferson Davis, Præsidi Fœdoratarum Americæ Regionum, Richmond." The following is a translation of the text:

Illustrious and Honorable Sir—Health: We hav received with fitting kindness the gentlemen sent by your excellency to deliver us your letters bearing date of the 23d of September last. We certainly experienced no small pleasure when we learned from the same gentlemen and the letters of your excellency with what emotions of joy and gratitude toward us you were affected, illustrious and honorable sir, when you were first made acquainted with our letters to that reverend brother, John, archbishop of New York, and John, archbishop of New Orleans, written on the 18th of October last, in which we again and again urged and exhorted the same reverend brethren that, as behooved their distinguished piety and their episcopal charge, they should most zealously use every effort in our name and also bring an end to the fatal civil war that had arisen in these regions, and that these people of America might at length attain mutual peace and concord, and be reunited in mutual charity. And very grateful was it to us, illustrious and honorable sir, to perceive that you and these people were animated with the same feelings of peace and tranquillity which we so earnestly inculcated in the letters mentioned as having been addressed to the aforesaid reverend brethren. And would that other people also of these regions, and their rulers, seriously consider how grievous and mournful a thing is intestin war—would be pleased with tranquil minds to embrace and enter upon counsels of peace.

We, indeed, shall not cease with the most fervent prayers to beseech God, the omnipotent and all good, to pour out the spirit of Christian charity and peace upon all the people of America, and deliver them from the evils, so great, with which they are afflicted. And of the most merciful Lord of compassion himself we likewise pray that he may illumin your excellency with the light of his grace, and conjoin you in perfect love with ourself.

Given at Rome at St. Peter's, Dec. 3, in the year 1863, and of our pontificate the eighteenth. PIUS, P. P., IX.

The Revised Creed.

The following creed is being circulated among Congregationalists by the American Board. The additions to the old creed are: The first paragraph entire; in the third the words "according to the deeds done in the body" ("entered into paradise" substituted for "descended into hell"); in the final paragraph, "The Holy Scriptures," "The new spiritual birth," "The final separation of the righteous and the wicked," and the word "death" in the final clause. "Holy Catholic Church" is changed into "Holy Church Universal," and "Resurrection of the body" into "Resurrection of the dead."

I BELIEVE.

In One God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost;

In the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth;

And in Jesus Christ His only Son our Lord; Who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, Born of the Virgin Mary; Suffered under Pontius Pilate, Was crucified, dead and buried; He entered into Paradise, the third day he rose from the dead; He ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty; From thence he shall come to judge, according to the things done in the body, the living and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Ghost; The Holy Scriptures; The Holy Church Universal; The Communion of saints; The new spiritual birth; The Forgivness of sins; The Resurrection of the dead; The Final Separation of the Righteous and Wicked; And the Life and Death Everlasting. Amen.

WE advise every man, woman, and child to get Col. R. G. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," to read it and to hold sacred every word of the grand philosophical truths contained in the greatest of all sermons.—Beacon Light.

The Catholic Quarrel.

The congregation of St. Stephen's is weakening in its boycott of the new priest, and is slowly resuming the superstitious services of the Catholic church. This is a result which needed no prescient eye to predict.

But Dr. McGlynn seems not afraid of the sword of tyranny nor of the bull of the pope. If his ecclesiastical head is to come off, he will not make the work of the executioner easier by bending to the blow. In the Standard of the 5th inst. he talks back to Archbishop Corrigan in a manner that must surprise the church authorities, long accustomed to abject submission on the part of their tools. He denies that he ever retracted his theory of land tenure, and only promised to abstain from making speeches because he "knew too well the power of his ecclesiastical superiors." He calls the famous Cincinnati pastoral —in which Bishop Cleveland denied the right of the people to sovereign equality, contended that God's vicegerents are above state officials, and that allegiance is owed to God before country—an infamous letter. He reminds Archbishop Corrigan that he has before this executed political errands at the archbishop's request—such as traveling to Washington to advance the promotion of John Newton—and denies that bishop, propaganda, or pope has any right to punish him for the part he played in the canvass of the Labor candidate for mayor. To Cardinal Simeoni's threat that if he failed to go to Rome the cardinal would be placed under "the painful necessity of having recourse to measures and of adopting provisions which surely would be unpleasant for him," Dr. McGlynn says that it would hav had more weight had not the unpleasant measures been already resorted to. He closes with this defiance of the whole hierarchy:

"I deny the right of bishop. propaganda, or pope to order me to Rome. The 'vow of obedience' of the priest, of which so many absurd things hav been said within the past few weeks, is simply a promis to obey the church authorities in matters concerning the priest's duties of religion. It were monstrous to imagin that this promis has not clear and well-defined limitations. My obligation, taken as a student of the propaganda, was not, as some seem to imagin, to go wherever and to do whatever that institution should see fit to command, but simply to return to my nativ place and there devote myself to the ministry of religion. In an interview published in the World during the late municipal canvass I took occasion, from Mgr. Preston's political letter, to admonish him and other ecclesiastical dignitaries of the grave danger of repeating the folly and the shame of condemning scientific truth as religious heresy, a shame and folly of which their predecessors had been guilty in the condemnation of Galileo and Copernicus. It seems that they are fated to repeat this crime and blunder, and to add another to the many reasons that hav made men look upon ecclesiastical authority as one of the greatest foes of scientific progress, of national development, and of rational liberty, and in large part a hindrance rather than a help in the way of bringing to the whole world the light, the purity, and the comfort that come from the teachings and the ministrations of Christ."

That this fight will weaken the power and influence of the Roman Catholic church in this country there can be no doubt. Though Dr. McGlynn's congregation does go back, its submission to the priests will not be quite as abject as before the row. A second occurrence of the kind would strain the bond of union until with some individuals it would snap. And it is needless to say that every individual who leaves the Roman Catholic church is a benefactor of his kind.

The 29th of January.

The 29th of January is a remarkable day. Annually on that date the Freethinkers of the country meet in their various town to celebrate the birth of Thomas Paine. This year such meetings were more numerous than ever, reaching from Canada to California, from Wisconsin to Texas. And they were good meetings, too; large, enthusiastic demonstrations of people determined to set right the falsifications of Christian historians.

It is not the action of the Freethinkers, however, that makes the day remarkable.

On the Sunday following the 29th of January, about eighty thousand, more or less, useless preachers get up on their hind legs behind their pulpits, and bray about the individual honored by the Freethinkers. From the miraculous performer of Brooklyn to the most insignificant rider of a Methodist circuit, are heard these sounds: "Tom Paine drank a quart of rum a day! Tom Paine ran off from England with a friend's wife! Tom Paine recanted!" With variations according to the skill of the brayer.

It is remarkable that the 29th of January should drive some eighty thousand men insane. Were Christ about, we should say he had selected another animal, with longer ears, into which to drive his devils.

Methodist Color Prejudice.

Before the Abolition movement in this country, the Methodist church tacitly reprobated the practice of its members in keeping slaves. John Wesley was particularly severe upon Methodist slave-holders. But the church never inaugurated a movement for abolishing slavery, its remonstrance being confined to a few words in its rules and "Disciplin." When Garrison and his friends began their agitation along in the '20's, Methodists opposed them in every way, and during the existence of the Liberator, the activ period of Abolitionism, the Methodist church was a most obstinate foe of the colored people. In 1844 the church divided on the question of slavery, but it was sixteen years before the church became a very powerful ally of the antislavery people—that is, when the war was upon us, and the problem as good as settled.

In 1864, the war being nearly over, and the slaves free, the church organized a Freedmen's Aid Society, "to advance the cause of education in the South, and especially to promote the mental and moral improvement of the freedmen." In 1880 the ignorance of the white population demanded attention, and the Freedmen's Aid Society was instructed to appropriate a portion of its funds to the education of the "white folks." Under this instruction schools were organized in different parts of the South, and the university at Chattanooga, Tenn., was established.

Right here began the trouble. The colored people complained of being excluded from "white" schools, and reproached the Methodists for their bigotry. The General Conference of 1884 took hold of the matter, and on May 28th adopted this resolution:

"Resolved. That this General Conference dcclares the policy of the Methodist Episcopal church to be that no member of any society within the church shall be excluded from public worship in any and every edifice of the denomination, and no student shall be excluded from instruction in any and every school under the supervision of the church, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

This ought to hav settled the quarrel, but it did not. Though the university at Chattanooga had been established for the education of the whites, under this resolution colored students could not be excluded. But when recently two young negroes applied for admission, the management refused their application solely because of their color. This refusal has aroused the color prejudices of the Methodists, and Methodist opinion is again divided upon the negro problem. While all Methodists now agree that the negro can be saved by the power of Christ, a large proportion of them are equally certain that it must be accomplished by separate schools and churches. They are willing to associate with gentlemen and ladies of color in the next world, but not here.

In considering this question, and pronouncing what the world will accept as the opinion of the Methodist Episcopal church, the official organ takes as a starting-point the assertion that the Methodist church has in all time been "fixed in its antislavery principles," and has steadfastly maintained an attitude consistent with these principles. This is so misleading that it may be well to rebuke the arrogance of the organ by quoting a few of the earlier declarations of the church.

In 1836, before the division of the Methodist church, and while the Abolitionists were vigorously spreading their principles, the General Conference of the Methodist church was held in Cincinnati. An antislavery society had been formed there a year or two previous. On the 12th of May, the Rev. S. G. Roszell presented in the conference the following preamble and resolutions:

"WHEREAS, Great excitement has pervaded this country on the subject of modern Abolitionism, which is reported to hav been increased in this city recently by the unjustifiable conduct of two members of the General Conference in lecturing upon, and in favor of, that agitating topic; and whereas, such a course on the part of any of its members is calculated to bring upon this body the suspicion and distrust of the community, and misrepresent its sentiments in regard to the point at issue; and whereas, in this aspect of the case, a due regard for its own character, as well as a just concern for the interests of the church confided to its care, demand a full, decided, and unequivocal expression of the views of the General Conference in the premises. Therefore,

"1. Resolved, by the delegates of the Annual Conferences in General Conference assembled, That they disapprove in the most unqualified sense, the conduct of the two members of the General Conference who are reported to hav lectured in this city recently upon, and in favor of, modern Abolitionism.

"2. Resolved, by the delegates of the Annual Conferences in General Conference assêmbled, That they are decidedly opposed to modern Abolitionism, and wholly disclaim any right, wish, or intention to interfere in the civil and political relation between master and slave as it exists in the slave-holding states of this Union."

The preamble and resolutions were adopted, the first resolution by 122 to 11, the last by 120 to 14. At this conference an address was received from the Wesleyan Methodists of England, pointing out the duty of the church in the conflict between freedom and slavery. As the English Wesleyans held that slavery is antichristian, the conference refused to publish the address.

In the pastoral address to the churches occur these passages:

"It cannot be unknown to you that the question of slavery in the United States, by the constitutional compact which binds us together as a nation, is left to be regulated by the several state legislatures themselvs, and thereby is put beyond the control of the general government as well as that of all ecclesiastical bodies, it being manifest that in the slave-holding states themselvs the entire responsibility of its existence or non-existence rests with those state legislatures. . . . . These facts, which are only mentioned here as a reason for the friendly admonition which we wish to giv you, constrain us as your pas ors, who are called to watch over your souls as they must giv account, to exhort you to abstain from all abolition movements and associations, and to refrain from patronizing any of their publications," etc. . . . "From every view of the subject which we hav been able to take, and from the most calm and dispassionate survey of the whole ground, we hav come to the conclusion that the only safe, scriptural, and prudent way for us, both as ministers and people, to take is, wholly to refrain from this agitating subject," etc.

The temper exhibited by the General Conference, says James G. Birney, from whose pamphlet we are quoting, was warmly sympathized in by many of the local conferences, not only in the slave states, but in the free. The Ohio annual conference had a short time before resolved:

"1. That we deeply regret the proceedings of the Abolitionists and Antislavery societies in the free states, and the consequent excitement produced thereby in the slave states; that we, as a conference, disclaim all connection and coöperation with or belief in the same; and that we hereby recommend to our junior preachers, local brethren, and private members within our bounds to abstain from any connection with them, or participation of their acts in the premises whatever.

"2. That these brethren and citizens of the North who resist the abolition movements with firmness and moderation are the true friends of the church, to the slaves of the South, and to the Constitution of our common country," etc.

And the New York Annual Conference, held the very next month (June, 1836), resolved:

"1. That this conference fully concur in the advice of the late General Conference, as expressed in their Pastoral Address.

"2. That we disapprove of the members of this conference patronizing or in any way giving countenance to a paper called Zion's Watchman, because, in our opinion, it tends to disturb the peace and harmony of the body by sowing dissensions in the church.

"3. That although we could not condemn any man or withhold our suffrages from him on account of his opinions merely in reference to the subject of abolitionism, yet we are decidedly of the opinion that none ought to be elected to the office of a deacon or elder in our church unless he giv a pledge to the conference that he will refrain from agitating the church with discussions on this subject, and the more especially as the one promises 'reverently to obey them to whom the charge and government over him is committed, following with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions;' and the other, with equal solemnity, promises to 'maintain and set forward, as much as lieth in him, quietness, peace, and love among all Christian people, and especially among them that are, or shall be, committed to his charge.'"

Two years after (1838), when the late La Roy Sunderland, whom all our readers know—a man of extraordinary ability—had established his Zion's Watchman in this city, the New York conference again resolved:

"As the sense of this conference, that any of its members or probationers, who shall patronize Zion's Watchman, either by writing in commendation of its character, by circulating it, recommending it to our people, or procuring subscribers, or by collecting or remitting moneys, shall be deemed guilty of indiscretion, and dealt with accordingly."

In commenting upon these resolutions, Mr. Birney said:

"The preachers—judging by the vote on the anti-abolition resolutions—were expected, of course, to conform to the advice in the pastoral address. The New York Conference, the most influential, set the example of exacting a pledge from the candidates for orders that they would not agitate the subject of slavery in their congregations. The official newspapers of the connection would, of course, be silent. Therefore, as a measure for wholly excluding the slavery question from the church, it was of the last importance that Zion's Watchman, an *un*official paper, and earnest in the antislavery cause, should be prevented from circulating among the members."

The Hon. James G. Birney was driven from Kentucky because he liberated his slaves, and was mobbed and robbed time and again for his antislavery principles, many church officials, says Parker Pillsbury, sanctifying by their presence and approval the shameful outrages. Anti-abolition meetings were held in Cincinnati, where Mr. Birney was, and one committee appointed to draft resolutions contained thirteen men who were members of Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Wesleyan Methodist, Swedenborgian, and Unitarian churches. In 1840 the General Conference adopted this resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient and unjustifiable for any preacher to permit colored persons to giv testimony against white persons, in any state where they are denied that privilege by law."

This resolution deprived some eighty thousand colored Methodists of their rights.

The separation of the Methodist church into the "Methodist Episcopal church," and the "Methodist Episcopal church South," occurred in 1844. This very separation, says Parker Pillsbury, revealed more clearly the depravity it was designed to conceal. Some Northern Methodist ministers called the division a secession of the North from the South. Others said the separation was on the line between the free and the slave states. This was false, for the Northern division contained some four thousand slaveholders and thirty thousand slaves. In 1846, two years after the separation, the Baltimore conference (Northern) passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this Conference disclaims having any fellowship with abolitionism. On the contrary, while it is determined to maintain its well-known and long-established position, by keeping the traveling preachers composing its own body free from slavery, it is also determined not to hold connection with any ecclesiastical body that shall make nonslaveholding a condition of membership in the church; but to stand by and maintain the disciplin as it is."

And the next Rhode Island Conference passed this:

"Resolved, by the Providence Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in Conference assembled, That while we regret certain allusions in the resolutions of the late Baltimore Conference, we nevertheless consider the position assumed by that body in relation to slavery, especially as defined in its Pastoral Address, as exceedingly judicious, and the best for the church and the slave possible under existing circumstances."

The extracts below Parker Pillsbury quotes from the "Address of the Philadelphia Annual Conference to the Societies under its care within the bounds of the Northampton and Accomac circuits." We quote it at length, that it may be intelligible to readers unfamiliar with the machinery of Methodism, as showing indisputably that the church authorities mere not Abolitionists:

"Whereas, the Disciplin says, 'Virginia Conference shall be bounded on the east by Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean;' and 'Philadelphia Conference shall include the Eastern Shore of Maryland and Virginia'—the Chesapeake Bay, an arm of the ocean, being between them, therefore resolved, That in our administration we will regard the 'Eastern Shore of Maryland and Virginia' as not being 'border' work in the sense of the 'Plan of Separation.'

"We cannot, therefore, but regard all the Methodist Societies within the Peninsula as under our pastoral jurisdiction, according to the provisions of the plan of separation.

"If the plan of separation givs us the pastoral care of you, it remains to inquire whether we hav done anything as a Conference, or as men, to forfeit your confidence and affection. We are not advised that, even in the great excitement which has distressed you for some months past, any one has impeached our moral conduct, or charged us with unsoundness of doctrin, or corruption, or tyranny in the administration of disciplin. But we learn that the simple cause of the unhappy excitement among you is, that some suspect us, or affect to suspect us, of being Abolitionists. Yet, no particular act of the Conference, or any particular member thereof, is adduced, as the ground of the erroneous and injurious suspicion. We would ask you, brethren, whether the conduct of our ministry among you for sixty years past ought not to be sufficient to protect us from this charge. Whether the question we hav been accustomed for a few years past to put to candidates for admission among us, namely, Are you an Abolitionist? and without each one answered in the negativ he was not received, ought not to protect us from the charge. Whether the action of the last Conference on this particular matter ought not to satisfy any fair and candid mind that we are not, and do not desire to be, Abolitionists. . . . We cannot see how we can be regarded as Abolitionists without the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church South being considered in the same light. . .

"Wishing you all heavenly benedictions, we are, dear brethren, yours in Christ Jesus,

"J. P. DURBIN,
"J. KENNADAY,
"IGNATIUS T. COOPER, } Com.
"WILLIAM H. GILDER,
"JOSEPH CASTLE,

"Wilmington, Del., April 7, 1847."

In the same year (1846) that the Baltimore Conference disfellowshiped Abolitionists, the following questions were asked candidates for ordination in the Methodist ministry:

"The Rev. Mr. Quigley proposed that each candidate should be asked whether he was a slave-holder; and whether he was engaged in any of the modern improvements of promoting the abolition of slavery; and none dissenting, the question was severally asked as follows:

"Bishop Hedding—'Are you a slave-holder?'

"To which all answered. 'No.'

"Bishop Hedding—'Glory to God! not one of their souls is stained with the blood of Africa.'

"Bishop Hedding—'Are you an Abolitionist?'

"To which all answered 'No.'

"Bishop Hedding—'Thank God! there is none of them willing to cut off the heads of our Southern brethren because they happen to hold slaves.'"

Upon this duplicity Parker Pillsbury exclaims: "This, then, is the boasted division between the Northern and Southern Methodist church!! And this the opposition of the former to slavery. Grosser fraud and falsehood was never known! The ministry who practice it should receive the unmingled execrations of the universe."

It will be difficult, in the face of all this, for the Methodist organ to maintain that the Methodist church has been a consistent antislavery teacher. The church North was finally forced to condemn slavery by something more than a few empty words in the Disciplin, but no one even pretends that the Methodists South ever became Abolitionists or favored freeing the slaves from any sentiment inculcated by the church or derived from the Bible. The force of circumstances, not the teachings of Christianity, made theoretical Abolitionists of Northern Methodists, and practical Abolitionists of their white brethren in the South.

But now that the war is over, the slave is free, and twenty years hav passed on their healing wings, it seems that the Methodists do not love the negro. He is welcome nowhere, except as a servant, or as a preacher to people of his own color. The white Christian South will hav the negro in neither school nor church; the white Christian North holds his nose when his colored brother enters the sanctuary.

It is true that as a matter of principle, and holding to the letter of the decree of the 1884 conference, the Methodist organ admits that colored students hav a right to enter the Chattanooga university. But their desire to enter is put down as an intrusion, and a snub is administered to them on the ground of expediency. Churches South and North, for the sake of "asserting a principle," hav been known by the editor to invite colored people to their services, and on such occasions hav treated them with great honor—but no negroes were seen there afterward. And the application of the colored students to the Chattanooga university is, says the organ, to be regretted. They should hav been persuaded not to raise the issue; and the conduct of the management of the Boston Conservatory of Music, who persuaded colored students to leave that institution, is quoted approvingly.

It appears, then, to be the opinion of the Methodist church that while the letter of race-equality must be strictly observed, it may be broken, to good advantage and the glory of the Lord, in the spirit. The holy church may not officially make a law that colored people shall not enter her institutions upon an equality with whites, for that would bring upon the holy church the condemnation of the sinful world, but the officers of such institutions may rightly and expediently persuade the negroes to go elsewhere. "Of course," they say to the applicant, "if you insist upon remaining, you can; but, on the whole, you will be happier elsewhere." In this way the general conference maintains the public reputation of the church, and the managers and students of the colleges are spared the disagreeable presence of negroes. The ingenuity displayed in this is worthy of the source.

A Jumble of Questions.

Our esteemed friend, ex Soldier John P. Guild, calls the following "kindly queries:"

"NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, VA., Jan. 26th.

"MR. EDITOR: Can you tell me—

"1. If Lincoln did publish a pamphlet in his younger days against Bibleism; and, if so, is there not a copy to be had from which to reprint it?

"2. If Henry George is the agent of Landlord God, and John Swinton is his lackey, in what principle do they differ from tomfooling popery?

"3. If the Liberal Club is not a laughing club, is it not worthy of serious reporting, or is ridicule the most befitting way to stimulate Secular talent?

"4. Whether intellectual freedom should be politically guaranteed to the extent of protecting your neighbor in burning down your house or poisoning your family?

"5. If, as the Catholic Review (Jan. 22d) observes, it was a serious mistake to array the Catholic (?) church against the working men, who is to be charged with the blame—the priest who tried to help the toiler, the pope who bounced the priest, or the printer who chronicled the event?

"6. Why Secularists cannot afford to pay for their literature as well as the pietists?

"7. What has become of the Liberal, Mo., University?

"JOHN P. GUILD."

1. Mr. Lincoln wrote, but did not publish, a pamphlet against the Christian religion. The story told by "Zoa Topsis," in our Letter from Friends, in last week's issue, is substantially correct, we believe.

2. Henry George's idea seems to be to transfer the land to a landlord who can never come around to collect the rent. It's a great scheme. John Swinton goes with Henry George so far as George's ingenious plan makes for Socialism, which is Mr. Swinton's Utopia. It is believed that there exists just now an intellectual coolness between these two eminent revolutionists.

3. The Liberal Club is reported by its assistant secretary in his official capacity, and in his most serious vein. That the reports please the members of the club we hav been often assured; that they please our readers the readers themselvs hav assured every one who peruses these columns. The reports are stimulating to Secular talent, because many speakers hav taken the platform just to read in the reports what wonderful things they said.

4. This is an absurd question. Burning houses and poisoning families are not intellectual efforts. The man who cannot perceive the distinction between freedom of the intellect and freedom to injure others needs a small dictionary. A very small one indeed would instruct him amazingly.

5. Respectfully referred to the next ecumenical council, if composed of the same men who decreed the infallibility of the pope. Only intellects like theirs can answer it satisfactorily.

6. Secularists can afford to pay for their literature; if they cannot, they should not purchase. But as the chief organ of the Methodist church trusts its subscribers only three weeks, we judge that Infidels pay about as promptly as the pietists.

7. Mr. M. D. Leahy, of Liberal, Mo., is the proper person to write to concerning the Freethought University. As the Liberal has suspended again, we hav no information concerning the institution.

We extend to Mr. Guild the assurance of our fraternal regard.

Letters from Friends.

LACONIA, N. H., Jan. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am very well pleased with the paper, and do not want it stopped. Put in some red-hot shot to the enemy. They need something to wake them up. I do a little once in a while; hav not much time, but whenever I hav a chance I go for them. I hope all subscribers will pay up, so as to lighten your heart, and cheer you in the work.

I inclose $5 for two years, and hope you will hav two years of good success. GEO. BUCKLEY.

NEW GLASGOW, N. S., Jan. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised that any person should make such absurd charges against you as those made by Mr. J. M. Jamison. I am sure that you expressed your opinion in such a plain manner that no person could misunderstand you, unless very anxious to do so. I wish to say that I think much more of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the part you took in the matter, and if this was not one of the most orthodox places in the world I would get some subscribers for the paper. Yours truly, F. M. BORDEN.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am afraid that the proposed bill against the hanging of women will act prejudicially (if carried through) against the efforts of those who are trying to obtain for woman her rights. And probably the enemies of woman's rights will not be slow to see the point. The bill does verily declare the inferiority of woman as a responsible being, and I am astonished at the obtuseness of some writers who hav been simply and blindly carried away with sentimentality. In this great fight mere sentimentality will not do much for us. Yours for liberty, DRUID.

SMITHVILLE SOUTH, Jan. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to say a few words about the pamphlet entitled "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," by L. R. Smith. My friend Mr. E. Hyatt and myself hav distributed about five dozen copies in and about our section of the country. To tell the truth, to talk reason and common sense in an orthodox community, is, to me, like throwing a club in a hornet's nest. I want to wake up their paralyzed brains to a proper state of cultivation, and I know of nothing better calculated to do it than Smith's pamphlet. I want to circulate it throughout the land. Liberals, will you lend a hand? C. N. S.

HEBER CITY, Jan 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal-note for one dollar to pay for three more months of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been a constant subscriber for eight years, and as long as the paper is conducted as it has been I do not see how I could do without it. I was more than pleased in regard to the stand you took in the trial of the Anarchists, not that I indorse their teachings, but I like to see fair play. The cartoons are splendid, every one of them; and if I was able I would giv five dollars toward defraying the extra cost they make. Wishing all connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER a long, happy, and useful life, I remain

Your friend, ANDREW LINDSAY.

GREENWOOD, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3. to pay for the best paper in the world another year. If I were a good writer, I would make some suggestions that I think would help us along in our good work of freeing people from superstition. The women seem to be the most devoted to supernatuaralism of any class we hav. I know men that are quite Liberal in their views, yet would not dare take THE TRUTH SEEKER in their house to read on account of the storm it would produce. Now, can't we, by flattery, get on the right side of them some way and get them to read it? Once get the ice broken, they are all right. R. L. ALVORD.

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to see that Mr. George has defied the Catholic and all other churches. He must see now that it is very little use to advocate any reforms for the elevation of the workingman until he gets them beyond the control of priestcraft. Let him now place himself beside Colonel Ingersoll and batter down the gates of superstition. There can be but little done toward the emancipation of the race from the evils of monopoly, and all the other evils by which it is robbed of its rights, until the influence of religious bigotry is torn up by the roots. J. DOWNES.

[Mr. Downes givs Mr. George too much credit. Mr. George has not defied the church. He castigates the officers of the church for administering consistently the principles and disciplin of the church. That is, Mr. George is angry with the tiger for tearing its enemies.—ED. T. S.]

KENT, O., Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Putnam has been with us, and his inspiring eloquence has filled us with new life. January 10th, 11th, and 12th he lectured before the Secular Society to appreciativ audiences. His lectures hav vivified the indifferent, aroused the lethargic, enthused the workers, cheered the despondent, and put new thoughts and aims into the minds of all. His first lecture, "The New Heaven and Earth," lifted the veil of myth and misunderstanding from the minds of many and gave them a glimpse of the grandeur and glory of Freethought and the consequent exalted life of the race to come. His second lecture, "Universal Mental Liberty" was, if possible, grander in its conceptions than the first, and thrilled the hearts and charmed the minds of his fine audience. He who hears him once desires to hear him again, consequently his audience the third night was larger than either of the others. He took for his subject, "The Glory of Infidelity," and showed that to the Infidel Christianity is indebted for its polish, respectability, and life. He edified and enlightened the seekers after truth. His peroration the first night, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" held his hearers spellbound. His presentation of the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union won friends for the cause and showed their justness. His coming will aid us in raising THE TRUTH SEEKER club to one hundred names, and add to the interest in and membership of our library. In furtherance of the project to make our club one hundred, find inclosed our fifty-fifth subscription for your paper and its cartoons.

MARIUS HEIGHTON,
Sec. Kent Secular Society.

CARLISLE, IOWA, Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send $1, which please use as directed.

The so-called Christians are running what they call a union meeting—the Baptists, Methodists, and Brethren. They hav left the Campbellites out in the cold, and I understand the Campbellites are feeling sore over it. They hav been running some three weeks, and hav only succeeded in getting three or four weak-minded grown persons, and one or two children, to join them. The priests are ranting and sweating day and night, but it all does no good; the people are getting their eyes open. There are ten Liberal people here now for one ten years ago.

The cartoons are splendid, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper I ever read. I am now over sixty, and a very poor scribe, but I want to read your paper as long as I can see. M. GUISINGER.

ELMORE, VT., Jan. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER a request for a list of friends' names that are Liberally inclined. I inclose a list. There is one man here, a neighbor of mine, that has lived to a good old age, eighty-six. For the past fifty or sixty years he has belonged to the church, has read his Bible every day and prayed to his God. He has made up his mind that he has got to die before long, and thinks he has not lived just as he ought to hav done and the gates of heaven will be closed against him. He is a strong believer in the old-fashioned hell, with all of its fire and brimstone, and it is enough to make a man's blood run cold to hear that man take on. He says he knows he shall be damned. That is the consoling influence Christianity has for him in his last days. I pity him. His doctrin has become second nature, and he thinks it must be true. How much better if he could look back on his past life and think how much enjoyment he had managed to squeeze out of this world, having no hopes or fears for the next. S. B. DOTY.

HEUVELTON, Jan. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see I am reading a paper not paid for, being a few days behind. I now inclose $7--$5 for two years advance payment, $1 for the lecture field, seventy cents for the Secular Union Fund, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL.

I would be glad to send more, but cannot at this time. I want to help friend Reynolds $1 soon, in his suit for freedom of thought and speech.

Mr. Editor, I am an old subscriber. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the time of its first publication in New York, and I think this is the first time I hav been in the rear on my payment on the first of January.

I expect to take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I liv, which cannot be many years more, as my next birthday counts my age four score years; and when I die I die for myself; no man, nor son of man, can die for me. Every one dies for himself.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER; it is enlightening the world, and bringing many up out of the pit of superstition. I will cast my vote for the cartoons; so continue them for the enlightenment of the blinded intellect. OTIS C. JILLSON.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 20, 287.

MR. EDITOR: As my health seems to be slowly improving I thought I would drop in with my old Episcopal Quakers on last Sunday, as they were holding their quarterly meeting in their new church near to my place. The principal speaker on that occasion was a Mrs. Middleton from Indiana. She made quite a portly appearance as she stepped forward on the rostrum with her head covered (I thought she would hav looked a little better with her head uncovered, but probably she had a reason of her own, or somebody else's, for keeping it covered). She now read a few verses from the Bible, and then exposed her ignorance and bigotry by eulogizing it as the oldest and greatest of all books. If it were not for this holy Bible, she said, we would not know whether we were a man or a monkey, and here she made a drive at Darwin and the philosophy of evolution, then at Infidelity. Then she went back and told the audience (which was a large one) about this Bible God, and that he made everything out of nothing. Then he made a man out of the dust of the earth, and he blew into his nostrils and he became a living soul; then about his eating of the forbidden fruit and thus bringing death and sin into the world, hence the need there was of a savior. She forgot to tell the faithful about the woman and how she was made, and that it was through her maneuvering in connection with a snake that the man was misled; and all this trouble was brought on to his posterity. Then she fired up and went on under a heavy head of steam; sometimes a little streak of sense, then a big streak of nonsense; keeping this Bible in her hand all the time and at times reading a few verses from it for fuel to keep up the internal fires of the brain from the additional flow of blood to the brain, thus to supply the waste that was going on there. Under this mental strain her face got more than commonly red, and her eyes would seem to flash fire. Near the close of her harang she made this remark, that the longer she spoke the easier it was for her to talk. This remark, with these physical demonstrations, was sufficient to satisfy any clear, cool-headed philosopher that she was partially insane; and, of course, she nor her religious dupes knew it, and the probability is that if she is still patronized by this church superstition, the child of ignorance and fraud, she will still go on in this line of march until reason and what little common sense she has left will be dethroned, and she will hav to be numbered with others of this church who hav ended their days in an insane asylum. S. D. MOORE.

BENTON HARBOR, MICH., Jan. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year, $1 for the defense of Mr. Reynolds, and $1 you may place where you think it will do the most good. I am the only one that takes your paper here, but mine goes the round of the neighborhood, and the "Lay Sermon" by Colonel Ingersoll has been read by many people in this place. Yet there are no outspoken Freethinkers here—four churches, and more in contemplation. The Spiritualists hold meetings here in the Opera House, and hav some very eloquent speakers.

The inclosed slip I cut out of an Adventist paper printed at Battle Creek, Mich., which an Adventist handed me, saying triumphantly, "Ingersoll has recanted, and Infidelity must go." Then I read to him the "Lay Sermon" of Brother Ingersoll, and he went away rather down-hearted.

The communications of S. P. Putnam in THE TRUTH SEEKER are delightful and instructiv. EMILY J. CASTLE.

[Following is the extract:

R. G. Ingersoll, the noted Infidel lecturer, has stopped lecturing, and is reported to be suffering fr m cancer of the throat. In answer to a gentleman who asked him why he had given up lecturing, he said: "I hav fought God long enough; I hav given up fighting God."

The story is a falsehood. We shall soon publish something from Colonel Ingersoll on this subject.—ED. T. S.]

DEMING, NEW MEXICO, Jan. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find amount to cover subscription for the ensuing year

Of course I indorse the illustrations; they are no more absurd than the stories they are intended to represent, and yet the churches say such pictures are no better than sacrilege—as if it were any worse to represent a ridiculous story with a ridiculous illustration, than a true story with a sensible one.

Popery is indeed the antipode of liberty, and Watson Heston caught the inspiration in one of the past numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some day we will build him a monument higher than the church ever designed for Spurgeon or Talmage. Think what a brutal mind Spurgeon must hav had to utter the words: "In fire exactly like this which we hav upon earth, our bodies, asbestos-like, will be forever unconsumed." Of course, such sentiments are good enough for Spurgeon and the church of England, but over in this country we hav advanced to a higher, dryer, and purer atmosphere of reason and understanding.

It is wonderful how many people there are who look upon God (or natural forces, if you please) as if it were a human being, endowed with the organs of speech and hearing. If this force or power or condition which brought everything into existence is personal God, etc., and clothed in personal attributes, you destroy the supremacy of God's power, right there. Such a God cannot make a world, or if he did he can't make another one.

The embodiment of all that is true and good and beautiful and pure—some people call that God. Well, that is a conception; if any one wants to worship a conception, let them do so—Pallas Athene will do just as well; but do not clothe conceptions in personal attributes. The North Pole is a conception. We read of an expedition sailing for the North Pole, but there is no pole that any body knows of. A certain person crossed the equator; did any body ever see an equator? Just so with parallels of latitude, state lines, etc.—imaginary, but not tangible.

I sometimes feel that I am almost alone here in the realm of Freethought, but still hav for a boon companion the grand old mountain, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun," which antedates Genesis by several years. This is no small consolation in itself. Hoping the Freethinkers will never be divided against themselvs on any minor points, I am, Yours respectfully, D. S. WEAVER.

OUR PICTURES AND PAPER.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Jan. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think each time an extra good picture comes out in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I'd like to paste it up on every pulpit in the land. I am sure they would, in time, antidote all theology, even with the most pious. One such picture as that in the last paper, showing Thomas Paine and his greatest works at one glance, is more effectiv with most people than would be a volume of biographical information. There it is all at one glance; you see it and take it all in. It is daguerreotyped ineffaceably in the mind. I hav all the pictures filed away, and a day or two ago I thought I'd look them over so as to impress them more fully in my mind, and I was astonished to find how familiar each one looked, thus proving what a hold they hav on memory.

Though our friend Peck has already received his peck of praise, we (Mr. S. and I) must add our mite also, for we find excellent good food for thought in his "Christian Absurdities." Mrs. Colman's reminiscences carry me way back in the past to the first strong work in the antislavery, temperance, and theological reforms, and I seem to liv them over again and feel once more the odium (?) of being so nearly alone in the advocacy of these heterodox ideas. We always find pith in Putnam's pennings, and among the friends he meets are many names familiar to me through private correspondence, and through him I seem almost to greet them in person. Mrs. Severance writes sensibly and justly concerning the "Lucifer Match." The editorial advice seems to me sensible; that is, that they hav martyrized long enough, and could now do better work out of jail than in.

We read with interest the accounts of Dr. McGlynn, but hav little hope that any congregation of Catholics will ever dare to defy the pope's anathema, even for love of a favorit pastor, though we well know that this love is one of the strongest in nature.

Our TRUTH SEEKER is our preacher, and we all love it as a dear friend, teacher, and guide, though we each reserve our right to think as our individual idiosynocrasies compel us. We are still greatly influenced by a favorit paper, especially after taking it for a long series of years, during which it manages, like some good teacher and leader, to keep a little in advance of us, pointing out and clearing a way whereby we may follow. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

WHITE BLUFF, TENN., Jan. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find $3 for another year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe my time runs out this January. It is a feeble expression when I say your paper pleases me much. I believe it gets better every number. I want you to know that I think the pictures are a great addition to the paper, and your sentiments in regard to the Chicago Anarchists accord with mine. I never did believe they would be hanged for free speech; if they are, it will start the worst revolution that ever was known to history. I am not in favor of female suffrage. If women are allowed to vote, myself or any other Infidel will not be allowed to remain in Tennessee, or any Freethought papers to come in the state. Every Biddy will go up to the polls and vote as the priest tells her to, and that will be the end of religious liberty. I don't believe in Prohibition—am opposed to the principle. I don't believe Spiritualism; don't see any sense in it. I am a Materialist to the backbone, and believe the railroads, express, telegraph, telephone, and money banks should belong to the government, as does the mail business; and I think R. G. Ingersoll the best and the smartest man in the world now, to-day. I am fifty-eight years old, don't owe any man a cent, never drink whisky or other liquors, and pay my subscription in advance for all papers I take. I think this will introduce myself as your humble servant, S. P. JONES.

KENT, O., Jan. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Representativ Cain, of the state of Texas, has introduced a bill in Congress to create a retired list for government clerks, in consonance with the law of the same character applying to officers of the army and navy. The general provisions of the bill are that after a clerk has served for forty-five years continuously, he may, at the discretion of an examining board, be retired at three-fourths of the pay he was receiving at the time of retirement. Or he may retire at the end of thirty-eight years' service at two-thirds pay, or at half pay at the end of thirty years, subject to the discretion of the examining board. There seem to be various opinions as to the propriety of Congress passing a bill of this nature. Has our general government been reduced to one great monopoly, in which a position once obtained guarantees a life lease to the holder, on retiring from which a lucrativ sinecure must be provided for him? Or is it a government of the people, for the people, by the people, in which we hav an abundance of material to fill all of our offices, —executiv, legislativ, and judicial—with all these subdivisions, including all the clerical skill necessary to do the business of this great republic without repeating the term of office or term of appointment? These clerical positions furnish constant emyloyment at the very highest wages. Thousands of men and women having the very best of characters and business ability are daily making application for clerical positions to the many departments of the government, and are as often rejected and forced to retire without any encouragement, the officers of the different departments adhering strictly to the Jacksonian principle, "To the victors belong the spoils."

Mr. Cain seems to base the necessity of this bill upon the fact that the army and navy hav a retired list. But is it not time that congressmen should learn that two wrongs do not make a right? We want no more monopoly bills passed, but laws wrought from the warp and woof of justice, tempered with equality, on the basis that all men and women hav equal rights to protection by the general government, and employment according to qualification and merit. I would suggest a law compelling the commanding officers of the different departments of the general government to discharge one-fifth of all the employees under their respectiv commands each year, and hire other men and women in their places, keeping a complete roster of all employees discharged and hired, the yearly retired list to be so selected that no one employee could hold his office to exceed five years. This system would develop new ability, and keep on hand a reserve corps of men and women qualified to transact the business of the government, providing for the departments what the G. A. R. does for the U. S. army. A. D. CLARK.

CARIBOU, ME., Jan. 16, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Although you may possibly hav never heard of it, still, I suppose it is a fact, for I hav either read it myself some time or other, or else my mother read it to me when I was a boy, that, once upon a time in the early history of this country, at a time when there were but very few printing-offices in the United States, some people got together in convention assembled for the purpose of having the press suppressed. And during the session one man arose and said, "Mr. Chairman: I feel impressed with the impression that the press ought to be suppressed."

And, although I do not feel impressed with the impression that THE TRUTH SEEKER press ought to be suppressed, still, I would really like to say to the Christian as well as Infidel world that if there could be any force or power brought to bear upon me to drive me any farther into Atheism than I am in it now (and I think that would be a pretty hard thing to do), that force or power has been brought to bear upon me during the past autumn.

I let my farm last spring to a sickly brother-in-law, which compelled me to work out. Passing over the spring and summer, allow me to say that it was my fortune—or misfortune, as the case may be—to work at two different houses where they pray. To one house I carried Mr. Babcock's pamphlet, "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" which I read to them in oratorical style, and which elicited from them peal after peal of hearty laughter. When I was done, the man admitted that it was smart, and written by a smart man. But he could not believe it. And had they not been particular friends, I should hav told them they dared not believe it.

To the other house I went to breakfast every morning, and listened about a dozen times to their mess of foolish mummery that they thought should be called by the sacred name of prayer. After that, when the signal came for kneeling, I very coolly rose from the table, set back my chair, opened the door, and went out and went off to my work. And that was the last of my listening to prayers there! Now, then, Christian friends, be not offended (unless you wish to) at these few lines of friendly warning, for they are intended for your good. I consider it a disgrace to a disgraceful cause for any person to offer up a prayer to an imaginary throne of grace unless they can offer up a pretty good one.

Now, then, Mr. Editor, I like THE TRUTH SEEKER first-rate, and may, perhaps, take it as long as it is illustrated. I like the "Letters from Friends" department first-rate, because it is the vox populi (the voice of the people), and not simply that of the editor.

Mr. Putnam's lecture, "The New God," is first-rate, and very convincing. And I don't see how any person, after reading that lecture, can ever again believe in a personal God.

I hav read several letters criticising the editor and the colonel, all of which, I think, are uncalled for. To be sure, this is a country within the boundaries of which not even the president is above criticism. But I don't think the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER or the colonel deserves criticism.

H. H. GILMAN.

GEUDA SPRINGS, KAN., Jan. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There are quite a number of Freethinkers in this vicinity. They, like everyone else, must some time succumb to the inevitable, and in such cases our orthodox friends make many remarks about our manner of putting away our dead. Now, I think we should hav some mode for a burial ceremony. Hav you not a burial ceremony for Freethinkers? If so, I think it would be a good plan for you to publish it in pamphlet form; I would like to hav something of the kind. One of your old subscribers, Mr. John H. Jones, recently passed from this life to the beyond. Mr. Jones died the 6th of last September. He used to liv at Sampsell, Mo.; came here early in 1886, and ran a general store. Here was sick a long time, and suffered a great deal. His TRUTH SEEKER was lots of comfort to him in his long illness. He was a strong Liberal and Freethinker, a self-made man, and a deep thinker and reasoner. He was conscious unto the last, and was firm in his belief to the last. On the 18th of last September another one of our number passed away, Mrs. Caroline M. Bixler (mother of the writer hereof). She had been for many years a Liberal, and a strong one, too. She formerly lived in Trenton, Iowa; was long a subscriber to the Boston Investigator, her brother, Q. M. Noel, being a noted Infidel in that country. Mrs. Bixler was a great reader and thinker, and a good reasoner. I can well remember of ministers visiting her for the boasted purpose of converting her, but they invariably went away wiser than they came. She had many friends, and was noted for her kind-heartedness. We would like to hav some Liberal come and giv us a lecture, but as we are rather out of the beat of any lecturer, it will be hard for us to get one. I notice an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 18, 1886, by Si Slokum, that hits us Prohibitionists pretty hard. I don't think he really means to call all who are Prohibitionists "fools," but one would take it so. Many persons, and many who are Freethinkers, are Prohibitionists, and Freethinkers, as a rule, are not fools—by no means. We hav prohibition here in Kansas. Some say it does not prohibit. True, but does the law forbidding any one to steal, murder, and pillage prevent stealing, murder, etc.? Of course it does not. In spite of the law, persons will steal, murder and pillage, but will any one say that the law is no good? Who would want the law wiped out?

The same with our prohibition law. It has been a great benefit to our state. It brings the best class of people to the state. From reports of a majority of the county attorneys of the state, crime has decreased considerably since prohibition has been a law. Then does it prohibit in the state of Kansas? I say that it does, to the extent that any law is obeyed. There are gluttons who abuse food, but in their abuse of it do they injure any one beside themselvs? No; but the person who abuses the use of strong drink not only injures himself, but all concerned in him. There is the difference. If it was only the one who abused it that was injured, it would not be so bad. Rum, and strong drink of any kind, if not an evil, becomes an evil after awhile, and why not make laws to govern one evil as well as another? Slokum says, not in these words but to this effect, that prohibition can never be established. Let me say to him, prohibition is established in Kansas. It is here to stay, and don't you forget it. They hav tried to resubmit the question of prohibition, and failed, and should it be resubmitted to the voters of Kansas to-day, it would carry by a larger majority than before.

Mr. John H. Jones has a son here (John S. Jones), and we are trying to get up a club for THE TRUTH SEEKER; think we will be able to send you a few subscribers. I expect this article is getting too long, so I will close. Q. M. BIXLER.

["The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Ceremonies" contains an appropriate service for funeral occasions, besides much other matter. It is sent to any address for 75 cents.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 28, 1887.

TO J. B. SMITH, Dear Sir: Yours received, via THE TRUTH SEEKER, with regard to the article of mine entitled, "The Impending Revolution."

In that article did I say that a revolution against capital should be "precipitated?" Well, let me see? I said this: "A revolution is in order, and it is high time it were on." I repeat the words, and hav the satisfaction of knowing that it is on to a considerable extent, some forty thousand workers in these whereabouts having laid down their tools—laying down of tools, not the taking up of arms, is what I referred to in that article—and by so doing hav "paralyzed the commerce of three cities," the press says.

Well, suppose the "million minute men," with the eight or ten million at their backs, should lay down their tools—remember, please, I said nothing about taking up arms—the whole country would be "paralyzed," wouldn't it? Well, to ask the conundrum I did in the original article, "What are the grabocrats going to do about it?" Allowing they hav all the arms, just for argument's sake—they can buy all they want—what will these arms avail them? Can they shoot the ten million workers into taking up their tools and going to work as before at starvation wages? If you think so, Mr. Smith, keep on thinking so; it is pleasing to a monopolist and employer so to think, undoubtedly.

By illustration I explained how this "revolution"—you seem to be fearfully worked up about it, and the article of mine that so worked you up, such a "foolish" one, too—could be a bloodless one, a "walk over," as it were; but you had to explode with gunpowder and dive into blood, at one fell swoop, so to speak—I can smell the powder and the blood on you now, even at this distance from Mahoning, Ohio.

Don't go for the scalp of any "foolish" writer that chances to get into print, Mr. Smith, when such fool words as the following slop over from your brain-pan:

"Suppose the revolutionists should succeed, could not the governments of Europe be induced to send over their trained soldiers [ha! "trained soldiers!" Your soul was in arms and eager for the fray when you penned those words] to restore order? The cause of law and order is one the world over."

Mr. Smith, had you lived in "the time that tried men's souls" in this country, it is a dead sure thing that you would hav hoisted the Tory flag—at heart, not outside where the patriots, the "revolutionary mob," could hav seen it, oh, no! —and stood, for all you were worth, with the English and Hessians in the interest of "law and order." I marvel me muchly, now I think of it, why England, then the mightiest of nations, could not hav "induced the other European powers to send over their trained soldiers to restore order." What a pity that the "revolutionary mob" triumphed in those days, eh, Mr. Smith? Certainly the patriots were nothing but a poorly armed "mob," a "revolutionary mob," anything and everything but "trained soldiers," but they "got there" all the same, England not being able to "induce other powers to come and help her restore law and order."

Suppose the South had whipped the North (the government), do you think we could hav "induced," etc.? Not much. Governments, like individuals and communities, turn to the rising, not the setting sun. And I am telling you, Mr. Smith, a capitalist or sympathizer, and hirer of workers, perhaps, that if the ten or twelve million workers should lay down their tools—who the devil said anything about "springing to arms," as you put it?—some fine day, that they, the people, would then be the government, and would look to it that the grabocrats preserved "law and order," at their peril otherwise. Yes, sir, we should then hav a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, instead of a government, as now, of thieves, by thieves, and for thieves. And I am telling you also that I hope to liv to see the day when the laying down of tools shall take place, even if a little bloodshed follows. Why be so scary about a little bloodshed in this case? The world, especially the Christian world, has ever been engaged in blood-letting, and ever will be, I suppose; and as it seems to be a necessary operation, or one that can't be prevented, what matters it when, where, how, or by whom the operation is performed? Should the workers all lay down their tools, and bloodshed should follow, owing to you monopolists and sympathizers, let it follow; that shed by the workers will be shed in the justest cause that the world ever knew! The "saviors of society" (the latter a rotten thing), corruptionists, monopolists, and thieves will hav great need to call upon all the gods and devils ever invented by man to succor them, and don't you forget it!

In Section 4 of your letter you ask "if capital and labor should not pull together for their mutual benefit." By all means, Yes. But do they? No. This pulling together is what we want, and for the want of it we are having the present troubles. The fact is, and you know it, that capital has done all the pulling, and that's what's the matter. It pulls millions upon millions out of the mines, the factories, the railways, etc., while labor pulls but a crust. That's the sort of "pull together" you argue for, Mr. Smith, but the workers are arguing for a hold on the rope whereby they can hav a chance to pull with you. Do you call it "mutual benefit" when, making a million dollars out of a railroad you build, you pay your men one dollar a day? No doubt you do; but I am telling you the workers look not at it in that light. When you capitalists cease to be grab-alls, things will run much smoother than at present. But you won't be till you are forced to be, I am afraid. It is turkey for you and crow for the worker, or, in your magnanimity, crow for the worker and turkey for the capitalist, every time and all the time. Now, this sort of distribution has been going on long enough; and the workers are going to hav some of that turkey, if it takes a leg, so to speak. Good-bye, SI SLOKUM.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Grandma's Decision.

"Shall we call him John?" and the father smiles,
As he lifts with a father's pride
The baby, the wonderful baby boy,
To the youthful mother's side.

She raises her happy and tender eyes,
Like the soft, blue gentian flowers,
Saying, "John is not a pretty name
For a baby such as ours."

"Augustus or James?" But again she turns
To him an unwilling ear.
"Nor David?" "Oh, no, though it's very well
For the usual babies, dear.

"But a name that will hint of joy combined
With sweetness, for ours is meet,
Such as love indeed may havdeftly coined—
Yet Bertie I think is sweet."

"Bertie is spelled with an i and e?"
The father objects, "Oh, Nan,
Remember some day that our boy will be,
If his life is spared, a man."

And grandma, who listens with smiling mien
To each fond, disnuading plea,
Unwittingly quotes, what's in a name
That may of such import be?

"David or Bertie, Augustus or John,
What matter? 'Tis all the same.
It is not the name makes the baby dear,
The baby endears the name."

Mary Baird Finch.

DEAR CHILDREN, YOUNG AND OLD: Having read and reread "The Christmas Tree," by that sweet, nature's poet, Mary Baird Finch, and as I know you all must love her gentle, loving, refined, humane spirit, and would like to know her history, I will very briefly, for want of space, allude to her.

Thirty-five years ago, when I was thirty-three and she was fifteen years old, I lived with the Baird family three months. They lived in a long log cabin, on the prairie in Knox county, Ill. They were renters—poor, honest, and industrious. I had come from New York the previous year, and passed through Chicago, before there were any railroads there, and much of Knox county was still open prairie.

Mary was a love-child, for her parents were temperamentally and mentally adapted for a happy parentage and harmonious, loving life. They and their children formed a happy, affectionate family, and all were noted for their innate goodness and kindness. I believe I am right in saying that Mary's natural desire for knowledge was great, but her opportunities for school education were poor and limited, and that what she learned was the natural craving and action of her fine brain and impressible temperament, which will, more or less, be its own teacher, and self-accumulating. She is one of the poets that are born, not made. I remember how attentiv and docil she was when I and others used to sing, speak, or read in private, or at our public meetings. She was older than her years, and, like Byron, "loved to look on nature in her loftier moods." About twenty-five years after I had left her abode in Illinois, and she had a family in Nebraska, she, having seen my articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, surprised me by a letter full of sympathy and gratitude for my kindness to her, and the truths I taught her when a girl. For several years we hav been correspondents and mutual sympathizers. I was greatly surprised that that artless, unschooled woman had developed into such an affectionate, nature-loving, nature-describing, nature-picturing poet. There is so much nature, so much history, so much science, so much sublimity and simplicity, and better than all, so much humanity in her poems, that it seems as though all her readers must be made happier and better by their perusal.

May I not say truthfully that she is the Robert Burns of the prairies? Is she not worthy of the mantle of that humane bard?

Like myself, poor, gentle, loving Mary suffers much with physical ailments and infirmities, and I read her letters about her family cares, toils, troubles and trials, and her great physical sufferings when she is often near dying, with great emotion and sympathy. Every poem of her natural, soul-felt, inspiring effusions I read in the Children's Corner I am afraid will be her last, and her graphic pen fill and thrill me no more.

Do we not all pray that her humane and exalted pen may yet grace the Children's Corner for a long time to come? Bless and preserve that sweet, poetic songster, Mary Baird Finch.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—FOSSIL FOOTPRINTS—AN ANAGRAM.

'Tis not in Chili stone alone
These "fossil footprints" may be shown,
Of beasts, and birds, and reptils vast,
Whose tracks alone record their past;
Here one, a kind of frog, is seen,
Its spreading toes well webbed between
Like Arctic snowshoes long and broad,
And thus we track it where it trod;
Two inches deep, these tracks declare
The pond'rous load such feet did bear;
In size so elephantine vast,
This huge batrachian of the past,
Leaves Gulliver no room to brag
About the beasts of Brobdingnag;
To prove that all I say is so,
South Hadley folks its tracks can show;
And of a bird of such huge parts
Its tracks will often hold four quarts,
Whose chicks we therefore must surmise
Exceeded ostriches' in size;
Just ask the folks who liv around
Where "Noah's ravens' tracks" abound?
But do not try, at any rate,
To prove the tracks of greater date;
So once South Hadley's wisest sage,
Held to these footprints' earlier age,
And, what is more, he proved it too,
So all the people thought it true
Till later quest at length obtains
The fossil prints of splashing rains;
"What, ho! before the rainbow's span,
Or earth could yet giv life to man!"
And so they racked their fertil brains
To reconcile the dates and rains,
And when they reached the rainbow's arc
Faith stamped her chronologic mark;
In eighteen hundred forty-two,
E'en Boonton brought one track to view,
Six inches long and half as wide,
With three thick toes with claws supplied;
But in the light of Reynolds's suit,
I think I "spot" that ancient brute
Still living, if it can be said
Such creature was not always dead;
And yet, and yet, and yet, and yet,
The thing can sweat when "overhet;"
'Tis not alone in Chili stone,
These "fossil footprints" may be shown;
'Tis known quite well how wide the list
By every palcontologist.

Correspondence.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Jan. 18, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My mother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks it is a splendid paper. I read the Children's Corner, and more especially the letters. I am fifteen years of age. I am going to school this winter. We liv half a mile from a Wesleyan church. I go to meeting occasionally, just to hear what they hav to say, and you may be sure they giv the Infidels a round. The last time I was there the preacher told about a woman that went off in a trance at one of their meetings, and died while she was in that condition. The preacher said that he wished God would kill a good many more people in that way, and he said that Infidels were afraid to speak for themselvs. We hav no place for a speaker just now, but if we succeed in building a hall they will find out we are not so cowardly after after all.

Mr. Remsburg lectured at Petersburg, about twelve miles from here. Father and some of the other men of the neighborhood went up to hear him. Father thought him an excellent speaker.

It is extremely cold weather here now. This morning we were all gathered around the warm fire, and father took occasion to read Mr. Peck's article in the last TRUTH SEEKER, and after he had finished, mother remarked that he was more than a peck; he was a good bushel.

From your friend, EDNA A. BAKER.

SIMCOE, Jan. 22, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I'll be eleven years old in April. I hav two little sisters, Inez and Ruby. Inez is four, and Ruby is two years old. It is fun to see them run for THE TRUTH SEEKER to see the pictures when papa brings it home. I go to school. I like my teacher. Her name is Miss Bray. She reads the Bible in school every morning, and then she makes us pray, which I do not like, because my parents are good Freethinkers. This is a small town: about two thousand inhabitants, near Lake Erie. We hav had only one Freethought lecture here by Charles Watts. There were only two ladies present, my mamma and a friend she had to go with her.

Yours truly, WILLIE HELLERICH.

P.S.—If this letter is worth putting in the Children's Corner, I may try to write a better letter when I am not so sleepy. Good-bye, again! J. W. C. H.

ASH, MINN., Jan. 15, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner, and a good many other articles in it. So I thought I would write a few lines for the Corner. I am fifteen years old. I am keeping house for my father. He is a widower. I am his only child. My mother died when I was about two years old. I cannot remember her, but my father told me of her. My father was poor and had to get me cared for as cheaply as he could. Some of his acquaintances told him it would be better for him to let me go to the parochial school, as the sisters would take better care of me than other folks would. O Miss Wixon, I could not begin to tell you how mean and cruel those god-serving sisters and priests are to poor children that are beguiled by them or left to their care. They whip and pound them to force them to the very heart, so as to make them fearful, so they get them to fear the punishment of their God. I will tell you all about the sisters and their mummery the next time. This is a nice country we liv in, but it is very cold in the winter. We hav forty acres of land. My father's name is David F. Anderson; he is a strong Liberal, and thinks if the world is ever saved by the death of anyone, it will be Bruno instead of that Jewish Jesus. For fear I am occupying too much of your time, I will close for the present. With best wishes for all Liberals, I remain, Fraternally yours,

STELLA ANDERSON.

P.S.—Dear Miss Wixon: This is my first letter. I hope you will publish it. S. A.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., Jan. 9, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not written to you for so long, I believe I will try again. Through your columns allow me to sincerely thank Virginia E. Vance for inscribing to me her beautiful poem entitled, "My Books." I am late about expressing thanks, but still, I guess, it's "better late than never."

I stated in my last letter to you that I had commenced to read "Ingersoll's Forty-three Lectures Complete" through. I hav succeeded at last, and think it perfectly splendid. I hav also read his "Prose Poems and Selections," and like them really well. My sisters were home from college during vacation, and one of them recited "The Vision of War" (one of Ingersoll's prose poems) at the Lyceum which is held in our district schoolhouse every Wednesday evening. It seemed to please the audience very much.

The subject for discussion for the next meeting of the Literary Society is, "Resolved, That a woman should hav the right of suffrage." I, of course, am on the affirmativ. My papa is vice president of the society, and one of my brothers, treasurer. My brother says that after he takes up the next collection he is going to Canada "for his health." I am afraid it would not pay, for he has only taken fifty cents for collection. We are the only Liberals in this neighborhood, so, of course, we are terribly tongue-lashed in the discussions.

At the last meeting the subject under discussion was "Resolved, That a man's character is made for him more than he makes it for himself." One fellow, on the affirmativ, said that he thought the parents formed a man's character. "Now, for instance," he said, "take good Christian parents, and they will teach their children to be honest, industrious, studious, and in every way to be good, while if you take parents who think the opposit, they will teach their children to be dishonest, wicked, and to do all manner of mean things. The first will grow up to be a good citizen, while the last will lead a wild life, and come to a bad end." I am not sure those were the very words, but they were something to that effect. As we are the only family in the neighborhood who believe the opposit to Christianity, we guess it was intended for us. But I don't see that it was at all appropriate, for I am sure mamma and papa hav always taught their children to be honest, industrious, studious, and to do no manner of mean things, and so far we hav none of us come to a bad end.

My letter is getting too lengthy, so I will close. I am, as ever,

E. HORTENSIA HARMAN.

About Fossils.

And this our life, exempt from public haunts,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything.
—Shakspere.

A piece of slate was handed me on which was impressed the delicate tracery of a handsome fern. The slate was taken from the coal mine at Portsmouth, R. I., and the impression upon it was a fossil. This word (fossil) we get from the Latin fossilis, which means dug up, and it is applied to the vegetable or animal substances, or their remains, which are found in the rocks. It is by means of fossil footprints of animals, impressions of reptils, birds, flowers, and foliage imprinted in the solid rock that the earth is telling her grand old story. Sandstone and shale hav kept the pages of the earth's story-book clean and bright. The coal-beds wrap within their dusky blankets a great history of other days.

When the little branch of fern impressed on the slate was alive and green, the earth was soft and moist; great marshes and swamps and bogs and mud abounded; shrubs and big trees shed their leaves on the muddy surface of the earth, and as the moistened ground grew cool beneath a changing atmosphere, the leaves decaying became indelibly fastened in the mud, which after a time became coal.

We could not liv at that time in the world's history, for the air was too hot and stifling, and was too heavy with carbonic acid gas, but it was splendid for the trees and vegetation which were being turned into coal for our use. Curious insects buzzed and hummed through the air, and huge fishes swam in the water.

Before that time there were some signs of organic life. Curious little creatures called trilobites had a being on the earth, and when they went to sleep they left their skeletons embedded in rocks and stones, to tell us they once lived. Sea-weeds, too, of that period hav left their hardened ribbons in the rocks to show us that they were tossed on the shores a hundred thousand years ago. Immense birds, with tails like reptils, left their prints in the sandstone of the Connecticut valley. The oldest air-breathers, so far as known, are the remains of some hideous frog-like reptils found in Pennsylvania coal-beds, and also in Nova Scotia. By means of these remains, or fossils, and there hav been found a great many of all grades and character, each in its own time, however, we are enabled to learn the history of the world we liv in.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the meaning of fossil? How does the earth reveal her history? What was the condition of the earth when the fern was green and new? Could we hav lived then? Why? Was it good for trees and foliage? And why? What about the insects and fishes? What about trilobites? What is found in sandstone of Connecticut valley? What about the oldest air-breathers? Where were they found?

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a reve ation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

An Unpublished Poem.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker—Sir: When I heard of Mr. Bennett's death in December, 1882, I wrote the following lines, intended as a tribute to his memory, to be read at the funeral services, but realiziug the impossibility of getting them to you in time for that sad rite I laid them by, and they hav lain unthought of among other MSS since that date. To-day, in looking over the odds and ends that fill an amateur poet's portfolio, I came across them, and, if agreeable to you, would like to see them appear in The Truth Seeker as one more memorial tribute to its brave founder. D. L. B.

Greenwich, N. Y., Jan. 30, 1887.

IN MEMORIAM.

Written for the funeral of D. M. Bennett.

Gone in the fulness of thy strength,
Brave laborer in the cause of Truth,
Ere yet thy rounded journey's length
Had tired the energy of youth!
With hearts that hoped the coming years
Had healing—all unneeded now—
To-day we bring, with starting tears,
The laurel wreath to bind thy brow.

Yes, thou hast won the victor's crown,
In earuest battle for the right;
Who stripped the fear-held bandage down
From darkened eyes, and showed the light
To men who turned, with glad accord,
From slavish views and baneful creed,
To follow Truth—nor sought reward,
Save in the thanks of thousands freed.

To-day we trace the lengthening chain
Of years back through the silent past,
When Error held her cheerless reign,
And Hope's fair sky was overcast;
When Reason's wondering doubts were stilled,
And Truth's first teachers, faint and few,
Their lives with scorn and menace filled,
The scourge of brutal malice knew.

What scenes of horror greet the eye;
What cruelties we dare not name!
See Freedom's young apostles die,
Their lives go out in smoke and flame!
See Bigotry, with cross and book,
Beside her bleeding victims stand,
Gazing unmoved, with hellish look,
On tortures that her hate had planned.

O Reasou, that thy crowning day,
The hope of youth, the dream of age,
Should thus be traced throughout its way
In blood, on history's troubled page!
That Superstition's stake and rack
Should thus hav ruled the onward years,
While struggling Truth, unheard, fell back
Before the strength of coward fears.

Through the leng midnight reign of faith
Some few stout hearts hav never quailed;
Hav braved her hatred even to death,
And Error's gathering hosts assailed.
Some few brave souls who dared to stand
Erect and firm in Freedom's name
Hav passed her torch from hand to hand,
And kept alive the sacred flame.

Theirs was the work whose fruits to-day
Are freedom's blessings round us shed;
Theirs be the honored place alway
Which merit givs the voiceless dead.
And now amid their foremost ranks
With fond accord we place thy name,
And for thy works a people's thanks
As just inheritance we claim.

Rising from doctrins once embraced,
The world's opinion thou didst dare;
Each creed in thought's tribunal placed,
And asked an honest verdict there.
And once thou reason's light hadst shared
No wavering marked thy cherished plan;
But, armed with truth, went forth prepared
To battle for the rights of man.

From the brave utterance of thy thought
A nobler trust in man arose,
And falsehood's hosts, to judgment brought,
Went down before thy trenchant blows!
For truth upheld, for strength displayed,
For courage that a dungeon knew,
For work performed, thy life has made
Each tribute of affection due.

"Man's works liv after him," is traced
Through all achievements that we see,
Nor shall his memory be effaced
Who givs his all to make men free,
Not till hope's quickening tide, that runs
Through all the ages, stops congealed,
And Liberty forgets her sons
Who fell on glory's battle field.

Such laborers in the world's behalf
Our richest tributes fitly claim,
And Justice on thy cenotaph
Shall yet inscribe thy honored name.
And grateful thousands yet shall meet
Where freedom's warrior silent lies,
And in fond thoughts, when there they greet,
The memory of thy works shall rise.

Rest, hero, from thy labor, rest!
The coming years shall bring to thee,
From north and south, from east and west,
The chorus of a people free.
That time beyond the prophet's gaze,
Grander than poet yet hath dreamed,
When earth's united sons shall raise
The anthem of a race redeemed;

Redeemed from mental slavery's blight,
And blest with millions yet to be,
When minds, rejoicing in the light,
Shall hail the truth that made them free.
Down the long aisles of coming time
Thy name shall still shine in the van
With those whose works hav made sublime
The ever onward march of Man.

Greenwich, N. Y., Dec. 9, 1882. D. L. B.

Our German readers should send 25 cents to the Freidenker, of Milwaukee, Wis., for a copy of the "Amerikanisher Turner Kalenar."

New Books.

T. C. Widdicomb, of Byberry, Philadelphia, Pa., has written a little pamphlet upon "Natural Theology," upon which he places the extravagant price of 25 cents.

"Easy Lessons in Socialism," by W. H. Benson, is published by the author at Philadelphia. Six cents will obtain the pamphlet for those interested by addressing the writer at 1225 Filbert street.

"Heredity and Education," their relation to each other and to the human race, is President E. A. Wood's address to the Pennsylvania Medical Society. Dr. Wood livs at Pittsburgh, and inquiries for the treatis should be sent to him there.

The Chicago Law Times is a new quarterly, edited by Catharine V. Waite. It is a pretentious and well printed volume of some 130 pages. Its object is to mend the machinery of the law. The articles are all by men and women of recognized ability. The price is 50 cents; $2 per year.

"Papers in Penology" is published by the authorities of the Elmira Reformatory. The papers are by Charles Dudley Warner and Charles A. Collins, and were originally printed in the North American Review and Harper's Magazine. Those interested in punitiv institutions will find these papers of great interest.

"Anarchy," by C. L. James, of Eau Claire, Wis., is what he calls a "tract for the times." Mr. James is a scholar, an erudite historian, and a forcible and graceful writer. He maintains that government can be abolished, and that there is no necessity for it to be restored. Very few will agree with him. The price of his pamphlet is 25 cents.

W. S. Bell has revised his pamphlet upon the "Conflict Between Christianity and Civilization," and published a second edition, which may be had for fifteen cents by addressing him at 302 State street, Chicago. Mr. Bell's little pamphlet is a very effectiv document in convincing Christians that the world is not so much indebted to Christianity as the ministers would hav them believe.

"The Conflict between Liberty and Prohibition" is an inquiry into "the most practicable method of reforming the world." Other essays on political subjects are included by Mr. J. R. Beasley, the writer, who sells the phamphlet at 50 cents. His address is Chattanooga, Tenn. Mr. Beasley is a Liberal and earnest gentleman, and the price of the work is not too much to pay for the settlement of many important social questions.

Under the name of "A Gentile," Dyer D. Lum, of Port Jervis, has published a handsome octavo volume of 91 pages upon the Mormon Question in its Economic Aspects: Being a Study of Coöperation and Arbitration in Mormondom, from the Standpoint of a Wage-worker. Mr. Lum finds a great deal more of good in the social system of Utah than the practical workings of the scheme will bear out. The price of the book should be about 50 cents.

Miller Hagaman, whose poem on "Liberty" was recently noticed in these columns, has another poetical work, called "The Divine Malignity." The dedication is:

TO CALVIN BURNING SERVETUS.
"Put on green wood."

The poem is a protest against the doctrin of hell. Mr. Hagaman was educated for and entered the Presbyterian ministry, but was expelled for holding the views to which he now givs metrical expression. The volume is very handsomely printed, and is sold for one dollar by The Truth Seeker.

"Christianity versus Infidelity" is the title given to the debate between Dr. J. L. York and H. A. Long at Brisbane. The discussion continued six nights, and "closed amid cheers, groans, and general uproar." The subjects attacked were Christian Theism, the development theory, the inspiration of the Bible, the divinity of Christianity, and the respectiv values of Secularism and that form of supernaturalism prevalent in Australia and elsewhere. The audiences seem to hav been exceedingly discourteous, and disturbed the disputants impartially. Mr. Long, the Christian champion, rambled away from his subjects, and Dr. York had to follow him occasionally, though generally confining himself to the set proposition. In oratorical talents the men are about evenly matched, and of more than ordinary ability. Nevertheless, the debate is unsatisfactory, the points made by each running into and over each other. Dr. York is the better thinker, Mr. Long being superficial and given to stringing words together without much sense. The price of the book should be about a dollar, and it may be had of Dr. York at San José, California.

No. 85 of the Humboldt Library is "The Essential Nature of Religion," by J. A. Picton. The author believes that religion is of God, but that Christianity is no more divine than other systems, though superior to them. The work is of no particular value. No 86 of the same library is "The Unseen Universe: Philosophy of the Pure Sciences." By Wm. Kingdon Clifford, F.R.S. The first is a consideration of the important problem of personal immortality for the human race, the second a scientific consideration of philosophy. The price of each number of this library is fifteen cents.

Gerald Massey has sent us copies of his four lectures, privately printed, but sold for 25 cents each by the author, at Villa Bordighiera, New Southgate, London, N. The titles of lectures are "The Historical (Jewish) and the Mythical (Egyptian) Christ;" "Paul as a Gnostic Opponent, not the Apostle of Historic Christianity;" "The Logia of the Lord, or the Pre-Christian Sayings Ascribed to Jesus the Christ;" "The Devil of Darkness, or Evil in the light of Evolution." Mr. Massey's reputation as an Egyptologist and explainer of "sacred" mysteries assures the purchaser of these pamphlets extraordinary value for the money.

"The Mediumistic Experiences of John Brown, the Medium of the Rockies," is published by Moses Hull, at Des Moines, Iowa, and sold for one dollar. It is advertised as "wild, weird, and wonderful," and we notice that our Spiritualistic exchanges speak well of the work. It purports to prove that spirits can liv with mortals, that spirits can foretell the future, that spirits can come to the unlearned and teach them philosophy, that spirits can heal the sick, and it includes directions for the development of mediumship. The chief failure of the book is that the writer forgets to establish a fact fundamental to his reasoning—the existence of the spirits to do all these things.

The Gazetteer received through the mail the other day, a very interesting little book, nicely bound and neatly printed, entitled "Little Lessons for Little Folks, by Aunt Elmina." Aunt Elmina is Mrs. E. D. Slenker, of Virginia, an old lady who has written many pretty things for boys and girls. Her aim is always to interest and instruct, and in this she is remarkably successful. The book before us has chapters devoted to the Stars, Monkeys, Fishes, Fresh Air, Matter and Life, Books, Clover, Water, Stones, Animals and Vegetables, Little Leaves, The Nerves, Sense of Smell, Hereditary and Natural Selection, the Camel, Frog, Cow, Dolls, Grass. They are all easy lessons, and yet those of mature age can read them with profit. The Truth Seeker Publishing Company will send this book to any address for 40 cents. The same firm has sent the Gazetteer J. K. Ingalls's "Economic Equities: A Compend of the Natural Laws of Industrial Production and Exchange," a fit companion to his "Social Wealth." The price is 50 cents.—Sunday Gazetteer.

Under the profound conviction that Romanism is the insidious enemy of liberty, and most serious menace to the republic, Mr. A. J. Grover, of Chicago, has written the pamphlet "Romanism: Danger Ahead. The Reason why a good Roman Catholic cannot be a good Citizen of this Republic." We imagin that few readers of The Truth Seeker will disagree with Mr. Grover in this position, but as to what shall be done about it, who can say, keeping the guarantees of the Constitution in mind? However, the first thing to be done is to acquaint the people with the facts, and for doing this Mr. Grover's pamphlet is invaluable. We do not agree with the New York Sun, that he has exaggerated his statements so greatly as to invalidate them. He quotes the words of Roman Catholics themselvs, and the conclusions drawn therefrom are certainly not strained nor illogical when one considers the bloody history of the one church above all others that has aimed to subjugate to her despotic will whole continents and peoples. We are frank to confess it, we are afraid of Roman Catholicism so long as the masses of the population are blind to its plain purposes, and deaf to all remonstrances against granting it new supplies of funds from state treasuries. Mr. Grover's pamphlet should be widely circulated. The price is forty cents. Sold at this office.

Aunt Elmina (Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker) has found her proper sphere. No one in the Liberal ranks is more capable of talking to children with their pen than this woman. The lessons she givs to the little folks in this little volume of one hundred pages are every one of them scientific lessons. This volume is worth more than a whole Sunday-school library. Could we hav had such a book in our childhood, teaching us what the stars are, how large they are, how far from the earth, how fast their light travels, etc., we might hav dispelled much dense ignorance we hav been compelled to wade through.

Every lesson in this book is taken from nature; the six chapters on "Life and Her Children" are worth more than the price of the book. Send 40 cents to its publishers, and get the book for your young folks. We will send for it for you if you prefer.—New Thought.

Obituary.

Died.—Jan. 13, 1887, Richard J. Lamborn, of Glen Hall, Chester county, Pa., of neuralgia of the heart, aged 70 years.

Mr. Lamborn's sickness was of short duration. He was about and attending to his affairs up till the morning of his death. He was a subscriber to The Truth Seeker from its infancy, and sympathized with its purpose and sentiments in a general way. He was a man of broad and Liberal views. An independent thinker, he granted to others what he claimed for himself, the right of self-judgment. His motto was to liv true and correct lives. That was not only his guide when in life and health, but was his solace in the dying hour. When he knew his departure was at hand, he called his children around him and gave them his blessing, and injunction to liv true and correct lives. And, being fully conscious of his approaching dissolution, he did not express any regrets, but was fully resigned, and passed out of the clay tenement calmly and peacefully.

He will be greatly missed. While passing through the journey of life, he left his mark of fidelity and usefulness. He did not eat the bread of idleness; was an industrious, provident, and useful citizen; a good business man, a successful farmer and adopted all the progressiv improvements.

A visit to his late home, where he spent some thirty or forty years of his life, and the improvements made by him will satisfy the visitor that he lived for a good and useful purpose; and his example and influence will still continue to liv as a monument to his memory. A year ago he had his tombstone erected, with the following inscription: "Learn to obey nature's laws, and liv up to your highest ideas of right.

Bound to no party, to no creed confined,
The world our home, our brothers all mankind;
Do good, love truth, be just and fair to all;
Accept the right, though every ism fall."

Dutton Madden.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. Gives cheer and hope to the afflicted by saying and proving that SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., can be cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. No failure in any case.

It is one of Dr. Fellows's valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected by pad and bandage, which cures by absorption, and which is the only reliable method of curing Seminal Weakness and Loss of Sexual Power.

Send five 2-cent stamps for his book "Private Counselor," telling all about the disease, and the external cure, with evidences of success. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J, and say where you saw this advertisment.

☞ Dr. Fellows begs leave to state that he is an Infidel of the most pronounced character.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.

(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

SENT, POSTPAID, ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, $1.

News of the Week.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., got a touch of the blue laws last Sunday. Every barber's shop, cigar store, and restaurant was closed by the Law and Order League, and it is now proposed that newsdealers shall also keep their places closed on Sundays. The business men talk of protesting in mass meeting.

THE measles epidemic in New York continues its fatal career. Small-pox cases are reported as less frequent.

THE president has signed the Interstate Commerce bill regulating the charges of railroads as carriers.

THE Limerick, Ireland, municipal council has refused to celebrate the queen's jubilee on the ground that the queen has visited Ireland only twice and has never assisted Irish charities.

OVER 200 petitions were received last week by Senator Blair at Washington protesting against the running of Sunday trains. Blair is the well-known Christian statesman of New Hampshire.

THE land reformers are making considerable capital out of the fact that Sir Thomas More is to be canonized as a Roman Catholic saint. It is maintained that according to the views set forth in his "Utopia," More was a Communist.

REPORTS from Belfast, Ireland, still tell of riots between Protestants and Catholics.

ANOTHER boodle alderman, O'Neil, has been convicted. Alderman Cleary will be tried next week.

THE House Committee has reported favorably upon the bill to giv Poet Walt Whitman a pension of $25 per month. Whitman worked in the hospitals during the war.

THE coal handlers' strike has not materially changed since a week ago, except that 'longshoremen and other Knights of Labor hav struck through sympathy with the coal handlers. It does not now look as though the employers would yield.

ONE of the most disastrous railroad accidents on record occurred near White River Junction, Vt., last Saturday. The Montreal express, going at thirty-five miles an hour, jumped the track and fell more than fifty feet into the frozen river. Some seventy-five passengers were on board, and about thirty-five of these were killed, either by being crushed to death or burnt by the fire from the stoves, which turned the wreck into a huge funeral pyre.

SOMEBODY carried an infernal machine aboard the steamer Guyandotte of the Old Dominion line, one day last week, and left it in a closet. The thing exploded when the steamer was off Staten Island, creating great havoc in that part of the ship, and slightly wounding two persons. The Guyandotte came back into port for repairs. No clue to the person who carried the explosiv aboard has been found, though rewards to the amount of $6,000 are offered for his arrest and conviction.

THE Rev. John Hedman, it is understood, has been given a month to resign from the pastorate of St. Ansgarius Episcopal church in Chicago. He has been investigated. The charges are incompetency and gross neglect in the discharge of his pastoral duties, misappropriation of the church books and moneys, perversion and lying, drunkenness, undue familiarity with young women of this parish, and visiting houses of ill fame. It is also charged that a strange relation existed between Hedman and an unmarried woman, who possessed great influence over him, and, it is said, Hedman wanted to marry another young woman, but the first one wouldn't let him. Hedman is said to be a fine pulpit orator, and irreproachably orthodox.

Odds and Ends.

WE object to sending millionaires to the halls of Congress. When a man gets a million, he wants more. Send poor men, who know when they hav enough.—Puck.

A BOSTON girl at the Charity ball, on being asked to dance, accepted the invitation with the remark that she usually preferred the "Boston Financier" style—"close and rapid."

MR. EDWIN BOORMAN, of Findley's Lake, has a photograph representing five generations of his family, taken at one sitting. He has been offered a large sum for it by a descendant of one of the Albany patroons whose vouchers of pedigree were "lost in a fire, don't yer know."

IN the Senate, last week, Senator Frye got into a stew over the Can. fishery question. Senator Ingalls sat in his perch and pouted, and Senator Edmunds said the Dominion Government couldn't cod him as long as he had his hearing. The opposition was cast into the shadow; but there was a good deal of de bait before the subject was finished.—Independent.

DOWN in Ohio a woman had a drummer arrested for winking at her. When the trial came off, it was found that the eye which she claimed he wunk, was a very clever glass imitation of the human optic. Of course this put a stop to the suit, but she was bound to get square with somebody, so she found out where the eye was made, and presented a bill to the firm for the advertising she had given them.

"You hav heard all the evidence," said the judge in summing up, "you hav also heard what the learned counsel hav said. If you believe what the counsel for the plaintiff has told you, your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, you believe what the defendant's counsel has told you, then you will giv a verdict for the defendant. But if you are like me, and don't believe what either of them hav said, then I'll be hanged if I know what you will do."

AGENT (selling preparation for removing stains from clothing)—"I hav got here—" Servant (who responds to the agent's ring)—"Excuse me, please, but we are in great trouble here to-day. The gentleman of the house has been blown up in an explosion." A.—"Ha! hurt much?" S.—"Blown to atoms. Only a grease spot left of him." A.—"Ha! Only a grease spot, you say? Well, here's a bottle of my champion eradicator which will remove that grease spot in two minutes."

THE "Town Tatler," of the New York Sunday Star, tells this: I read a good story this week about Henry W. Grady, the editor of the Atlanta Constitution. Some years ago a paragraph was printed in the Constitution, saying that a man well known in a certain circle of Atlanta society had died. The next day the alleged dead man called at the Constitution office and demanded a retraction. "This paper," said Mr. Grady, "never takes back anything it has said, and will not in this case, but if you insist that you hav been misrepresented, why, we'll put you among the births. That will square it."

ONE of the most entertaining bits of autobiography we hav ever read is the following account of his professional life, with its disappointments and rewards, by a Texas editor: .

Gems of Thought.

OF chance or charge, oh, let not man complain,
Else never, never, shall he cease to wail.
—Beattie's Minstrel.

IF all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind. Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted upon only a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race: posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth: if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception of truth produced by its collision with error.—Mill's Liberty.

WHILE the churches were encouraging slavery in this country, the "Infidels" generally were educating the people up to an appreciation of its unjust character and pernicious influence. Christianity, adding meanness and falsehood to its crimes against reform and progress, now claims the credit of having prepared the people to abolish slavery, when the fact is, the whole influence of the system was in favor of slavery, and its advocates brought the teachings of the Bible to sustain it, until the progress of liberal and humane sentiments produced a change in public sentiment.—Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

THE claim of superiority of the worshipers of Jesus is based upon the transcendent quality of his moral teachings: that he enunciated a code of moral maxims such as the world has never been able to boast of before or since. This claim is totally unfounded.—D. M. Bennett.

GOD does not giv a bird wings, and then damn it for flying.—Anon.

STRANGE it is that men should admit the validity of the arguments for free discussion, but object to their being "pushed to an extreme;" not perceiving that unless the reasons are good for an extreme case, they are not good for any case. Strange that they should imagin that they are not assuming infallibility when they acknowledge that there should be free discussion on all subjects which can possibly be doubtful, but think that some particular principle or doctrin should be forbidden to be questioned, because it is so certain, that is, because they are certain it is certain. To call any proposition certain, while there is any one who would deny its certainty if permitted, is to assume that we ourselvs, and those who agree with us, are the judges of certainty, and judges without hearing the other side.—Mill's Liberty.

MATERIALISTS [and philosophical Radicals, Agnostics, etc.] generally regard Jesus—the records of whose life are very scanty and largely fabulous, and of whose existence even there is some ground for doubt—as probably a man of no great intellect, but of a benevolent heart, of some chimerical and fanatical notions, together with a good deal of moral wisdom, a man thoroughly conscientious, who lived a life of purity, and died a martyr to his faith and supposed mission. As a reformer and a benefactor he has our esteem and gratitude. Could he return to earth at the present day, there is scarcely a doubt that he would be regarded by a large proportion of his professed followers somewhat as he was by the Pharisees of eighteen hundred years ago. He would probably find less cordial welcome, and less courteous treatment, in the churches where worship is performed in his name, than in the Liberal halls where his character is freely criticised, and the miracles ascribed to him are ridiculed as fabulous and foolish.—Underwood.

THE natural philosopher [or physicist], in addition to the sensations common to all men inspired by the event of death, believes that he sees with more certainty that it is attended with the annihilation of sentiment and thought. He observes the mental powers increase and fade with those of the body, and even accommodate themselvs to the most transitory changes of our physical nature. Sleep suspends many of the faculties of the vital and intellectual principle; drunkenness and disease will either temporarily or permanently derange them. Madness or idiocy may utterly extinguish the most excellent and delicate of these powers. In old age the mind gradually whithers, and, as it grew and was strengthened with the body, so does it, together with the body, sink into decrepitude. Assuredly, these are convincing evidences that as soon as the organs of the body are subjected to the laws of inanimate matter, sensation, and perception, and apprehension are at an end.—Shelley's Essay "On a Future State."

A SAINT TRIUMPHANT.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Jan. 18.—The elopement of the Rev. R. L. Bidingfield and Miss Mary Robinson was announced to-day. Bidingfield was a resident of Carroll county and a Baptist minister of more than ordinary ability. He has a wife and several children, whom he abandoned. ## Notes and Clippings.

HERE is a case of "English as she is spoke:" The Russian composer, Dvorak, recently sent the following telegram to the Leeds committeee from Cologne: "I am coming to-day in Victoria. Will somebody snatch me from the station, as I might not recognize the journey?" He was "snatched."

"THERE are three millionaires among the local preachers of the Methodist church in Canada."—Exchange. "And a certain ruler asked him, saying, Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? But Jesus said unto him, Sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor. For it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."—New Testament. Probably an interpolation.

AMONG the effects of J. H. McKnight, found dead in his bed recently in a Chicago hotel, was the following letter addressed to the coroner: "I am going to try the spirit world. I hav always been a square and honest man, and I expect to be so in the world to come. There is nothing that makes one man greater than another but honesty, and if I find anybody in the other world that ain't honest, I expect to cuss him out and pass on. There is a great spirit that rules the universe, and that spirit is honesty. George Washington was a great man. Why? Because he was honest. Abraham Lincoln was a great man. Why? Because he was an honest man. Honesty is all in this world and all in the world to come. Bob Ingersoll is the smartest man in America and but few people know it. He is too smart to believe that something can be made of nothing. He is too smart to believe that the being that is represented as being love would consign his creatures to everlasting fire. There is a great spirit that rules this universe, but who is he and where did he come from? Let him come up and giv an account of himself. How did he get his position? He seems to be a big bug."

THE facts in a case which illustrates the rigid rules of the Catholic church concerning divorced people hav just been made public at Louisville, Ky. Michael McCoy, a grocer of that city, has been excommunicated from St. Patrick's Catholic church, owing to his marriage with a Miss Emma Long after having secured a divorce from his wife. On the night of his nuptials with Miss Long, his neighbors and his former church associates surrounded the house and threatened him with violence, until quelled by the police. In reading McCoy out of the church, Father Lawler denounced him and the marriage, and declared that he would not tender the man his services though he were upon his dying bed. He also forbade any of the members of his church to speak to or in any way recognize McCoy.

THIS is Beecher's way of looking at the Knights of Labor and their strikes: "It is a curse of European governments that they insist upon taking care of the people. The people can take care of themselvs. This abomination, the Knights of Labor, is the result of this infernal idea of paternity of government. Because a few men in New Jersey think their employers hav wronged them, all this nation is called upon to suffer on the order of this paternal government of the Knights of Labor. This is from want of intelligence. The working people are being taken care of by the Knights of Labor, instead of taking care of themselvs, and people all over the land are being punished, and business is stagnated because of it, just because a few men in Jersey hav done wrong. The destruction of the poor is their ignorance."

MEMBERS of Parliament come cheap. Labouchere tells the following story of a Radical member of the British House of Commons: "The atmosphere of the House of Commons does not seem to agree with Radicals. They soon want to become fine gentlemen. He remembered a case in one of the divisions with regard to the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. About ten minutes before the division a highly respectable gentleman on the Liberal side of the House came to me and said, 'You know I hav been thinking this over, and my conscience won't allow me to vote for Bradlaugh.' I replied, 'I hav not got time enough to talk about your conscience—what do you want?' The member said: 'What do you mean? I am not that sort of a person;' whereupon I said, 'Do you want to be made a knight?' and the gentleman replied, 'No, you are entirely mistaken.' I next asked him, 'Hav you got a wife?' and he answered, 'Yes.' 'Well, do you get asked to those crowds, those receptions at the Foreign Office?' The honorable member admitted that he and his wife rather complained that they had not, and then I said, 'You go in and vote, and I'll see that you are asked to them in the future,' and in about ten minutes I polled that patriot in." Even a New York alderman would scorn to sell his vote for such a low consideration.

THE case of the Chicago Anarchists, as it now stands, is briefly this: These men, while convicted in the court below, hav secured a writ of supersedeas from the chief justice of the state of Illinois, staying and virtually nullifying the sentence, and placing these men again in the position of being innocent until proven guilty, if and until the supreme court in full session shall say whether or not the entire record shows defects sufficient to warrant a new trial. In cases of property, where money is at stake, there a writ of error is a writ of right, and virtually means nothing except that the court will consent to review the case. But where life is involved, and a man sentenced to die, a writ of error is not a writ of right, and the court issues it only when upon examination of the records sufficient errors appear to justify its issuance. The supreme court of Illinois can issue no supersedeas in a case of death penalty unless it believes there was an unfair trial. Judge Scott did so believe; he issued a writ of error, which, if sustained by the full court, puts those men in position of being innocent until proven guilty; and this supersedeas by Judge Scott so places these men until the full session of the court is held. Mr. Spies is not under sentence of death. The sentence, by which he was to die on December 3d was suspended, and destroyed by the supreme court. Mr. Spies is not sentenced to be hung, and cannot be hung until resentenced; and cannot be sentenced until retried, if the supreme court sustains Judge Scott. He has a right to all the civil franchises of a citizen; he can make civil contracts, and is to-day signing agreements to write certain articles; he can contract for property, sign deeds, and make a will.—Knight of Labor.

Thomas Paine.

In the world's history volumes are devoted to commemorate men who hav besieged cities merely for bloody conquest, subdued provinces only to enslave them, and overthrown empires simply to set up other tyrants. Seldom, if ever, in their own generation do moral heroes receive the gratitude, honor, or reward their unselfish services deserve.

The highest intellects, or those intellectually in advance of the masses, always look to the good of others, not personal aggrandizement, and, being the least ambitious among men, it remains for future generations to place on them the "diadem immortal."

Fame seems like a river that bears upon its surface the lighter substances, but in which the weightier and solid sink until a more progressiv and appreciativ intelligence reverently resurrects the memory of those whose high resolves burnt deep within their hearts, and who, with the electrifying eloquence of justice, roused men to wrench the New World from the hands of royal imbecils.

In the line of mankind's saviors, few seem to hav possessed such singular proof of capacity, such deep insight into the meaning of things, such courage, perseverance, and freedom from either bigotry or dissimulation as he whose name we recall to honor, on the 29th of January, the immortal Thomas Paine.

Paine's birthplace, home, pursuits, habits, and early associates are an oft-told tale, and to recite these unimportant facts to Freethinkers, who know and venerate him for his public services, seems largely a work of supererogation. Still for those who may be unfamiliar with these facts, it is well to briefly restate some of them. The hero whose memory every handful of true Freethinkers throughout this country will to-day commemorate—a duty in which every good citizen of this republic should participate—was born of Quaker parents, in Thetford, County Norfolk, England, one hundred and fifty years ago to-day. He received but a limited education, being substantially self-taught, and was successivly a stay-maker, sailor, exciseman, tobacconist, and teacher. In 1772 he published his first political pamphlet, showing the evils arising from the inadequate payment of excisemen, their liability to bribery, etc. This brochure was sent to Benjamin Franklin, and induced him to recommend the poor author to come to America. On what trivial pivots great destinies turn! He came with the intention of teaching—especially with the design of elevating the education of woman, and edited a magazine then published in Philadelphia. In that publication his first poems appeared, and one of those, "The Liberty Tree," shows how he began to imbibe that supreme passion for liberty which seems to hav taken entire possession of his after life.

His ardor for the revolution increasing, he devoted himself entirely to political literature, and in January, 1774, published the spark that fired the train of independence—that lucid, admirably-reasoned pamphlet, "Common Sense." This flew in tens of thousands of copies all over the colonies. It soon seized on the minds and hearts of the people, and cast all other authors in the shade. Its effect was electrical.

Remember that Delaware, Maryland, and New Jersey had already restrained their delegates in Congress from advocating open revolt.

Bancroft's History shows that even in November, 1775:

> The legislature of Pennsylvania was in session. It still required its members to take and subscribe the qualifications which include the promis of allegiance to George III. It elected nine delegates to the Continental Congress; of these Benjamin Franklin was one—the only one who was the unhesitating champion of independence. These were their instructions: We direct that you exert your utmost endeavors to agree upon and recommend such measures as you shall judge to afford the best prospect of affording redress of American grievances, and restoring that harmony between Great Britain and the Colonies so essential to the welfare and happiness of both countries. Though the oppressiv measures of the British Parliament and administration hav compelled us to resist their violence by force of arms, yet we strictly enjoin you, that you, in behalf of this colony, dissent from and utterly reject any proposition, should such be made, that may cause or lead to a separation from our mother country, or a change of the form of this government.

That sort of conservatism had been at work too long. Franklin saw the people must be aroused, and he knew the only man capable of flashing the torch of freedom was Thomas Paine, who in that memorable appeal for independence embodied in words the vague longing of the whole country, for, in great emergencies, statesmen are seldom as radical or correct as their constituents.

Listen to this great-hearted heretic's plea for independence:

> Every quiet method of peace hath been ineffectual; our prayers hav been rejected with disdain; reconstruction is now a fallacious dream. Bring the doctrin of reconciliation to the touchstone of nature; can you hereafter love, honor, and faithfully serve the power that has carried fire and sword into your land? Ye that tell us of harmony, can ye restore to us the time that is past? The blood of the slain, the weeping voice of nature cries, 'tis time to part. The last cord is now broken; the people of England are presenting addresses against us. A government of our own is our natural right. Ye that love mankind, that dare oppose not only tyranny but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression; Freedom hath been hunted round the globe; Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart; oh, receive the fugitiv, and prepare an asylum for mankind.

As a match touched to powder fires a magazine, so these fiery words set the country ablaze, and this common fire blazed luridly in the Continental Congress. This secured the union of all the states, and the Declaration of Independence was produced. America listened to Paine's grand, resistless appeal; she received gladly for awhile the fugitivs who had been hunted round the globe, and, in some respects; partially realized the daring dream of that heroic soul who contributed such nervous eloquence to make this republic a worthy asylum for mankind.

We cannot follow in detail the story of the Revolution, but we can record that the shout of victory was for the sturdy colonists as a result of Thomas Paine's powerful earnestness, sterling honesty, and strength of logic when espousing the cause of Liberty.

Paine soon became secretary of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was the accepted oracle on subjects of constitutions and governments. The University of Pennsylvania conferred on him the degree of Master of Arts; he was elected a Member of the American Philosophical Society, and the state of Pennsylvania gave him a grant of £500. Why? Because his "Crisis" sustained the army, excited the national sympathy, and produced money and union in support of the war at every crisis when a number appeared. Though a poor man, Paine headed the subscription for the distressed soldiers with $500—the last dollar he had. He gave the fruit of his brain for the common good, refusing to copyright his works, so that they would be republished, hav wider circulation, and thus increase their influence. He originated public opinion, molded it, and led it to final success, so that John Adams remarked that "in vain would hav been the sword of Washington (worthy as he was) but for the pen of Paine."

After the war the Paine farm of three hundred acres, worth ten thousand dollars, was presented as a testimonial by the state of New York, and Congress awarded him three thousand dollars as a mere compliment, apologizing for the smallness of the sum on account of the poverty of the Union, burdened, as it then was, by the expense of the war.

He then visited Europe, introduced iron bridges in England, and mixed with the best talent of the day, but when the fawning flatterer of royalty, Edmund Burke, wrote his "Reflections on the French Revolution," Paine shot out his modern thunderbolt, the "Rights of Man," and shivered the aristocratic sham to atoms. His previous political works had largely produced the revolution in France, and as a result already that high altar of despotism, the Bastile, had been destroyed.

Public recognition of his great service to the American republic did not result in his calmly sitting down to enjoy what was then willingly bestowed, but merely intensified his determination and increased his enthusiasm to strike stronger and deeper into prevailing infamous frauds, whose outgrowth were hypocrisy, vice, and ferocity in France. To him, "the peace of slavery was worse than the war of freedom."

Mixing with Condorcet (whom he transformed from a famous mathematician to a famous Socialist), Brissot, Mme. Roland, Petion, Claviere, and Buzot, La Republican was the medium through which Paine, assisted by this brilliant coterie, sent their exciting exhortations through France.

As an illustration of the power of his pen, an act of Parliament was considered necessary to suppress his works in England about that period.

You all know Paine's glorious service for liberty in France, where, elected to the National Assembly from several places at once, he stood the solitary representativ of justice and mercy. Refusing to support Robespierre in the death of Louis Capet—though willing to "kill the king, he was anxious to save the man"—he fell under suspicion (for the wrongs of ages had transformed men into tigers, whom nothing but human blood could satisfy), was imprisoned and condemned; and while daily awaiting death, calmly prepared his "Age of Reason," which he dedicated to the American people, still as solicitous for our mental liberation as he was for our physical freedom. Contemplate that sublime spectacle—the man who on the brink of existence, daily expecting to ascend the scaffold to the gory knife, where the gray hairs of aged men mingled with the tresses of beautiful women—the one man unterrified in an age of terrors—fearless alike of life or death, dreading nothing but dishonesty, devoted these (supposed) last hours to writing the boldest criticism on the Bible that had ever seen the light of day! The "Age of Reason" is the red rag before the ecclesiastical bulls; it is the gage of defiance for all theologians of Christianity to answer, but their answer never has nor never will come. From this onslaught of Paine's largely dates the downfall of faith, the destruction of bigotry, and the elevation of mankind to mental liberty. The fangs of the clergy were then directed against him, and he replied with the second part of the "Age of Reason."

Since then, treacherous misrepresentation, bitterest calumny, vilest vituperation, hav been malignantly hurled upon his name for three-quarters of a century; but as we clear away this debris of bigotry and persecution, brighter gems of genius and grander characteristics are revealed.

On the overthrow of the republic by Napoleon, Paine returned to the United States, the condemned, the ostracized, the hated by all the priestcraft, who hav not yet ceased to employ their spiteful venom.

To this man who first wrote the words, "The United States of America," the undoubted author of our Magna Charta, the Declaration of Independence, and the securer of that independence, no reverential shaft rears its lofty column in these United States! Why this neglect? No, not neglect, for a monster monument was erected—one which it was hoped would securely hide the true man from view forever. That monument was slander.

As Courbet, the French artist-Communist, led the populace of Paris, in 1871, to pull down the Column Vendome, built to commemorate the butcheries of their brethren by Bonaparte, so we Freethinkers, by these annual services, are hurling down on the heads of those who built them the pyramids of falsehoods which hav rested so long on the fair fame of Thomas Paine.

The priest has been aided in his defamation of this great defender of true principle by the aristocrat—when not the latter by the capitalist. As capitalism is sure to create an aristocracy, so a constitutional government is often but the mask whereby the people, through ignorance, indifference, or necessity, are lured to embrace a greater tyranny by their oppressors than armed legions could maintain. This capitalism has created an American aristocracy more relentless, cruel, and heartless than those of Europe.

Thomas Paine well said that the constitutional government of England gave just enough liberty to enslave a people more effectually than by open despotism, and boldly advised the people to "lay the ax at the root, and teach governments humility." Alas for the traditions of American freedom! Similar sentiments uttered in the United States one hundred and fifty years after Paine's birth, and only seventy-eight since he died, are punished with death. Seven Freethinkers and reformers lie in the Chicago jail awaiting the dread sentence (which only a new trial may remove) for uttering far less violent views. During that iniquitous trial activ steps were taken to crush free discussion and the expression of individual opinion. Under the pretense of combating unconstitutional measures the authorities overthrew the Constitution themselvs. For, if the freedom of the press and of private opinion are to be assailed by government, then, indeed, hav the people degenerated, or never learned the lesson which such heroic souls as Thomas Paine labored so earnestly to instil. It is not strange when we remember that theological rancour has, by odious lies, almost obliterated the principles he taught as well as the important part which Paine, and other Freethinkers, played in founding what might hav been the substructure of that "great asylum for mankind."

No longer do we welcome representativs of liberty to America—they are now "foreign disturbers," and must be denounced. But society goes into convulsions on the advent of a scion of the "blue-blooded" aristocracy of Europe, who are morally thieves and intellectually idiots. Such are the patriotic standards of the latter part of the nineteenth century. Such were the standards of the Roman republic when its corruptions had grown ripe for judgment. But these are only transitory—only prove the recklessness of ruin to which our aristocracy are fast drifting.

> Is true freedom but to break
> Fetters for our own dear sake,
> And, with heathen hearts, forget
> That we owe mankind a debt?
> No! true freedom is to share
> All the chains our brothers wear,
> And, with heart and hand, to be
> Earnest to make others free!
> They are slaves who fear to speak
> For the fallen and the weak;
> They are slaves who will not choose
> Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
> Rather than in silence shrink
> From the truth they needs must think;
> They are slaves who dare not be
> In the right with two or three.

Well may we remember the words of Madam Roland, as she turned on the scaffold to gaze on the statue, "O Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name!" when we think of those whose hands are already imbrued in the blood of innocent victims. The unpunished murderers of the capitalistic rioters (or their Pinkerton agents) in East St. Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee denote the desperation of a class on the verge of a speedy downfall. Justice cries aloud for vengeance.

> They may veil their eyes, but they cannot hide
> The sun's meridian glow;
> The heel of a priest may tread thee down,
> And a tyrant work thee woe;
> But never a truth has been destroyed;

They may curse it and call it crime;
Pervert and betray, or slander or slay
Its teachers for a time;
But the sunshine aye shall light the sky,
As round and round we run;
And the truth shall ever come uppermost,
And justice shall be done.

Year by year, the toiling millions are receiving a broader education—largely the result of necessity. Once let them realize true social ethics, their collectiv momentum will insure the enforcement of a new Declaration of Independence. The second Declaration is as just as the first, and is its natural result. The first founded our political independence; the second will secure our industrial interdependence. The first was founded by the bullet, but it is hoped to establish the second by the ballot.

Then let the rallying cry of Freethinkers and social reformers be: "Ye that love mankind, that dare oppose not only tyranny but the tyrant, stand forth!"

Paine died in 1809 comparativly deserted, and few dared own his friendship after his fearless pamphlet, the "Age of Reason," appeared.

He might hav had his faults, but the faults of such noble souls are like foothills around the base of lofty mountains—the nearer we stand to them, the more they obscure our judgment of their true proportions by hiding the peaks that rise beyond. But when we draw farther off, they slowly shrink into the plain, while the mountain giant, at first obscured, rises free and clear in majestic grandeur. Even so, as we look at the life and deeds of this great hero, do we realize how insignificant were any faults he possessed, compared with the grandeur of his purpose.

Truth was the great magnet whose influence he obeyed; where that guided, Paine implicitly followed, and thus this unselfish philosopher and patriot spent his life in a continual struggle for the good of others.

With a wise head and loving heart, he reasoned not for confutation, but to weigh, consider, and determin how best to counteract the vile hordes whose constant endeavor was to make men drudges and slaves to royal and theological taskmasters. Paine's mind seems a deep well, which was in no danger of being exhausted by the copious draughts made upon it. His power and force of character was hightened by his versatility of thought, but thought endowed with keenest perception and finest discrimination. There was nothing of the mean, groveling, selfish panderer in his composition. He was a student of men as well as books, with sympathies and experiences enlarged by contact with the bitter actualities of those in humble life, whose sufferings seemed to deepen, exalt, and awaken him to trumpet-toned utterances for action.

The rights of which Paine wrote were those resting on man's requirements and nature's supply; not rights sanctioned by conventional compact of rulers; not inherited from past generations, but inherent; not received from priests and kings, nor secured by their parchments, but rights derived from the fact of existence and embraced in the very charter of our being. Knowing that liberty makes life, and that life should be strong enough to guard and maintain liberty, he also knew that the pursuit of happiness flows from freedom of action, and that when government presumes to regulate the volition of a people a great crime is committed and desolating oppression is enforced. "Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" must be conditions of existence, for unless we exercise those functions we become diseased, and a portion of the body politic perishes.

To face a danger manfully is to comprehend its import and its power, and in this his forethought was prophetic, as even to-day the most advanced social and political reformer can still extract nourishment from his works.

With Paine it was unmanly to murmur at loss of time, money, or energy. Great wisdom, devotion, and sacrifice were necessary to reform abuses and suppress existing evils, and gladly he gave all; to him it was cowardly to shrink from danger—even of death at the gory guillotin.

Paine left us a reflex of his character in the sublime sentence: "The world is my country; to do good is my religion." There never was counselor more faithful, patriot more sincere or successful, statesman with keener or more comprehensiv views, or a man more unassuming, yet of firmer or more decided qualities.

May Americans long appreciate the genius and reverence the virtues of their noble benefactor, for he left them a legacy greater than his works—the contemplation of his high-souled, unselfish character.

In Protestant Prussia the Catholics hold the districts of richest agriculture and most famous traditions. According to the latest census, they form a mass of 9,600,000 earnest Catholics as against 18,000,000 nominal Protestants, not more than four or five millions of whom ever attend any place of worship or hold a single dogma of positiv Christianity.

Mr. Reynolds in the Nutmeg State.

Through the efforts of Prof. G. G. Grower arrangements were made for me to lecture on Sunday afternoon and evening, January 30th, before the Ansonia Liberal Society, which was organized at my last visit, and was one of the good results of the New York Freethinkers' Association convention. Despite discouragements, the society is holding its own and doing valiant service for Freethought. The officers deserve especial thanks. Through the services of Mr. Grower the science Sunday-school cannot fail to continue to increase in interest and usefulness.

The weather on my last visit was very unfavorable, but I had a good and very appreciativ audience at the afternoon lecture on "The Heaven of the Bible." It is strange that, while all Christians claim to be striving to reach heaven, and tell us that, no matter how great the suffering, privation, or self-denial, heaven will amply repay for all, yet no two agree as to just what sort of a place it is, or just what happiness in heaven consists of. The only one point in regard to heaven, which all Christians I hav ever met fully agree upon, is that they hav no desire for immediate admittance to its joys. The most intensely selfish creature that ever embraced Christianity—preëminently the religion of selfishness—always eager to be first to partake of the joys of earth, is not alone quite willing, but desirous, to be the very last to partake of the joys of heaven. Nay, he prefers that all his wife's poor relations, even his wife herself, shall go to heaven ahead of him. It is conceded that the Bible alone givs any idea of heaven; and after I had by chapter and verse described this land of the blessed, one young man in the audience declared, "I'm blest if a blessed one on 'em ever wants to get to such a cussed heaven."

This lecture set some of the Christian friends to thinking, and will yet induce them to seek heaven here and now—a heaven that consists in a home of gentleness and love, heavenly peace and joy, that comes of helping and making glad some sorrowing heart, in preference to the Bible with its candlesticks, snuffers, altars, flesh-hooks, ash pans, and angels.

In the evening the hall was crowded. I spoke on "Religious Persecutions of the Nineteenth Century." After the lecture two gentlemen essayed to defend the faith. The hand-bills announcing the lecture kindly invited the clergy to attend and defend their cause. This they lacked courage or courtesy to do, but it was evident our two friends had come fully prepared, for a very large number crowded the outer hall—as many as could squeeze in—and tried all they could to sustain their champions. I giv a few of their assertions and my replies:

First Gent.: "We are indebted to the church for our advance in education and for all our scientific discoveries. All knowledge comes from God and the Bible. There is no other source of knowledge."

I quoted from the pastoral letter of the House of Bishops of the Episcopalian church, published in the Churchman of Nov. 6, 1886, and read in all the Episcopal churches, which declares unbelief is rife and widespread in all the churches, because of the enlargement of knowledge, scientific discoveries, and the freedom of the press; and the bishops announce, "Blessed be God, the church has something better than philosophy, education, or learning in which to trust, namely, the word and spirit of the living God." I quoted 1 Cor. iii, 19—"For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." The church has always opposed science, and tried to silence or torture to death the benefactors of the human race. They burnt Bruno for giving us some facts in astronomy, denounced Faust and Gutenburg as having dealings with the devil, declared printing of the evil one, the steam-engin the work of Antichrist, and the telegraph of Beelzebub. All knowledge did not come from God and the Bible. There were other sources of wisdom, if the New Testament was true. I quoted Acts vii, 22: "And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians."

First Gent.: "The true church never persecuted. Persecution was the work of the false church. Persecution or cruelty was directly contrary to all the teaching of Jesus."

I assured the gentleman that the Spanish Inquisition was founded, justified by the declarations of Christ and the apostle Paul, and quoted John xv, 6—"If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burnt;" and 2 Thess. i, 7, 8—"The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." Paul and his followers in New Jersey would inflict torture on the flesh out of love for the soul. "Deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. v, 9).

First Gent.: "You claim to hav been a minister; you did not believe as you do now; you do not know what the church was; the true church was always right; you are blaming on the true, the acts of the false church; you do not know what the church is; do you know?"

I told the gentleman that I knew that every denomination claimed to be the church—God's special favored few, the Israel of God, and denounced all others. I knew the more devout the Bible worshipers, the more intensely they hate any who differ with them.

First Gent.: "Christians never hate; that is, the true church does not. Hate is all of the devil. Christ never taught hate, but only love. Read his teachings."

I read Luke xix, 27: "But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me." And Luke xiv, 26: "If any man come to me, and hate [Greek miseo, to detest, to abhor] not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life, he cannot be my disciple."

First Gent.: "What would woman be but for the church? A mere slave. Christianity has made woman independent and respected. Women owe everything to the church."

I quoted from the pastoral letter of the House of Bishops: "The Infidel theory declares the individual to be the supreme unit of society, and so demands for every individual complete and equal freedom. It affirms all discriminating legislation based upon differences of sex to be degrading and tyrannical, and claims for woman an absolute control over her patrimony and acquisitions, as well as over her person. Thus the Christian law of the household is disparaged and denounced.

"The essentials of domestic life hav been ordained and established by the will of God, and underlie the constitution of society. These it is the function of civil government to protect and regulate, but not to change." The church would follow the teachings of the Bible, and degrade woman, not elevate her; would here in free America hav the earnings of the wife appropriated by the husband, and the wife deprived even of right to her own person. This is the doctrin of the true church, for it is founded on Bible, which makes motherhood a sin, and teaches women hav no rights the man, saint of God, need respect. "Let the women learn in silence, with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach" (1 Tim. ii, 11, 12). "Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak, but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home, for it is a shame for women to speak in the church" (1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35).

First Gent.: "I would not trust any one who did not believe in the Bible and a future state. There is nothing to keep people from every crime you can think of only the fear of punishment hereafter."

I tried to convince the gentleman that he would not steal my handkerchief even if sure the constable did not see him, and that he would never be found out. People are honest or dishonest, virtuous or vicious, good or bad, not because of fear of hereafter, but from their heredity and environment. The Christian religion is a system of rewards and punishments, and teaches to do good in hope of reward; avoid evil from fear of hell, not from principle. We should do good because it is right—from love of right and hate of evil. It is not true God made us; we are what our parents and grandparents made us.

Then the first gentleman ran away and elbowed his way out of the crowd.

Second Gent.: "The true church deplores the wrongs done by the false church. But God is love and truth—his law is love."

I called attention to the fourth Commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

This law was not good; not true. We should not honor parents if their acts are vile and infamous. We should honor them for the good only. It is not true that good, loving, obedient children liv longer than bad, undutiful children. The God who spoke that command from Mount Sinai, and wrote it on the table of stone, either did not know or wilfully told falsehood.

Second Gent.: "You cannot deny the love of Jesus; he has shed abroad love in all human hearts, all nations of the earth hav given evidence of his holy love."

The Catholic and Protestant are the best evidences that Christ has shed abroad love in all human hearts. The Christian nations of Europe to-day are building forts and massing their armies expressly to show the peace and love Jesus has shed abroad in all human hearts.

Second Gent.: "The teaching of the Bible, the blessed New Testament, makes all who will believe it tender, pitiful, and good to each other."

I read 2 John x: "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrin, receive him not unto your house, neither bid him God speed."

Second Gent.: "I won't deny the Bible. I hav no more to say when you read it out of the Bible."

The discussion lasted about one hour and a half; our Liberal friends were jubilant over it, and hope some one of the ministers may be induced to come to the rescue of their faith.

News and Notes.

Early Saturday morning, February 5th, I arrived at Fort Madison, Ia., a beautiful town of six thousand inhabitants, on the banks of the Father of Waters, which trends to the westward here, as like a broad lake it goes sweeping by, flowing again to the southward six miles away at Nauvoo, the once famous Mormon city, with temple of polished limestone. From a noble declivity the village greets the eye with imposing appearance, although it can boast only of a thousand people. The temple is gone. Not a stone is left. Joe Smith, whatever might hav been his moral derelictions, had an eye for beauty and use. He knew a good thing when he saw it, and the site he selected for his city is one of the finest on the banks of the Mississippi. Descending on three sides in rolling lands to the majestic stream—wide almost as a bay—toward the interior it spreads in gentle and fruitful prairies. A lovely place, indeed, for the New Jerusalen! But the dream has vanished, and Mormonism was obliged to go marching on. It does seem, however, as if the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. The Mormons left their desolated home, numbering six thousand. They now count two hundred and fifty thousand.

Summer time is beautiful in this country, and there are many pleasure resorts about Fort Madison, and it now has a somewhat metropolitan aspect, for a boom has spread its lively colors in the air. A new railroad is to pass through, a bridge built across the river, and shops located here, and every man you meet has speculation in his eyes, and corner lots whirl dizzily upward. There is no doubt, however, of a solid increment in the wealth and industry of the city.

There is a state penitentiary here. On Saturday afternoon, with my friend, Frank M. Gustin, I passed within its gloomy portals with a kind of shudder. I don't fancy prisons. The thick walls make my heart sick. As I went into the warden's room I saw a young convict in prison uniform talking in quiet tones with a pretty lady, evidently his sister, or perhaps sweetheart. What a romance in this simple scene! woman ever faithful and loving, even amid the shadows of disgrace. So the horror is jeweled with beauty.

There are nearly four hundred criminals in this institution, and they work at various occupations, and take it comfortably ten hours a day with three square meals. They hav plenty of substantial food, and leisure to eat it. They don't hav to be in a hurry like railroad passengers. They breakfast and dine together, and carry their suppers to their cells, which are very neat institutions, oramented, some of them, with flowers, pictures, etc., and in each of them there is an electric light which blazes away with palatial effulgence until nine o'clock. Up to that time they can read, after that they sleep and dream till six o'clock in the morning. There is a library in which novels and sermons are curiously mixed, but the sermons hav a quiet time of it, while the novels hav evidently gone the rounds of every cell—a good sign. I was pleased to notice among the novels the story of our brilliant Chicago friend, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, "Somebody's Ned;" one of the most successful of our Western romances. But I didn't see the "Lay Sermon" there. I wish every criminal could read it. Its blessed humanity would be better than a thousand preachers. They hav the privilege of an evening school also, of Sunday services with a good orthodox chaplain who gets twelve hundred dollars per year, while the surgeon only gets six hundred, and the keepers six hundred. Those who do the real service receive half pay. The chapel has a stack of Bibles and "Gospel Hymns," and its walls are plentifully besprinkled with scripture texts, such as, "The Lord is thy Shepherd," "Create in me a clean Heart," "Trust in God," etc. Now, I think it would be better to hav such mottoes as these, "Honesty is the best policy," "Ignorance is the mother of crime," "Labor conquers all things," etc.

As a matter of fact, these criminals hav more of the comforts of life than hundreds of millions of innocent people. I believe that two-thirds, if at liberty to go, would remain. I would myself rather be here than tramp it this cold weather. Put in the element of free will, and this modern prison house is as pleasant as the old orthodox heaven. I am sure it's much more enlivening to make shovels, hoes, pitchforks, boots and shoes, chairs, etc., and eat, drink, and sleep, than to play on a harp. There is no starvation here, no filth, and if the clothes are not quite stylish, it must be confessed they are all the fashion. Society must and does provide for the criminal, however great a one he may be. When will it equally provide for the honest man, and assure him work and a home? When theology is buried, and science is king.

The weather was rainy and foggy, and the streets icy, all the time of my stay at Fort Madison. In fact, it was so icy that I felt considerably righteous, for I found it impossible to stand without holding on to the railings, and since the Bible declares that "the wicked stand on slippery places," I must be otherwise. I didn't hav a great many present the first night or Sunday afternoon, but Sunday evening the attendance was fair. Some came twenty-five or thirty miles to attend the lectures, in spite of nature's frowns, and so the audience was "fit though few," and we had cheerful companionship. A Secular Union was organized, and I hav high hopes of the Liberal element of this community, that notwithstanding all the difficulties of pioneer Freethought, it will be a grand intellectual and social power.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Tewksbury, and Dr. and Mrs. Moorman while at Fort Madison. These are sturdy radicals, who formerly fought the battle of freedom under the antislavery flag, and their reminiscences of the romantic days of the "underground railroad," and midnight travels, and haystack residences, and wagon loads of grain, plus negroes, flung vivid light upon that momentous era that prepared men's minds for heroic strife. Mr. Tewksbury is a Spiritualist, and Dr. Moorman a Materialist, and so I had both sides of universal thought, and was glad we don't think alike. I rejoice meeting those who traverse different paths of truth.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gustin are earnest Liberals of the kind that keep the world a-moving, and I was pleased to meet with such good comrades.

Dr. and Mrs. Rix H. J. Huiskamp carry the life of Liberalism into art as well as thought. Dr. Huiskamp is not only a generous Liberal, but an enthusiastic musical genius. His violin cost three thousand dollars, and it can make harmony, indeed. These allies of the world's progress are inspiring.

Mr. F. D. Shelden and wife, of Salem, are of the old Quaker stock—and these make excellent radicals. The "inner light" when transformed into the glow of reason, becomes a noble torch of progress. Mr. Shelden was once a preacher, but antislavery and reform brought him to good, sound Secularism. He and his wife, and Mr. T. G. Rook, came twenty miles to hear the lectures, and I shall giv them a call on my return, and lecture at their home, Salem, Iowa. I also expect to lecture at Burlington, Mt. Pleasant, Montrose, Nauvoo, etc., on my return.

Mrs. Sarah McGaw, of Burlington; A. Crandall and W. J. Fisher, of Montrose, also joined our forces from a distance—good soldiers all, in the army of humanity.

Mrs. E. L. Grevitt, H. T. Bradish, M. O. Warner, L. Matlas, and others, of Fort Madison, are those pleasant friends of progress that one delights to meet.

So I left Fort Madison with high hopes and happy remembrance of its cordial welcome, and expect to meet friends again on my return.

I had to get up at half-past four in the morning and travel all day long to Kansas City until 10 P.M. Tuesday morning I am on my way to Belton, Mo. Here I find some good friends, too, and enjoyed my visit, and, as they want me to come again, I think I shall do so. I lectured on Sunday evening on "The New Heaven and Earth," which was favorably received. Some Christians were present, and asked a few questions, which were answered, I hope, to their satisfaction; but I find it hard work to make them stick to the point. They continually fly off into all sorts of irrelevant queries. They need training in logic.

Mr. Dell Barker, C. J. Abbey, A. Hope, G. D. Hope, Frank Blair, Joe Carr, Charles Williams, James Calvert, L. M. Campbell, R. M. Johnson, D. C. Ide, and others make a good, live company for this part of the field, and will do service worthy of the cause.

In order to make connections for Salina, etc., I had to take the midnight freight for Kansas City. It was three hours late, and I had to find a couch upon the floor until three o'clock, with a package of Freethought books for my pillow. At three o'clock the train came along, and from Belton to Olathe I had a bit of a nap over its thundering wheels. Then I had to jump out and make a dive for an extra freight train. I had to put a package on one end of a car in motion, and the other on the other, and then make a leap for the platform, where I landed safely, and again slept, knowing that I was safe for Kansas City this time. But my troubles were not all over. The freight train left me with my luggage, about seventy-five pounds' weight, a mile and a half from the station, not a hack, nor a horse car, nor any means of conveyance at hand; only lines of rail, and looming freight trains and snorting engins. A saw-horse, I believe, would hav been better than nothing, but not even that put in an appearance, nor any other vehicle. I almost wished that a procession of one hundred pirates would come along and do a little swearing, that I might say, Amen. It was the longest mile and a half I ever traversed. I could only go about a rod at a time, and then take a rest on my seventy-five pounds of luggage, like "Patience on a monument." There is lots of human nature in this world. A good fellow came along and gave me a lift for about half a mile. He wanted to know if I would do the same thing for him in New York city. I told him I certainly would lug his baggage for him in New York city if he ever struck me there, and I hereby giv my note of hand that I will lug any unfortunate traveler's baggage a half mile, if I am there, if he has to take his chances with a midnight freight. Well, I thought I earned my grub that morning, and at the elegant passenger station of Kansas City I ate my breakfast with an appetite deeply cultivated by that early twilight pilgrimage.

I am here at Brookville now. Arrived last evening, and lectured to a full house. I had to change dates, Brookville, Feb. 9th and 10th; Bavaria, 14th and 15th; Salina, 11th, 12th, and 13th; Follen, 16th. I thus hav an eight days' campaign laid out for me in this county, and, if last night's meeting is an indication, there will be a most succesful advance movement. I find a splendid element here—enthusiastic Liberals. But more next week when the battle is fought and won. I think I shall hav a good story to tell. On from here I go to Windom, Dodge City, and Garden City. I shall be at Greeley, Col., Feb. 27th; Longmont, March 2d; Denver, 6th and 13; and Boulder City, Central City, Canon City, and other places, I hope, while in Colorado, but arrangements are not yet made. I expect to be in San Diego, March 16th and 17th; Los Angeles, 20th, and 27th; Santa Anna and Santa Barbara between these dates; Tulare and Visalia about the 30th and 31st; San Francisco and Oakland, April 4th and 11th; and Sonoma, Stockton, Sacramento, and other places throughout California, until June 1st. I shall be in Portland, and other places in Oregon, in the month of June; in Washington Territory in July; and about August 1st I expect to return Eastward by way of Baker City, Boise City, Butte City, Salt Lake City, etc.

Will friends be on the lookout and make arrangements for lectures wherever possible? Everything is bright so far, and our lines are rapidly forming.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

California Letter.

DEAR EUGENE: Your kind note is at hand, and I am glad to know that I am not forgotten by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, to my mind, is better than ever before. Those pictures are immense, and, by the way, tell Watson Heston that the very next time I send a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER office with money in it, there will be five dollars in it for him also, sure. He deserves it, and more, from every level-headed radical Liberal in the country, as nothing stirs up the gall of orthodoxy, and keeps the vital issues of Freethought before our people so effectivly as Watson Heston's cunning hand.

You speak of a few letters giving a resumè of the progress of Freethought and my observations and experience in Australia. These I will write with pleasure as soon as I can find the time to do so. I hav hardly had time to say, How are you? to the friends at home, before numerous letters pour in upon me desiring my presence in a half dozen places at once. Oh, that I were a holy ghost, that I might serve all at the same time. But, alas! human limitations hedge me about on every hand. I hav this day received a letter from J. E. Clark, your agent and friend at Los Angeles, which has the ring of true metal in it, and I am glad to be called to Los Angeles, as I will hav the opportunity which I hav long desired, to meet our Brother Putnam, and will do my best, John-the-Baptist-like, to open up the way for him in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties during the months of February, March, and April.

After seeing Brother Putnam I will be better able to mark out my lecture tour of the eastern states, when I hope to take part in our next Liberal Congress, leaving San Jose about the first of May next.

The friends at San Jose, Messrs. Schwartz, Magenheimer, Parsons, Vinter, and others hav already taken up the matter of Brother Putnam's visit there, and will do all in their power to make it a grand success. Our cause in California needs several such as our friend Putnam to thrust in the sickle of Freethought and enlarge the borders of mental liberty. And if this should meet his eye, I hope he will drop me a few lines, and he may be assured that anything that I can do to assist him in our noble cause will be done with all my heart.

The friends of Freethought in San Francisco and Stockton hav recently held rousing Paine celebrations. I am sorry I could not be present; for, as you know, if I hav a high admiration for any man, living or dead, Thomas Paine is that man. The fragrance of his life has furnished inspiration and unanswerable logic to the Ingersolls, Remsburgs, Washburns, and Kelsos of our day. Let us build him a monument! Yes, build it higher every year in the hearts of a liberty-loving people—

> Until all the world be lighted,
> And all true hearts united
> In Reason's righteous reign.

Could Thomas Paine be here to day, he would lift his warning voice not only against a fashionable and effete orthodoxy and a Protestant Christianity which has lost all power to protest, but against Romanism, that most insidious foe to mental liberty which is at this moment fastening its hideous fangs into the vitals of our republic.

I wish there were a thousand newspaper men in the United States like Frank Pixley, of the Argonaut of San Francisco, to drive in the blade of true democracy against the heartless assumptions of both of the rotten-hearted political parties of the day.

What do these time-serving parties care for the perpetuation of our free institutions? Who, with half an eye, cannot see that little by little every feature of Americanism is being eliminated from the fair face of our republic? And never, so long as I liv, will I cast a vote in favor of any man who will pander to this Roman curse, be he James G. Blaine or any other aspirant who bids for this cursed Catholic vote. No true American can wear the collar of this Catholic beast. Not that I hav aught against any foreigner as such, but I hate and fear the minions and virus of popery. What we need is a third great party, American in platform and principle, to lay hold on this scarlet woman, as well as her daughter, and save our country before the lovers of liberty are driven to violence and bloodshed.

I hav also received some hearty and wholesome letters from Seattle, asking for another boost. I like those Seattle people and will crave their patience for a season, when I hope to look into their faces again. Father Crane, of Seattle, one of the stanch friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a real veteran in Freethought, writes a happy letter. Well, how could he help it, when, although he is about eighty years of age, he has been and gone and got married again in his old age? But then I think he showed sound sense, for if any one needs a wife to comfort him and bless his home and setting sun, it is the aged man and woman, who need affectionate companionship in the failing, withering period of life.

In looking over THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 29th, my eye fell upon the obituary of M. P. Thurston, of Burr Oak, Michigan, and my mind went back to the period some ten years since when our friend Thurston called me to hold a grove meeting a short distance from his beautiful rural home in Burr Oak, and his generous hospitality I hav enjoyed on several occasions during my canvass of Michigan. M. P. Thurston was one of nature's noblemen—clear-headed, kind, and yet radical in his views, and a lover of truth for truth's own sake; and to hav him in the front of an audience was a fountain of inspiration, so full of sympathy was he in the expression of radical views against priestcraft and Bible superstition.

Let our old friend rest from his labors and struggles for the right. Other hands will bear the burdens and minister to the cause of Freethought. But none can be more honest and sincere, or more true to our cause than was our friend and brother, Thurston, and the record of his life will long remain to mark the career of a consistent Freethinker and a good man.

The Liberal Club.

It was a salubrious evening when the Manhattan Liberal Club held its 434th regular meeting, and no one could find an excuse for not attending. The hall was therefore full. Mr. Eckhard was present as usual. Mr. Jones, from the Spiritualists' society, had pictures of Mrs. Druse, the Herkimer county lady who wound up an unpleasantness with her husband by shooting several large bullets into his person, cutting him up into sections, and cremating him in a small stove. Mr. Jones had petitions for the commutation of Mrs. Druse's death sentence. It is held that it would be indelicate to hang a woman of her fine sensibilities and tender sympathies. Quite a number of persons signed the petition.

In opening the meeting the Chair announced that it had connected itself editorially with a monthly magazine, copies of which were on the table, and Mr. Erastus Dean would take subscriptions for the same. Then the Chair introduced the speaker of the evening, Col. Andrew H. H. Dawson, of Kentucky, an old-time member of the club. Colonel Dawson was warmly received as he laid his manuscript upon the desk. He has aged somewhat since a dozen years ago the writer, who had never heard much oratory, was first awed by the colonel's eloquence, poured from the platform of the old meeting-room at Science Hall. But though he has grown older, age does not appear to hav materially withered him, nor has custom staled his infinit variety of gesticulation. Mr. Dawson's subject was "Capital Punishment for Men and Women." The custom of hanging, the speaker said, had a theological origin. Moses was the author of the lex talionis—an eye for an eye and a life for a life. But people are losing confidence in Moses. We are finding that he was mistaken on various subjects. His geology is contradicted by the testimony of the strata, and the strata are the vox Dei. The theology of Moses is as questionable as his cosmogony. The colonel objected to capital punishment because the law and those who administered it are liable to make mistakes and hang the wrong person—an error which it is not within their power to rectify. The average jury is generally stupid, and the witnesses are worse. Besides dishonest witnesses, there are honest ones whose ignorance is even more fatal than rascality.

To illustrate the liability of ignorant persons to misunderstand what they see and hear, the colonel told several stories. A boy got the names of Esau and Esop confused, and said that Esau wrote fables and sold the copyright for a bottle of potash. Bridget was requested to serve the tomatoes undressed, and, thinking the word "undressed" applied to herself, appeared en deshabille. An Irishman was told that his wine was "a nectar fit for the gods," but in repeating the compliment to a friend declared that the beverage would make "a nectie for Jesus Christ." A countryman witnessing the play of Othello, and becoming exasperated by the Moor's persistent demands on Desdemona for the handkerchief which he loved so well, arose in his seat and advised the actor to "blow his nose between his fingers, and go on with the play." It was upon the testimony of persons like these, said the colonel, that human lives were taken. He would abolish capital punishment, but if there were those who still believed in the lex talionis of Moses, he was willing to hav a clause in the law that all the disciples of Moses should be hanged.

There was a feeling that the speaker of the evening had been somewhat vague in his remarks, so the Chair spent a few moments in pointing out the conclusions which the colonel had omitted to draw from the premises laid down, and in showing in what manner the lecture bore upon the subject under discussion. Then Judge Groo, or Grove, was called upon for some remarks. The judge is an able jurist, and has been a candidate of the Prohibitionists for president or governor or some other minor office.

Judge Groo, or Grove, said he was glad the Chair had drawn some conclusions from the lecture, as he himself had been unable to effect such a result. He had no sympathy with the flings at Moses and the Bible. He did not think there was any disagreement between Moses and science, but believed that the scriptures told things about as they were. The judge's speech then became an exhortation in favor of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, to which sixty or seventy per cent of murders were ascribable. He opposed capital punishment.

Mrs. Leonard denied the right of men to hang women. When men were on the jury, women were not tried by their peers. The influence of judicial excutions on prospectiv mothers made murderers of children before they were born.

Dr. Weeks held that in hanging women under a law they had no hand in making we were traitors to a representativ form of government. Hanging did not deter from crime. It is on record that in England, when picking pockets was a capital offense, men were arrested for picking pockets while attending the execution of a criminal convicted of that offense.

Herr Oppenheimer wished to raise the question of the right of society to take life; also the question of moral responsibility and free will. Society, according to Karl Marx, has only the right to restrain and reform.

Lawyer Chamberlain called attention to the fact that if a man assaults another man's wife, the other man would be justified by public sentiment in killing him. If he abused his own wife in the same manner, the woman, having no other husband, would not be considered justifiable in becoming her own protector. This applied in the case of Mrs. Druse.

Colonel Dawson closed by saying that Mrs. Druse was inadequately defended. Important testimony was not introduced. Mrs. Druse was justified in the killing, and there were a good many other husbands who should be shot. He would hav the law offer rewards for women who killed their brutal husbands. Women were angels; men, as a rule, were brutes.

At the next meeting (providence permitting) Herr Oppenheimer lectures on Karl Marx's doctrins.

The writer should hav mentioned at the proper place that Miss Helen Gardener was present at the meeting of which an account has just been given. It was observed that Miss Gardener did not avail herself of the free admission extended by the club to Presbyterians and ladies. She was heard to say to the secretary that it was bad enough for women to be denied the right to vote or to be hanged, and to be robbed of other legal prerogativs, without being classed with Presbyterians as deadheads.

The absence of the scrap of rhyme with which this record often ends, promised herein from time to time, has been deplored by many friends. Likewise the absence from the floor, for some weeks past, of Captain Clark is being noted more and more, and made the subject of remark. The badge-pin man will therefore strive—if happily his muse consent—to keep the poet's flame alive, and thus avoid all discontent. And while the lamp holds out to burn, he trusts the captain may return.

Spiritual Photography.

In the report of the Investigating Committee, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 7th, we stated that there was placed in our hands for examination one negativ bearing characteristics entirely different from the rest. While all the others could easily hav been produced without the knowledge of the sitter, it was "the unanimous opinion of the committee that this negativ was produced from actual figures standing near the sitter." I think I may reasonably claim the exposure, on February 2d, in Boston, of Mrs. Ross, the materializing medium, whom I understand to hav been the sitter in that negativ, as some evidence of the correctness of the conclusions which the committee reached.

Answers to Inquirers.

BENJ. S. HOXIE.—Prō-to-plăsm.

GEO. X. YOUNG.—1. Most Christian ministers recognize that logically they cannot sustain their theology in debate. Fifty years ago they thought they could. Hence the old-time debates, and the present refusal by the preachers to discuss. In a word, the reason is, they know more now than formerly. 2. Travelers assure us that the Mohammedan women are a trifle more fanatical than Mohammedan men. It is the nature of women to be more intense in religious and other sentimental matters than men. In doing good or bad, women go further than their brothers.

W. J. SKIDMORE.—The Rev. S. Baring-Gould is a devout English Churchman, and the author of several very learned works, to wit: "Origin and Development of Religious Belief," "Legendary Lives of the Old Testament Characters," "Lost and Hostil Gospels," and "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages." Our correspondent "Antichrist" has made much use of "Lost and Hostil Gospels" (336 pp., London, 1874). In 1878 Antichrist translated the "Book of the Generation of Jesus" ("Sepher Toldoth Jeshu"), which was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and issued in a pamphlet, price twenty cents. He called it the first English translation of that remarkable legend concerning a Jesus who was stoned and hanged for sorcery about 75 B.C. After it was published, he discovered that Baring-Gould had made an earlier translation of a part of the story, also a partial translation of another version of the same, accompanying both with copious comments, but admitting that there was a Jesus who practiced magic in Judea, who was outlawed for being a bastard, and who was stoned and hanged for sorcery a hundred years before the time of Pontius Pilate. Mr. Gould furthermore admits that the Talmud repeatedly refers to that Jesus, while it is entirely silent about any later one. And to prove the fact he translates all the passages from the Talmud relating to Jesus. Another significant admission by Baring-Gould is this at the outset of his book: "It is somewhat remarkable that no contemporary or even early account of the life of our Lord exists, except from the pens of Christian writers. That we hav none by Roman or Greek writers is not, perhaps, to be wondered at; but it is singular that neither Philo, Josephus, nor Justus of Tiberias should hav ever alluded to Christ, or to primitiv Christianity." "Lost and Hostil Gospels" costs about $3 to import.

A Boston Estimate of Sam Jones.

Sam Jones is a cheap and comic version of the Rev. Joseph Cook, with a vulgar coarseness and an obtuseness of intellect wholly his own. In common with his popular prototype, he is windy, illogical, and intolerant. The manner in which he deals with things sacred is offensiv to every refined and intelligent sentiment. His assumed positiv knowledge of the creator and the hereafter, and the blatant, self-confident manner in which he rants it forth, are simply ignorance made bold by encouragement. We are willing to concede the sincerity of Mr. Jones's motivs, and the reality of his religious fervor, but things sacred cannot be treated respectfully from a comic standpoint, and earnest, religious sentiment side by side with funny anecdote and low wit is out of place, to say the least. A cheap method of winning a cheap laugh is not a method by which a dignified knowledge of the higher life may be inculcated. Buffoonery is objectionable under any circumstances, but when it is brought to bear upon the subject of religion, it becomes unutterably offensiv.—Boston Evening Gazette.

SINCE his return west, J. E. Remsburg has delivered twenty lectures in Missouri, and has now commenced work in Illinois. His appointments for this state are as follows: Carlinville, Thursday and Saturday, Feb. 17th and 19th; Litchfield, Friday, Feb. 18th; Girard, Sunday and Monday, Feb. 20th and 21st; Strasburg, Tuesday and Wednesday, Feb. 22d and 23d; Chrisman, Thursday, Feb. 24th; Minier, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, Feb. 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th; Waynesville, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, March 1st, 2d, and 3d; Quincy, Friday, March 4th; Bushnell, Saturday and Sunday, March 5th and 6th; Kewanee, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, March 7th, 8th, and 9th; Lyndon, Thursday, March 10th; Geneseo, Friday and Saturday, March 11th and 12th.

THE Philadelphia Presbytery has voted to strike out from the confession of faith the declaration that "the man may not marry any of his wife's kindred nearer in blood than he may of his own, nor the woman any of the husband's kindred nearer in blood than of her own." This rule could not hav been very well enforced, or Brooklyn's chief Presbyterian ministerial harlequin would not hav his sister-in-law for a wife.

Ethics.*

Life is a web. The under threads are as essential as the upper; indeed, they interchange momently, yet we call those under threads evil, and the upper, good. Without the under the upper could not be. The under and the upper are the same thread. So in life. The highest exaltations of righteousness are the profoundest sins of which we are capable. When Abraham stands ready to sacrifice Isaac, it is holy, in Judea; in Massachusetts, it is wicked. But that is because the Jews are a chosen people, and Massachusetts is honeycombed with Infidelity. So the punishment of the innocent for the guilty is a single thread. When it occurs in a court of justice, it is on the under side of the cloth, and we call it detestable, even in erring humanity. When it occurs in the Christian scheme of salvation, it is on the upper side of the cloth, and we contemplate it with rapt ecstasy as the consummation of all holiness, even in deity. But it is the same thread at the point where we detest it as at the point where we worship it.

This is one of the mysteries in apprehending which religion has the honor of having preceded philosophy. Several years ago, in reviewing Herbert Spencer's "Data of Ethics," I undertook to say that his system did not recognize the manifest duality in ethics; i. e., that all things which are good in their primary effects are evil in their secondary effects, and vice versa, so that no one thing could be spoken of as good or evil in all its effects. Some of the little satellites that revolve around Herbert Spencer denounced my statement as one that prevented the happy nuptials being celebrated between Spencer's ethics and Christian ethics. They do not seem to know that the sources of Christian ethics recognize this duality or conflict between antagonistic laws or contending ethical standards as fully as I did, and hence that to be in full harmony with Christian ethics, Spencer must also recognize it.

Jesus says (1), "It must needs be that offenses come." No man could more plainly state that sin is a necessary outcome of the constitution of things, or in a scientific sense that all sinful acts are performed in obedience to a natural and, therefore, to a divine law. But (2) "woe unto him by whom the offense cometh." Is not this duality? And Paul asks, But if through my lie the truth of God doth the more abound unto his glory, why then am I accounted a sinner? Is not this ethical duality. If the truth of God abounds because of Paul's lie, how is it that it can be a sin for Paul to lie? He does not assert that his lie is or is not a sin. He only asserts the duality of ethical law.

Again, in the Old Testament: "I send the light, and I control the darkness. I make good, and I create evil. I, the Lord, do all these things." In this theory of the duality of ethics, the Bible, though written some years earlier than Spencer's "Data of Ethics," yet succeeds in bringing the discussion more nearly down to date.

With this notion clearly before our minds, that all ethical movement, like all astronomical, molar, and molecular movement, is a movement in the mean between two antagonistic attractions, or is a vibration between majority law or universal law, and minority law or particular law, we proceed to trace the method of ethical evolution of the race, as concerns, first, religion, then work, and finally science.

Suppose pyramid A again to represent the whole body of what men now dead hav imagined, and B the whole body of what men now living hav ascertained. Between these run the lines of mutual influence $x$ and $y$, whose angles of inclination vary in any two persons, and vary in the same person at different times. Out of these varying lines grows the pyramid, Ethical Belief, or the Moral Code of each man, and which evidently can never be the same for any two men.

All men will concede that religion combines all that we don't know, and science all that we do know. The ideas of religion consist essentially in (1) belief in God. (For this science substitutes a recognition of only the universe.) (2) Religion says God created the world. (Science says the world was never created.) (3) Religion says God will redeem the world from sin. (Science says redemption from sin is an impossible dream of visionaries. Men will always sin, and the redeemed will always keep it up nip and tuck in a scrub race with the unredeemed.) (4) Religion says the influence which does most to redeem the world is a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments. (Science says the world has only been damned so far as it has been brought under the ascendency of priests. Witness the shipwreck of civilization for a thousand years, known as the Dark Ages.) From all this the world has been rescued by the labors of men who hav wrought as if this were the only world we shall ever know, viz., for pleasure and for gain.

Between these has arisen a system of ethics, which was a progressiv war in which religion has had a continually diminishing, and science or Atheism a continually increasing share.

In the tenth century the ethical rule was that the pope, representing religion, was supreme over all thrones, codes, and consciences, could depose kings, absolve treaties, repeal laws, and that the clergy were exempt from all courts, penalties, and human laws. The Atheist should be burnt.

The next stage in ethics required that the supremacy of the pope be limited to spiritual things, and his punishments to those which acted on the soul's welfare. But an Atheist should still be burnt. The third stage required that all men should hav the legal right to be Atheists, but in becoming Atheists they lost every other legal right except that of being an Atheist. The fourth stage restores to the Atheist his legal rights, but informs him that, of course, he will expect to be considered a moral outcast. The fifth stage informs him that if he will listen to lectures on ethical culture, and say that he doesn't know whether there is a God or not, but hopes there is one, he will be permitted to take part in the temperance work and prison reform associations.

This progress calls up the practical question, How much has a belief in God and the future life helped men toward an accurate knowledge of the nature of right and wrong, for instance, relativ to the fundamental and primary question of the right of one person to kill another person? A few months ago a pious Episcopalian clergyman of Louisiana, enjoying a large experiential acquaintance with God, in each of his three forms of father, son, and holy ghost, an acquaintance which was hightened by a direct laying on of hands from the apostles down to himself, shot and killed a brother Episcopal clergyman, because the latter, in assisting a young lady to step down from a chair on which she had risen in the effort to reach high enough to put a book into a bookcase, had tendered his assistance in so direct a manner that the young lady had publicly stated among her friends that his conduct was such as to leave them to infer what they pleased.

The Theist who did the shooting has never been tried, and probably never will be. Why? Because it is a universal law of animal life, which has its beginning low down among the vertebrated animals, that the male animal who takes life in the interest of his exclusiv regard for the female, shall be deemed to hav obeyed the higher law. This law prevails among lions, tigers, cats, dogs, wolves, foxes, pirates, politicians, Comanches, Basutos, clergymen, and all other vertebrate animals. It isn't necessary among any of these animals that the female shall hav been injured in word or in thought. It is only necessary that the male animal should hav been enraged, even though he has manufactured in his own imagination the facts which hav produced his rage. Inasmuch as these are the principles which prevail among the vertebrated animals before the evolution of the notion of deity, and as they continue exactly the same after the notion of deity is developed, and the missionary fund rivals the internal revenue in its dimensions—isn't it plain that this notion exercises no sort of influence over our sense of the right or wrong of taking life?

If we analyze the cases in which the life of one man may still be lawfully taken by another, we will find them to be essentially the same as those for which one buffalo may kill another, with the consent of the balance of the herd, viz.:

1. For interfering with the prerogativ or headship of a buffalo in authority. In the human herd we call this resisting lawful authority or legal process, or rebelling against the best government the sun ever shone upon, etc.

2. For interfering with the stamping-ground or rights of property of buffalo No. 1. And so on.

What, then, is the nature of the ethical evolution, both in the individual and the race. It is largely a change from force to purchase, and from purchase to persuasion, as a means of obtaining what we want. Hence the primary agency in effecting the first change from force to purchase is money, or wealth, trade, exchange, and commerce. The chief agency in effecting the second is enlightenment or reason.

In the low stage of productiv industry, the man who needs to influence the will of another has no other means of doing so than the tiger has, viz., to kill. But as mankind advance industrially, there arises a cheaper mode than to kill, or even than to coerce him—that is, to buy him. The real ability of men to avoid killing is in the proportion to their ability to buy the services and cooperation of those whom they hav a desire to command. "Thou shalt not steal." Why? Because, as industry emerges out of barbarism, it is cheaper to buy.

But as society becomes more compact, and the moral sense more developed, we distinguish between commodities or services on the one hand, and conduct on the other, and say it is lawful to buy the former but not the latter, especially if the conduct to be purchased relates to some public office or private trust. In respect to these we advance to the rule, "Thou shalt not buy," but assert a new rule, Thou shalt instruct and persuade.

In this evolution, what the people in any one stage of it style wrong is not something inherently, abstractly, and eternally wrong, but something made obsolete by an advance to a plan of action which has substituted a new mode of inducing action which presupposes a wider harmony of interests.

In savage and barbaric life, and amidst the lower classes in civilized life, if you cross a man's purposes in any way, pay him less wages than he thinks his due, or even refuse him employment, or make the method of his work other than that he desires, he is ready to fight in some form, perhaps openly, perhaps secretly, with his fists, with a club, or by litigation in court; but as he rises in the material scale, each $10,000 he acquires diminishes his ferocity, smoothes his language, wipes out the anxious, contentious, angry wrinkles from his face, renders him more timid in contest and more courteous in his efforts to avoid it, until you get up to a man with whom contest is impossible, on two grounds, viz., first, he can't afford to fight with you; secondly, nobody can afford to fight with him.

Christian Absurdities.

There are stars so far distant that light, traveling at the rate of nearly 200,000 miles per second, would require thousands of years to reach the earth. Yet Christians, for hundreds of years, with knowledge derived directly from God, taught that these stars revolved around the earth every twenty four hours. The velocity of a body revolving around the earth at such a distance would be inconceivable. If the stars were globes of solid cast steel, such a rate of motion would reduce them to fragments in a moment.

It is computed that the star Sirius is many hundred times larger than our sun. Think of the incongruity of such a globe revolving around this little speck of earth. A mountain moved from its base by the attraction of a mole-hill would not involve a greater absurdity. But such was the interpretation of God's holy word by an infallible church. If those who made such egregious blunders were guided by heavenly wisdom, is it not about time to discharge such blind guides and trust more to human intelligence?

It is always on the tongue of some Christian that Christianity is of more importance to the world than all else besides. This assertion has been rung in the ears of the people until the majority have come to believe it without question. For twelve hundred years the world would not have been made worse if the church had been governed by devils. During that time it did nothing which proved a blessing to mankind. We are not yet free from the chains which the church forged during that period of time.

The fear of hell as taught by the church has degraded thousands, and bound the mind in worse chains than ever enslaved the body. The church, not content with putting a devil on the track of men to lure them into evil practices, has absolutely sent him into men to worry and torment them here, and then keep the fires uncomfortably hot down below.

Ever since that little episode in the garden, it has been claimed that there were certain beings and individuals who had power over the devil. And yet ever since that event he has been dragging souls down to hell, contrary to the wishes of those who had power over him; and yet, in the language of Webster, he "still lives."

Somehow he has managed to elude the best efforts of all the saints, saviors, and gods, and still he seems to hold the winning cards. In the Garden of Eden, God made him eat dust and crawl on his belly. Why didn't he come down on him with his squelcher?

At another time, God got to bantering with him about old Job, and they stood face to face, and yet God let him slip through his fingers again. If God was clothed with omnipotent power, and the works of the devil "kindled his fierce wrath," one would think that while he had the devil in hand he would have sat down upon him. Either God lacked the power, or else there is not the enmity between them that Christians have represented. The "Old Fellow" and Christ have had a good many bouts, and although Christ could have made "Old Sooty" get behind him and do just what he said, and although he knew that the devil would get ninety-nine out of every hundred of the souls which he was trying to save, yet somehow "Old Splitfoot" seems to survive, and is still on the "war path."

Now if the devil can beat God and Christ, and all the holy saints and apostles, there is no use of a poor uncircumcised wretch like myself contending with him. Years ago I made up my mind to let him have his own way. I don't call him any ugly names, and never make up ugly faces at him, and he don't give me any trouble.

Origen and Cyprian, and all the Christian fathers, bear testimony that the early Christians had power over the devil. They give the names of many who had power to cast out devils. Yet the church and the ministry have been fighting him ever since. Still he is among us, as rampant as ever. He must be a sly "old coon," indeed. I think it is about time for the church and the ministry to stop trying to help God, and to leave off fighting the devil, and turn their attention to ssomething that will be of some benefit to the human race.

Christianity has proved the most direful foe to republicanism. Somehow it turns out that true Christians make bad republicans. Many professed Christians may be good republicans, but in every such case the Christian has outgrown his religion. Republicanism is rooted in the love of liberty. One can scarcely find a Christian who will concede to others the right to differ from him in opinion. But the largest liberty consistent with the public good is the very soul of republicanism. Even as learned a man as Martin Luther is known to have been was the most tyrannical and bigoted of mortals. While he claimed the right to put his own interpretation upon the scriptures, and to differ from the church and the pope, he called upon the "flames of hell to devour" those who differed from him. Such a spirit of intolerance has served as the foundation for some of the most despotic governments which have ever cursed the world, and is inimical to a republican government.

Every true Liberal will strike for the right of all men to the privileges which Luther claimed for himself—freedom of the mind, freedom of speech, of the press, of schools, and a government untrammeled by sectarian influence. Had Luther conceded to every other man the rights which he claimed for himself and stuck for universal mental liberty, he would have stood without a peer as a reformer.

Let no one think the state is free as long as men are compelled to support a system of religion without their consent. It is as great an outrage for Liberals to be compelled to pay taxes on church property, and to pay chaplains, as it would be to compel Christians to contribute Freethought halls, and force them to defray the expenses of Liberal lecturers. Christians have no more right to force the Bible into the common schools than the Liberals have the writings of Paine or Voltaire. The Christian has no rights under the Constitution above a doubting Atheist.

If the state has a right to look after the morals of its subjects, I claim that it is bound to exclude the Bible from the schools on moral grounds. A book which sanctions the selling of tainted meat—the buying and selling of human beings as chattels—which not only sanctions but commands wars of extermination; which sanctions the indiscriminate murder of men, women, and children, the ripping up of women alive, and the eating of one's own children, should be excluded from the common schools on the ground that such teaching has a tendency to corrupt the morals of the young.

To attempt to push such a book into the schools on the ground of inspiration does not help the matter one mite. I cannot prove that Byron and Pope and Burns were not inspired, but I do know that they have written some poetry which, in my judgment, would make a very improper book to put into the schools. Whether the Bible is inspired or not, one thing is certain, the devil could not have written anything worse than can be found in some parts of it.

Our schools are instinctively associated with the idea of progress; but Christianity is a standstill religion. God is perfect, and this perfect God is the author of the scriptures. They, too, must be perfect, and consequently cannot have the spirit of progress in them. Therefore neither the scriptures nor the religion based upon them has any place in our common schools.

When the most convincing evidence is adduced to prove that man has come up by slow degrees from a savage state, and, therefore, that the story of the fall of man has no foundation in fact, the Christian insists that somehow science has made a blunder, because there is God's word to the contrary. And thus it is the Christian can never move out of his tracks; he cannot take any step in advance. If he were confronted with every demonstration of science, the old snake story, or some other story equally absurd, if found in the Bible, would outweigh them all. For the advancement of the race, for the good of mankind, the slimy worms of superstition should no longer be allowed to crawl through the chamber of the human mind.

When the Christian is confronted with the fact that there have been many saviors, some of them crucified for the sins of the world many centuries before the birth of Christ, and that the incidents in the life of Christ correspond almost exactly with those of the Indian savior Christna, he winks like an owl and declares that the historian is an enemy of God, and fit only for the companionship of devils.

When sciences demonstrates that the Mosaic account of creation cannot be true, the Christian replies that whatever contradicts God's holy word is of the devil, and that he will not be dragged down to hell because the devil assumes the garb of a teacher of science. Such is the consequence of faith in so-called sacred writings, and such the fate of those who allow themselves to be entangled in the meshes of superstition.

A short time ago Christians believed in and taught infant damnation. I wonder if God has suffered to any great extent, or if the dangers of hell have been increased since they stopped teaching that horrible doctrine? The cause of humanity has certainly been promoted. Who can calculate the advantages to the human race when the minds of men shall be entirely freed from the withering blight of God-made books!

The ignorance of Bible writers crops out on nearly every page. Hence science and civilization can only advance as confidence in the Bible, as the divine word of God, is broken up. A belief in the Bible as emanating from the throne of God has turned men into savages, and hedged up the way to human progress, and will ever act as a brake on the advancing wheels of civilization.

Many Liberals are talking a great deal about "reconstruction" and "building up." Let me say, once for all, that nothing permanent can ever be "built up" until the rubbish of Bible superstitions are cleared away. The temple of "universal mental liberty" must have the everlasting bed-rock of scientific truth for its foundation. JOHN PECK.

Reminiscence.

When my child (a daughter) was seven years old, my husband was killed on the New York Central Railroad, by an accident caused by the penuriousness of the company—I ought perhaps to say, the criminality of the officers of the road. A switchman who had been employed by the company for a number of years, at the meager wages of seventy-five cents per day, struck, and demanded one dollar. It was refused, and the switchman discharged. A foreigner, I do not know his nationality, whether English or Irish, no matter—he was an ignorant man, who had landed in the country the week before—was employed in place of the discharged switchman. My husband was an engineer, and at that time ran the "lightning-express." At the station where the accident occurred this train never stopped. The whistle was sounded to announce the approach of the train. The new man, in his confusion, probably waking from sleep, thought he must do something, so turned over the switch, letting the moving train into a freight train standing on a side track, and in a moment my husband was dead. Mr. Colman was buried from Corinthian Hall, Rochester, N. Y., where we then resided, Andrew Jackson Davis officiating at the funeral. I was at that time a Spiritualist. I had given up the church, more because of its complicity with slavery than from a full understanding of the foolishness of its creeds. The Universalist and Unitarian churches were offered for the funeral, but I did not accept the use of them. I was no longer in sympathy with any church. My husband had belonged to the Odd Fellows' Association, in Boston, but the lodge to which he belonged had disbanded.

However, the Odd Fellows of Rochester voted to attend the funeral in a body, and take charge of the same when it should leave the hall. I consented to this arrangement, only requesting that they would omit the prayer. I had at that time fully outgrown public prayer.

I shall, in course of this autobiography, giv a chapter upon Spiritualism, as it came to me, and I think if those of my friends read it who hav accused me of not studying its philosophy and examining its phenomena, they will acknowledge their mistake; but for the present I hav something to say of the great Central Railroad corporation, and here a little of "woman's wrongs" will be admissible. I waited a suitable time, expecting some one of the officers of the road would call to see me, not doubting they would expect to do all that money could do to pay for their criminality. They had run extra trains (the funeral was held on Sunday) from Albany east, and Buffalo and Niagara Falls west, giving free fare to all who wished to attend the funeral. It was computed that five hundred people went away from Corinthian Hall, not being able to gain an entrance. The hall seated fifteen hundred. Every possible spot was filled; thus much honor was paid to the memory of the murdered man, and the railroad company paid the expenses. But a large funeral would not support a family, and Mr. Colman left only a home, and that mortgaged.

As they had sent messages of condolence and sympathy, and freely paid the funeral expenses, I supposed they would be ready to do more. At last, tired with waiting, I made a journey to a city where the superintendent of that division resided, called at his office, was told he was not in. I then went to his house; he was expected home to dine at his usual hour. I determined to stay until he should arrive. It was late in the afternoon when he came, and after being informed by the servant that a woman was waiting to see him, he came into the room and graciously informed me that he never did business at home; but I concluded to stay right there till he should hear what I had come that distance to say. He finally asked me if I had had dinner, and in his great condescension said I would be welcome to dine with them.

At length my persistency overcame his determination not to talk business, and this was the final word: "The corporation acknowledges no indebtedness. A person who works for an incorporated company becomes one of the company, and consequently can claim no damages. This the Court of Appeals has just decided. Mrs. Colman, we hav done more for you than we hav ever done for any other person situated as you are. To pay damages to our employees would be a bad precedent. We paid the funeral expenses, and some of the officers attended the funeral. And do you not see, Mrs. Colman, that we hav no right to take the company's money, and giv to you? We hav in this company widows and orphans, and we must not take what their money earns and giv it away." This man had common sense, strange as it may seem, and was a shining light in the Episcopal church in that city; and, more than all else, he had caused the experienced switchman's discharge, putting in his place the ignorant foreigner to save twenty-five cents a day. Within the next six weeks I consulted nine different lawyers, some of them the best in the state, all of them agreeing that any or all juries would giv the damages demanded, and all of them also gave as their opinion that I would never get one cent. Like Dickens's poor Mrs. Plite in the "Circumlocation Court" (Court of Chancery), the trial would never be called, but always be put off to another time.

I now asked the company to giv me employment in some of their offices, mentioning a ticket office. The official raised his hands in respectable horror, and said: "Mrs. Colman, you wouldn't put yourself in such a public position, such an exposed situation? You hav a little daughter; she might feel degraded by her mother taking a position in a public office. Can't you take boarders? We could send you twenty-five of our laborers next week."

A little girl would be in no danger of being degraded by her mother cooking for twenty-five Irishmen employed in digging on the railroad, and certainly she (the mother) would hav to keep pretty close to her man-appointed sphere. I was not, however, ready yet for the boarders. I called on the postmaster, and said: "You hav opened a window in the office for ladies; will you not giv me the place as clerk?" "I wish I could," said the gentleman, "but I dare not make the innovation." Not entirely discouraged, I next went to a printing-office, which had advertised for boys to learn to set type, and said, "Would you giv me such place?" "No; a printing-office is no place for a woman." This was forty years ago. To-day we hav women in post-offices, ticket-offices, and printing-offices. This was a time of "woman's wrongs." Has she conquered all her rights? Not till she makes, or helps to make, the laws by which she is governed. LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Full-Grown God Needed for that Job.

This little anecdote of the big Charleston earthquake has been repeated with great gusto by a good many story-tellers since that terrific shake-up, but hasn't yet got into print—"too awfully blasphemous, ye know." But it's good enough to save, just the same; and here it is:

When the earth was rumbling and the heavens were overcast, and all the elements filled with fearful portents, just like the pleasing Biblical pictures of an omnipotent God's grand wind-up of his never-ceasing mercies to miserable man, preparatory to plunging said miserable man into perpetual hell-fire, there to merrily sizzle through eternity—in short, when every superstitious creature in Charleston was scared into a sudden belief that the end of the world was at hand, a venerable colored man, more than one hundred years old, bent and gnarled in body, his face twisted into countless furrows, and the few remaining tufts of wool on his shiny old pate turned whiter than snow, fell on his knees right in the middle of one of the main streets (at least the wicked Charleston wag who started the story says so), and lifted up his toothless gums in prayer, thus:

"O Lawd Gawd, my deah massar, save yo' ole an' faithful suvvant in dis his's yhour ob need! Come down, Lawd Gawd A'mighty! Come down! Come down! An' be mighty quick 'bout it! Der ain't no time ter linger; come down yheah straight an' suddent! I want ye right now! Come to wunst, O Lawd, an' no waitin' nor haltin' by de wayside. I got to hev ye, I got to hev ye!" [Just at this point there was a quake of increased violence, and the already terror-stricken old man shrieked still more frantically]: "An', O Lawd Gawd, come down you'self; come down in pusson! I want you, O Lawd! Doan' sen' dat son o' yourn. Come down you'self! Dis yere ain't no kind o' a job fer a boy to fool aroun'."

IT is reported in Boston that an elderly citizen of that town who was induced to try the toboggan slide, and is laid up with a broken leg in consequence, wrote to Sam Jones: "Go for tobog. in your next sermon. It's just h—ll!"

"The Truth of History."

The neighboring article by Col. R. G. Ingersoll upon "The Truth of History"—which we print in the most prominent shape possible to our types—will, we trust, prove sufficient to relieve the editor from answering further queries concerning the distinguished writer's mental health. Though perhaps unnecessary, we request Freethought journals in England and the colonies to giv the article a wide circulation—not because the absurd rumors deserve refutation, but because there are many sincere friends of Mr. Ingersoll credulous enough to be pained by them.

The Indian Problem.

The wordy warfare over the Umatilla reservation Indian school, between the Roman Catholic archbishop of Oregon and Indian Agent Coffey and the Indian commissioners, has finally been brought to a close for the present. The archbishop gets the worst of it practically, for his tools hav not been reinstated in the school.

The correspondence in the Oregonian develops the fact that Agent Coffey had to obtain the indorsement of the Catholic authorities before he could obtain the appointment, and the removal of the sisters and the priest by the agent was regarded by the archbishop as an act of treachery. In his opinion, by the policy of the government which parceled out the schools to the sects, he owned the school, and the agent was as much his servant as the meanest priest in his diocese.

The Indian policy of the United States government is a stupendous failure. The religious schools are valueless, if we judge by the results. One of our friends, living on the ground, says that no improvement in the character of the Indians is perceptible. Should the churches really civilize the Indians, they would destroy the source of large revenues, and this they will not do. The civilization the red man receives at the hands of the church is just sufficient to make him a Christian—and no one requires to be told that such civilization need not be of an exalted grade.

Horace Greeley used to say, in the days when the financial question was pressing for solution, that the way to resume was to resume. So with the Indians—the way to civilize them is to place them among civilized surroundings. As long as Indians are allowed to hav guns, ponies, and practically unlimited range, they will remain nomads. Surroundings, climate, and habits of life are all-powerful influences to mold the character of races. A few years ago, when there was talk of annexing Santo Domingo, Colonel Ingersoll objected. "You might go there," said he, "with five thousand Congregational preachers, five thousand ruling elders, five thousand professors in colleges, five thousand of the solid men of Boston and their wives; settle them all in Santo Domingo, and you will see the second generation riding upon a mule, bareback, no shoes, a grapevine bridle, hair sticking out at the top of their sombreros, with a rooster under each arm, going to a cock-fight on Sunday." If such degeneration might be expected of New Englanders, because of climate alone, can we expect a lot of impracticable teachers of falsehoods to civilize an Indian with a gun in his hand, a horse under him, and unlimited range for his nomadic propensities? Industrious, intelligent white men, under the present reservation system, would degenerate into vagabonds in a few decades, as many hav already done.

Preachers and churches are all of no use in the settlement of the Indian problem. In the first place, the government has not the slightest shadow of right to make the sects a present of large sums of money annually, thousands of acres of land, and a whole race of people for their preachers to practice upon. The government has no more right to establish religion in the territories and upon reservations than it has to establish a state church for the states. To the Indians given to the Catholics is taught Catholicism; the Methodists teach Methodism, the Presbyterians teach Calvinism—think of civilizing an Indian by teaching him effectual calling, justification, adoption, sanctification, and the perseverance of the saints!—the Baptists teach the important difference between open and close communion, sprinkling and total immersion—all at the expense of the government. Where is the warrant for this useless expenditure of money? It surely is not found in the Constitution, which prohibits the giving to the churches of a cent of public money for any purpose whatever.

The only practicable and effectiv way to civilize Indians is to make them see the necessity of procuring homes. An Indian will never build a home till forced to. He must be disarmed, allowed to select land from vacant territory—as much as he can utilize—and then left to his own exertions, for, until hunger drives him, an Indian will not work. If this policy were pursued for ten or twenty years, instead of wasting more money annually upon the churches than would be used in boarding Indians at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, the Indian problem would be in a fair way toward solution. They might become farmers, raising sufficient to support themselvs, but they never will become civilized by learning the miraculous birth of Jesus Christ. Their education can very safely be left to the common schools. What is good enough for the white population on the frontier is good enough for any Indian.

If the "noble red man" is used justly by the government, treated like a man and not like a child to be humored; if the agents can be kept from stealing from him, and the churches from robbing the government under the pretense of civilizing him—then Indian wars would not be necessary, and such rows as this one on the Umatilla reservation—so disgraceful for our government—would be impossible. The United States hav got very much the worst of their unauthorized bargain with the churches, and the contract should be promptly broken.

Temperance or Free Liquor.

The saying that "politics makes strange bedfellows" is, in the current vernacular, a chestnut. It is, however, a sound one. In the last presidential campaign it seemed odd to see the candidate from the land of Puritanism cheek-by-jowl with Romanists, and expecting to make his election sure by their votes. Another curious spectacle was the indorsement (probably sympathetic) by clergymen of a candidate who owned to breaking the seventh commandment. Another seeming incongruity was presented in politics during our last local election, when Freethinkers were working for the success of a man who promised, if elected, to enforce the Sunday laws. But the greatest apparent anomaly is the present joining of forces in this state by the Prohibitionists and the liquor dealers.

The excise commissioners of New York are desirous of reducing the number of liquor saloons in this city, and of raising the character of such as shall remain. There are at present some ten thousand saloons dispensing liquid poison on Manhattan Island. The excise commissioners are of the opinion that half this number is quite sufficient for the welfare of the city. They hav, accordingly, increased the price of a license for places that sell what is known as "hard" liquor to $200, or nearly three times the former price. At the same time they allow a man to sell beer and light wine by annually paying thirty dollars. Every one knows that much drinking of whisky and kindred liquors leads to drunkenness and disease, while light, pure wines and beer are comparativly harmless. Recognizing these facts, the excise commissioners hav undertaken, in the most practical way, to reduce intemperance in New York.

The liquor dealers oppose this action strenuously. A great proportion of their number cannot afford to pay $200 per year for their licenses, with the probability staring them in the face that the commissioners will still further increase the price if $200 should not prove exorbitant enough to drive the low groggeries out of existence. They recognize that a large number of them must seek other means of livelihood. The Christian Prohibitionists profess to desire the extermination of saloons. If we giv them credit for sincerity in their professions, any recognition of their possessing common sense must be withheld. Without discussing whether in Maine and Kansas and other prohibitory states Prohibition is effectual (upon which there are diverse opinions), it may be safely asserted that Prohibition will not serve to prevent liquor drinking in New York city. We hav now a stringent law against selling liquor on Sunday, but even during the few days in the year when great efforts are made to enforce it, a bibulous New Yorker can walk from the Battery to Harlem, and obtain a drink upon nearly every block. The present condition of affairs—low license and unlimited opportunity to sell—is what the liquor dealers enjoy and the Prohibitionists deplore.

Yet at Albany, where the forces opposed to the excise commissioners hav centered, are seen Mr. Gibbons, president of the State Liquor Dealers' Association of New York, and Mary A. Bizunday, president of the Woman's Temperance Union of Ohio, working heartily and unitedly to kill the bill for high license! Mr. Gibbons is working from a business standpoint, Mrs. Bizunday from a sentimental one. Business and sentiment in the liquor traffic never can agree. If Mr. Gibbons is level-headed, Mrs. Bizunday is wrong. He desires a free chance to sell whisky; she would drive the whisky seller out of the trade. Their purposes are as wide apart as possible, and one of them must be wasting a great amount of energy and money. Which it is we leave for the people of common sense, conversant with the facts, to determin.

Co-operativ Schemes.

We are in receipt of several inquiries relativ to the coöperativ schemes on Puget Sound, and on Topolobampo bay, in Sinaloa, Mexico.

Of the Puget Sound enterprise we know nothing except what we learn from the letters of the secretary, published in this paper some time since. We advise people to go slow in joining that or any other colony, though we would not insinuate aught against it.

The Topolobampo bay colony is a pretentious enterprise. The bay is a good one. The land around it is fertil. The climate is warm. Those are the advantages. But there is no wood, and water has to be brought from islands. Ultimately, the coöperativ city will be supplied with water from the mountains thirty miles away. But it takes a long time and much money to construct a thirty-mile aqueduct. There are no railroad facilities. Mr. Owens is under contract with the Mexican government to build a railroad within ten years—but ten years is a good while, and it requires many hard Mexican dollars to build railroads. The land is good for but one crop per year—that is, during the wet season. With irrigation, doubtless, vegetables and fruits can be grown at all times, but irrigation requires water, and the aqueduct is not yet built.

There are now over three hundred persons upon the ground, colonists from all parts of the country. They were forced to provide and take with them everything they would require for a year's sojourn—food, clothes, tools, etc. Mr. A. K. Owens, the head of the enterprise, has now issued the following order, in the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa of February 8th:

"Sinaloa, during 1887, is no place for women, children, aged persons, persons not in vigorous health, and persons not having money to meet the expenses of going and staying there. I urge again that only the physically strong and the financially capable take the lead; and I wish to say positivly, that there are now upon our lands and en route for Topolobampo all, if not more, persons than we can possibly employ before next fall. I therefere order that no persons start for Topolobampo without written permission from me, and that those who act in violation of this instruction will forfeit every right of a colonist, and will not find employment, food, shelter, assistance or protection at our settlements."

Mr. and Mrs. Howland, the editors of the Credit

Foncier, who had announced their early departure for Sinaloa, and packed their goods, are ordered to unpack, and continue the publication of the paper at a safe distance from the seat of war.

This order by Mr. Owens is a conclusiv answer, for the present at least, to all inquirers. Do not think of joining the colony for a year. And perhaps it will be the part of prudence to wait till the aqueduct is built, the railroad well under way, and a few of the advantages of civilized life obtainable, before selling out and giving all you hav to an enterprise that may result disastrously. It is easy to lay out a city on paper, but a much more difficult task to convert the Mexican state of Sinaloa into a paradise that must support many thousands of colonists.

A Judge Exceeding His Powers.

The newspapers state that in Ogden, Utah, the other day, Judge Henderson asked a Dane who applied for naturalization papers whether he believed in polygamy. The Dane replied that polygamy was a law of God. The Dane's son, who had also applied to be naturalized, returned substantially the same answer to the question. Papers were refused them.

We should like to know where a judge obtains authority for prying into a man's religious belief before granting naturalization papers. As well might the judge ask him if he believes in transubstantiation or the trinity.

They are dangerous precedents, these judicial inquisitions, and they are becoming too common. When a man commits bigamy is time enough to subject him to penalties.

Editorial Notes.

S. P. PUTNAM'S brilliant lecture upon "The New God," which has afforded THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondents so wide a field for criticism and approval, is now issued in a very neat pamphlet of thirty-four pages, selling for ten cents.

THE March number of the Popular Science Monthly will contain a portrait of the late Professor E. L. Youmans, engraved on steel by Schlecht. The likeness is considered remarkably vivid, while the execution of the work is much superior to ordinary book-plates.

A RELIGIOUS paper of this city calls the new theology of the Andover professors "private views," "free thoughts," and "mere speculations." We should like to know what the old theology is but "mere speculation?" Does anybody hold that our current theology is an exact science, demonstrated as clearly as mathematics? If so, where is the demonstration, and why does not the world accept it as implicitly as it does that two and two make four?

A WRITER in a religious journal says, "It would be worth the while of skeptics to reflect that the two deepest thinkers among contemporary poets, Robert Browning and Alfred Tennyson, are believers." We disagree with the remark. Browning is a mystical stringer together of words, the value of whose laboriously constructed sentences has to be sought by diligent study, and when found is not worth the search. Tennyson, when he could write poetry, was a broad man. Since his intellect weakened sufficiently to enable him to write "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" we suppose he could accept Christianity gracefully.

SAYS the Catholic Review: "There is no longer a school question for Catholics. It is closed. The door of discussion, which was slightly ajar prior to 1884, was closed, locked, bolted, and barred by the Plenary Council held in that year, which directed that Christian schools should be maintained by all the parishes in the United States, not prevented by extreme poverty from carrying them on. That decree is law for priests and people." There is, however, a school question for the rest of the people, and that is to see that the school funds raised by taxation are never divided between the public and the parochial schools. And there is another school question for Freethinkers, which is to remove the present religious exercises from the public schools. Why should a Freethinker be obliged to spend half an evening removing from the mind of his child the effects of the half hour's religious training the youngster has had in the morning? Yet this is just what Freethinkers in this city hav to do, notwithstanding the order of the state superintendent of education that religious exercises should be excluded from the schools. It is an infamous outrage upon our rights.

WE printed recently the amount given to the various religious institutions of this city from the regular appropriations. The total was but little less than a million and a-half dollars. The following institutions collectivly receive additional per month from forty to fifty thousand dollars from the excise funds. The grant from the excise funds for the third quarter of 1886 has just been published. The institutions receiving the money are the Institution of Mercy, St. Joseph's Asylum, St. Stephen's Home for Children, Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, Missionary Sisters' Third Order of St. Francis, Association for the Benefit of Colored Orphans, St. James's Home, Association for Befriending Children and Young Girls, St. Ann's Home, American Female Guardian Society and Home for the Friendless, Asylum of St. Vincent de Paul, St. Agatha Home for Children, St. Michael's Home, Hebrew Sheltering Guardian Society, Ladies' Deborah Nursery and Child's Protectory. The total amount for the quarter was $132.911.92. This is about the usual amount of spoils quarterly divided among the sectarian thieves, and brings the total annual booty of the various churches to over two millions of dollars.

The Truth of History.

Thousands of Christians have asked: How was it possible for Christ and his apostles to deceive the people of Jerusalem? How came the miracles to be believed? Who had the impudence to say that lepers had been cleansed, and that the dead had been raised? How could such impostors have escaped exposure?

I ask: How did Mohammed deceive the people of Mecca? How has the Catholic church imposed upon millions of people? Who can account for the success of falsehood?

Millions of people are directly interested in the false. They live by lying. To deceive is the business of their lives. Truth is a cripple; lies have wings. It is almost impossible to overtake, and kill, and bury a lie. If you do, some one will erect a monument over the grave, and the lie is born again as an epitaph. Let me give you a case in point.

A few days ago the Matlock Register, a paper published in England, printed the following:

"CONVERSION OF THE ARCH ATHEIST.

"Mr. Isaac Loveland, of Shoreham, desires us to insert the following:

"'1 GROVE-ROAD, ST. JOHN'S WOOD,
LONDON, Nov. 27, 1886.

"'DEAR MR. LOVELAND: A day or two since I received from Mr. Hine the exhilarating intelligence that through his lectures on the "Identity of the British Nation with Lost Israel," in Canada and the United States, that Col. Bob Ingersoll, the arch Atheist, has been converted to Christianity, and has joined the Episcopalian church. Praise the Lord!!! Five thousand of his followers have been won for Christ through Mr. Hine's grand mission work, the other side of the Atlantic. The colonel's cousin, the Rev. Mr. Ingersoll, wrote to Mr. Hine soon after he began lecturing in America, informing him that his lectures had made a great impression on the colonel and other Atheists. I noted it at the time in the Messenger. Bradlaugh will yet be converted; his brother has been, and has joined a British Israel Identity Association. This is progress, and shows what an energetic, determined man (like Mr. Hine) who is earnest in his faith can do. Very faithfully yours, H. HODSON RUGG.'"

How can we account for an article like that? Who made up this story? Who had the impudence to publish it?

As a matter of fact, I never saw Mr. Hine, never heard of him until this extract was received by me in the month of December. I never read a word about the "Identity of Lost Israel with the British Nation." It is a question in which I never had, and never expect to have, the slightest possible interest.

Nothing can be more preposterous than that the Englishman, in whose veins can be found the blood of the Saxon, the Dane, the Norman, the Pict, the Scot, and the Celt, is the descendant of "Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." The English language does not bear the remotest resemblance to the Hebrew, and yet it is claimed by the Reverend Hodson Rugg that not only myself, but five thousand other Atheists, were converted by the Rev. Mr. Hine, because of his theory that Englishmen and Americans are simply Jews in disguise.

This letter, in my judgment, was published to be used by missionaries in China, Japan, India, and Africa.

If stories like this can be circulated about a living man, what may we not expect concerning the dead who have opposed the church?

Countless falsehoods have been circulated about all the opponents of superstition. Whoever attacks the popular falsehoods of his time will find that a lie defends itself by telling other lies. Nothing is so prolific, nothing can so multiply itself, nothing can lay and hatch as many eggs, as a good, healthy, religious lie.

And nothing is more wonderful than the credulity of the believers in the supernatural. They feel under a kind of obligation to believe everything in favor of their religion, or against any form of what they are pleased to call "Infidelity."

The old falsehoods about Voltaire, Paine, Hume, Julian, Diderot, and hundreds of others grow green every spring. They are answered; they are demonstrated to be without the slightest foundation; but they rarely die. And when one does die there seems to be a kind of Cæsarian operation, so that in each instance, although the mother dies, the child lives to undergo, if necessary, a like operation, leaving another child, and sometimes two.

There are thousands and thousands of tongues ready to repeat what the owners know to be false, and these lies are a part of the stock in trade, the valuable assets, of superstition. No church can afford to throw its property away. To admit that these stories are false now, is to admit that the church has been busy lying for hundreds of years, and it is also to admit that the word of the church is not and cannot be taken as evidence of any fact.

A few years ago, I had a little controversy with the editor of the New York Observer, the Rev. Ireneus Prime (who is now supposed to be in heaven enjoying the bliss of seeing Infidels in hell), as to whether Thomas Paine recanted his religious opinions. I offered to deposit a thousand dollars for the benefit of a charity, if the reverend doctor would substantiate the charge that Paine recanted. I forced the New York Observer to admit that Paine did not recant, and compelled that paper to say that "Thomas Paine died a blaspheming Infidel."

A few months afterward an English paper was sent to me—a religious paper—and in that paper was a statement to the effect that the editor of the New York Observer had claimed that Paine recanted; that I had offered to give a thousand dollars to any charity that Mr. Prime might select, if he would establish the fact that Paine did recant; and that so overwhelming was the testimony brought forward by Mr. Prime that I admitted that Paine did recant, and paid the thousand dollars.

This is another instance of what might be called the truth of history.

I wrote to the editor of that paper, telling the exact facts, and offering him advertising rates to publish the denial, and in addition stated that if he would send me a copy of his paper with the denial, I would send him twenty-five dollars for his trouble. I received no reply, and the lie is in all probability still on its travels, going from Sunday-school to Sunday-school, from pulpit to pulpit, from hypocrite to savage—that is to say, from missionary to Hottentot—without the slightest evidence of fatigue—fresh and strong, and in its cheeks the roses and lilies of perfect health.

Some person, expecting to add another gem to his crown of glory, put in circulation the story that one of my daughters had joined the Presbyterian church—a story without the slightest foundation—and although denied a hundred times, it is still being printed and circulated for the edification of the faithful. Every few days I receive some letter of inquiry as to this charge, and I have industriously denied it for years, but up to the present time it shows no signs of death—not even of weakness.

Another religious gentleman put in print the charge that my son, having been raised in the atmosphere of Infidelity, had become insane and died in an asylum. Notwithstanding the fact that I never had a son, the story still goes right on, and is repeated day after day without the semblance of a blush.

Now, if all this is done while I am alive and well, and while I have all the facilities of our century for spreading the denials, what will be done after my lips are closed?

The mendacity of superstition is almost enough to make a man believe in the supernatural.

And so I might go on for a hundred columns. Billions of falsehoods have been told, and there are trillions yet to come. The doctrines of Malthus have nothing to do with this particular kind of reproduction.

"And there are also many other falsehoods which the church has told, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written."

R. G. INGERSOLL.

W. F. JAMIESON, on his tour through Nebraska, has had crowded houses, and is re-engaged to deliver other courses of lectures on his return trip to Colorado. Address at Minden, Neb.

L. K. WASHBURN intends making a lecturing tour west through the states of New York and Ohio, and is desirous of entering into correspondence with Liberal societies and with individual Freethinkers who can and will prepare the way for him to speak. We hav heard Mr. Washburn several times, and can personally guarantee the quality of his oratory. On or off the platform he is one of the best men in the world. Address him at Revere, Mass.

Letters from Friends.

CARLISLE, PA., Jan. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Find herewith $1. The abominable illustrations sent out weekly in your paper are almost equal to an emetic to me, but I take the paper for sensible articles and "Gems of Thought." The terrible strain Mr. Heston makes to be smart I'm afraid will hasten his departure from the world, and I would advise him to strain no more.

Respectfully, M. BURGESS.

CHARLESTON, ILL., Jan. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Charles McGrew is trying to organize an investigating society here, to investigate all religious denominations and see which is the best to liv up to. He has asked several church-members and ministers to join it. The answer by the ministers is: "I don't want to investigate. I know all I want to know." How wise they are—too wise to liv on earth! J. B. DAZEY.

MIDDLE FALLS, N. Y., Jan. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Why will you persist in that dreadful "bob-tailed" spelling of "hav," "giv," and "liv." Giv it up, friend Macdonald; you cannot revolutionize the established orthography so far as these three small words are concerned, and your readers will never take kindly to a system that givs an unfinished appearance to their best thought. Let your readers vote on it! D. LOUIS BODGE.

DUBLIN, IND., Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I like the general character of THE TRUTH SEEKER well, but the pictures—what shall I say? Well, they are repulsiv in general to look at, and hav a very unpleasant effect. For instance, take Noah and his family eating worms, bugs, and lice. Such a scene is enough to nauseate the stomach of a dog. When you think of it, your victuals won't taste good. If you go a-fishing with such bait, you will catch nothing but tadpoles. MILTON THORNBURGH.

DAYTON, IND., Jan. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: To say that I am astonished and surprised at the bold and outright hits and assaults you continue to make in battling divine revelation of the Christian persuasion is a mere begging of terms, and insufficient to express my congratulations in regard to the great good you are bringing about in the cause of Freethought. If your illustrated journal of Freethought does not do wonders in its field of labor, and bring to its office a large patronage, it will only be due to the stupidity and lack of appreciation by the civilized world. C. S. GRAFT.

BARTON, FLA., Jan. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Following on the heels of the destruction of my business by Knights of Labor Christian bigots, came impaired health, resulting in a lung difficulty, and therefore hied I to the land of flowers. It is not only that, but while it has the loveliest climate—so far, at least—I ever saw, yet it is dyed in superstition. When I get a little stronger, I will write a long letter descriptiv of what I hav seen in Florida. I write this to ask the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this section to giv me their address, so I can call on them or write. A. C. EVERETT.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $11 for subscriptions. You are doing a noble work in behalf of the mind-enslaved portion of humanity, and it is the earnest wish of the writer that you may not weary in well doing.

Friend Bradford's "righteous indignation" is just to the point, and I trust that our Liberal friends will gladden the editor's heart with prompt remittances.

Will not some of our Liberal friends, whose communications are always interesting, be more liberal in their criticisms of each other? Sometimes in reading these the thought forces itself upon us that the term Liberal is slightly "out of joint." L. E. JORDAN.

NUNDA, ILL., Jan. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I do not think THE TRUTH SEEKER adds any strength or influence to its usefulness by advocating the Anarchist side of the free speech question. If I injure your character or your business by the use of free speech, I make myself liable to an action at law, which is all wrong according to your theory. No; free speech is not designed to injure another. Hence I fail to see the point you attempt to make. But I do not intend to stop my paper in consequence. Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER wave, is my wish.

Yours, J. E. BECKLEY.

[If Mr. Beckley, or an Anarchist, injures any person by his speech, then should he be liable. And when he, or any one else, shows that the speeches of the Chicago Anarchists killed the policemen, or led to the killing, then will we advocate their punishment.—ED. T. S.]

BRADFORD, PA., Feb. 5, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Charles Watts has just completed a lecture tour through Pennsylvania. We gave him a call on short notice and had a good company of Freethinkers out to hear him, while the clergy and their faithful followers were very shy. They were afraid that their miraculous religion would be held up to the gaze of the people.

We think Thomas Jefferson said truly that the Christian religion should be classed with other superstitions.

We expect C. B. Reynolds here the 20th of this month. We want to show the people what Secularism really teaches, and that what is known and can be demonstrated is of more use to men and women than their supposed supernatualism. When the people become educated, then we can get a crowd to hear a Secular lecture. I see in this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER that my old friend and neighbor, J. L. Brooks, of Portville, N. Y., is a Spiritualist. How he is, and I am not, I cannot understand. We hav lived in the same locality, breathed the same kind of air, and attended generally all the public mediums that hav professed to know about spirits. After a full and careful investigation I hav reached the conclusion that Spiritualism is untrue and has no scientific basis. I am yet ready to be convinced, and I would like friend Brooks to tell me what made him a Spiritualist, and if it can be demonstrated before a body of scientific men.

C. J. CURTIS.

CRITTENDEN, ARIZ., Jan. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Each number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is so good, and so much better than its predecessor, and the cartoons are improving so and hit so near the center, that I do not know how to get along without it. But, more than that, your splendid defense of the rights of free speech from both foes within as well as without prompts me to make an extra effort to sustain you, so please find $2 inclosed. Promptly discontinue at expiration, as it is quite possible I may hav gone over the range by that time.

I also inclose a tribute that was read at the grave of little Ida Linder, a bright, precocious child of Freethinking parents, who objected to priestly burial. An appeal was made to a Freethought friend on his way to the funeral, and was prepared upon the spur of the moment, and, as usual, the incomparable Ingersoll was drafted upon. F. A. LAMONT.

FRIENDS: We stand at the grave of one whose morn of life had hardly commenced ere the evening of death claimed her.

"Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the hights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing."

The little one has fallen into a dreamless sleep.

The grand law of evolution that sits enthroned on the material, mental, and moral world is ever unfolding for the better.

While we mingle our tears of sympathy with the bitter tears of the bereaved parents, we may hope that if there is a future life the pure spirit of the little one will progress toward a grander and nobler life.

Nature is always wiser than man. We bow to the inevitable. Let us do our duty here and the star of hope we may hav always.

Adieu, little one! May the fadeless glory of the morn be ever thine!

PAISLEY, OR., Jan. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find a check for $40.90, for which send, first, fifty copies of your valuable paper, and the remainder in tracts for promiscuous distribution.

There has been organized here a Sunday-school that pretends to be Protestant to all outward appearances, but which under the guise of Protestantism issues Sunday-school cards that are unmistakably Catholic in creed.

And to successfully cope with the machinery of superstition, and return "railing for railing," the Liberals of this place hav organized a Liberal League, with the following officers: George C. Duncan, president; Jerome Gaylord, treasurer; and George W. Hayes, secretary.

We further request of you that you send us a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the American Secular Union, and necessary instructions whereby we may become a part and be known as a factor in the grand cause of Liberalism, and as laborers for the promotion of truth and morality.

Although occupying an isolated position, and having no means of communication but a weekly mail to keep pace with the Liberal advancement of the age, still we hav banded ourselvs together for the purpose of mutually assisting to advance the cause of Liberalism.

This village has been the scene of many hotly-contested encounters between Satan (truth) and preachers of different denominations; but, thanks to precept and the widespread prevalence of common sense, the encounters so far hav proved the truth of the adage that "time and skill will couch the blind."

We hav neither church nor jail, hav never had a serious disturbance in the place, although dances and gatherings for amusement are frequent.

Liberalism is in the ascendant, and for friendship or sociability we challenge the coast, and, from an impartial standpoint, would challenge any orthodox village of equal size in the world.

But with all this, these Christian fathers shout, "Heretic!" and seek by every device to reform the "heathen," though we are neither roughs nor rowdies. They try to preach Christ to us, and him crucified, and thus purge Paisley. We hav hitherto listened and passed unheeded their slurs and insults, heard them cry till hoarse that "Infidelity and crime walked hand in hand," and that our boasted Liberality meant the unbridled sway of passions, but we now "war, ceaseless war, declare," and will try issue with them in the arena of truth and enlightened reason.

They seek by falsehsod to create the impression that it is a contest between the scum of the saloon and the Sabbath-school, when Liberalism is supported and encouraged by the most influential citizens of the place, both men and women.

Yours for the cause of Liberalism,

GEORGE W. HAYES, Sec.

NEW YORK, Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to giv your readers a few of my ideas. First, take the land question. I consider it quite unnecessary to insist on nationalizing all the land, as Henry George teaches, and thereby disturb needlessly the minds of millions of title-holders. All the good desired by his doctrin will be reached by taxing the ground only, and exempt all and every improvement thereon, of any kind whatever. This would touch and disturb only the speculators in lands and lots, concerning which we are all agreed that this class is a curse. The tax would then fall heavier on unproductiv land and vacant lots than now. Such holders would either build on the lots and cultivate the land, or sell it, and probably much more of it than now would be sold for taxes. This is my remedy. With the exception of the speculators, all other title-holders could and would support this plan. I voted for George, but since I learned that he is opposed to any income tax, I dropped him, because I consider a graded or progressiv income tax the most just tax, borne the easiest, and only by those best able to pay it, and exempting all the poor class. This tax would be worth more for the majority than all else. As it is now, the poor pay proportionately more in taxes than the rich, even if the latter honestly paid his personal taxes; but as now he evades and dodges even them. If these two ideas or principles on taxation were put forward, I cannot but believe that soon a majority of voters could be obtained for it. This would prevent excessiv accumulation of land and wealth to a few persons only. Now is the time, the best chance to revise the constitution, and agitate.

Now, another subject is the 287 B.M., or B.S. I would ask these advocates, Is man not older? or is science older? I was asked to see and read the articles on "Chronology" in the Encyclopedia Britannica, and I will do the same, and ask whoever has a chance of access to that work to see and read that article, and I predict that whoever is able to read with understanding and profit will find that any new era, except it commence counting from the earliest known time, would be only a curse. This year of 287 will not date "A.D." No, no! but has taken it nevertheless for its foundation.

FRED KOEZLY.

CHARLOTTE HARBOR, FLA., Jan. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I notice much fun is being made in different ways of faith cures, and laying on of hands, etc. Now, while I believe there is much evil results caused by overworking all things, mentally, morally, physically, or spiritually, still I believe there is good in all things, and everything should be worked or used according to its ability and usefulness. Now, while so many utterly ignore all things spiritual, and others pitying them ignore everything materialistic, I should like you to publish the following cures done by myself, while the people yet liv who hav been cured. I will only speak of three, although I hav cured many more; in fact, never miss a case where faith is strong.

Case No. 1, at Fort Bassinger, Fla. I was teaching a small school. One of my little scholars, Mr. Rauluson's boy, aged nearly six years, was bitten by a large stub-tailed, cotton-mouthed moccasin snake. The child swelled from the foot to the crown of his head. I preached here as well as taught. They sent for me. When I got there the little fellow was so much swelled that his skin was nearly bursting, and he was beginning to turn black. Some spots on him were nearly as large as my hand. I used some simple remedies, but kept rubbing him gently with my hands. My simple work and their great faith cured the child the fourth day.

Case No. 2, at Fort Bassinger. Mrs. Chandlier had a cancer on the side of her nose. It affected her eye and whole side of her face. She was old, having grown children, and when she wished me to cure the cancer, I confess my faith was weak. I had business at Sanford, Fla. I consulted Dr. ———, who said it was no use. He had burnt them out with lunar caustic, but on the side or anywhere about the bridge of the nose they could not be cured. I returned to Bassinger, and after consulting the inner man long and earnestly, I finally got faith. I used some simple remedy. It and our faith did make her whole. The cancer was gone, and the place where it had been showed no scar. I was greatly surprised, as it was done so quickly.

Case No. 3 is here, and a negro woman. I was teaching a little negro school, when one day, about four weeks ago, an old darkey known as Parson Joe came running to the schoolhouse and told me Aunt Ann had broke her leg right off, and wanted me to go and see her. I took a piece of sack and the coal-oil can, and put out for the field. I found the leg broken off below the knee. I took some splinters and bound the leg tight, poured plenty of oil on it, and told her she could walk on it again in three days from that day, and she did it, and is now as well as ever.

Now, all this can be proven. I don't wish to see medicin thrown away. Neither would I wish to see faith given up. My belief is that simple medicin and great faith are better than strong medicin and weak faith, for the mind truly has much to do in making the person. Let us do all the good we can, each in our own way. None of us is perfect. There are many of to-day who ought to hav Jesus's story of the mote and beam retold to them, and heed it.

Yours for truth in all its forms, REV. S. B. HURLBUT.

LE ROY, KAN., Jan. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A teacher of fair qualification, in 1837, while endeavoring to make the arithmetical rule of subtraction plain, called my attention to the "bottom principle of the rule," to wit, take nought from nought, and nought remains; and I hav pondered over that "bottom principle" for fifty years, and am now totally unable to seize, to grasp, to comprehend nothing; ergo, am forced to pronounce it raw material, too intensely intangible for practical purposes. That teacher taught me also that before anything—material—was, a something in the form of a man existed, filling all space, inclosing all power, possessing all wisdom, and I hav striven to comprehend, to analyze this problem, but for space to exist without a material boundary is as impossible for me to comprehend as "was the before" anything existed. He taught me also that this "form of a man," enthroned in "boundless space" by the exercise of his "will power," instantaneously developed, in all its beauty, loveliness, perfection, vastness, and sublimity, the "material universe," and though time has passed since the exercise of that "power" that the whole cycle of numbers cannot measure, yet its loveliness, beauty, sublimity, and grandeur show no change, nor has there been even one diminutiv star added thereto, or, in fact, taken therefrom. Then I must conclude, a priori, that that "form of a man," like the unfading amaranth, expanded to the remotest bounds of the universe, and now as "before time was" reveals no space wherein to locate a loathsome hell or an incomprehensible, intangible heaven, but overwhelms every observer by its inexpressible sublimity. Then, ho! every being possessing the "form of a man," come, come! and see and know the possible, the inevitable, the incontrovertible conclusion of this grand problem, to wit, if that "form of a man" was omnipotent, omniscient, and filled to its most remote bounds the incomprehensible universe, you individually constitute the elements and collectivly compose that something possessing the "form of man;" ergo, if that "it" was the personification of all good—and that "it" was, we hav the voluntary testimony of all those possessing the "form of man," from the moment of the grand, glorious, infinit expansion—then what hav you to care for but the never-ending to-day? You are the god.

If possible, continue the illustrations, and nail to the foremast-head of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER the sunlit flag on whose folds are inscribed the unalterable, the unchanging demands of all intelligent people, and under that flag may you place every ocean, sea, and bog, and enter every terrestrial home. A. V. COFFIN.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Jan. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I promised you, please find inclosed a draft for twenty dollars, which use as directed.

Mr. Editor, I did not expect you would publish my last letter, but I am not sorry you did. Since you hav done so, allow me to say a few words more. Where are we drifting? Look at Boston, Chicago, San Francisco. See how the devils are acting. Yes, devils in human shape, tearing up railroads, and playing the devil generally. What is to become of the country if such things are permitted to go on the way they hav been going for the past few years? The only way that I can see to prevent these things is to hav a little judicious hanging. If that will not prevent this devilment that has been going on along back, then I don't know what will. In the name of heaven, what good does all this mischief do the laboring classes? It looks very much to me like the man who killed the goose that laid the golden egg. It does more harm than good to the laboring classes. Are the people so foolish as to suppose that capitalists are going to build railroads, factories, and other things for the fun of seeing them torn to pieces or burnt up? How long will it be, if things go on in this way, before capital will be driven from the country? The way to hav good times is to make capital secure. I would rather hav ten enterprising capitalists in the town where I am than a thousand labor strikers. Why? because we laborers can't do anything without capitalists, or money, to do it with. I am a laboring man myself. I hav worked for a living ever since I was large enough to work (I am nearly seventy-three years old), and I never saw a day that I could not find something to do at some price. If I could not get my own price I would do the next best thing until I could find something better, and this advice I would giv to all laborers, Do the best you can for yourself and mind your own business, and let other people's business alone. Many a one has made a fortune in that way, but no one ever made any thing in the other but the contempt of every honest man.

Mr. Editor, in my opinion the people owe it to themselvs to vindicate their right to citizenship, their right to possess property, and their right to use it lawfully as they please, if they hav to stamp out all strikes and strikers until they stop their nefarious work of all kinds. N. D. GOODELL.

MCMINVILLE, TENN., Feb. 1, 1887.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I like your name, but one of the greatest mysteries I hav ever met with is, that you can hardly find two people on earth that agree in every thing as to what is truth? But here is another mystery about as great: Our never-ceasing bickerings, and jealousies, and quarrels about these differences of opinion. If I prefer a pencil, and you pen and ink to write with, is that a just cause for animosity? If I feel sure that I am going the road to heaven, and you to hell, hav I any reason to hate you for it, or you to hate me? If there is a great future, as some of us think, the difference that will be made between us there will not be so much on account of our differences of opinion as on account of the difference of our affections. It will be whether we hav loved one another and done good, or hav we hated each other and done evil? Having been in the church or out of it will not be brought up in the trial at all. If there is a God, as some of us believe, he don't want our bread and meat and potatoes; he wants us to love and help each other.

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if I should advance some ideas different from some I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER, don't think I hate you or any of your correspondents. I love you all, as I love my own soul. But one thing I am afraid of: that you will not publish what I write, and then I will hav nothing for my time and trouble. But I will write once and see what will become of my offspring. And let me begin with "G. W. B.," Portland, Oregon. He says he is "not much of a Jesus man." Well, here is one thing I would say, and it seems to me it might stir him up a little. If he is right about Jesus and the great future, I am as safe as he is; but if I am right, can he say his condition is as good as mine? But the fact of my faith about Jesus, as I hav already intimated, is a small matter. I must love my fellow-man, and treat him as I would like him to treat me.

My dear Brother Bowman says, "I wonder how old Christ was when he was born."

Suppose that the eternal came to earth and took upon him a human form, and that human form was what was called the humanity. Then I would ask Mr. Bowman to answer his question himself. He would say that the humanity of Jesus was about as old as any of the rest of us were when we were born. But the divinity, who will tell us how old he was?

That Jesus Christ was thus God and man is proven positivly from the fact that he loved, and pitied, and suffered like a man, yet raised the dead, cured diseases, and in a moment quelled the violence of the storm like a God.

Brother Bowman asks "whether if Jesus Christ should walk into Trinity church, in New York, with his old clothes on, he would be welcome." But I would ask, What has that to do with the Bible, or Christ, or Christianity?

And if there is "a young preacher out West that has promised to marry five young ladies," does that prove Christ to be an impostor, and God to be a myth? As well might we say that one spurious coin proves all coins to be valueless. It is exceedingly humiliating to see so much of self and the love of the world in our preachers and the churches of the present day. But then I am often forced to ask my own heart, Am I any better? While we are condemning others, it might be well to heed Christ's admonition, "Cast first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull the mote off thy brother's eye."

He says further that "the Bible was made for impostors to preach and fools to believe."

A man who can say that says:

1. That he has never read the Bible with care and thought, for if he had he could see wisdom in that book that he can never find anywhere else.

2. That he has never read history, except it is Infidel history, for if he had he would know that a large majority of the wisest men that hav lived for the last eighteen and one-half centuries were strong believers in Christ and the Bible of Christ.

It shocks me to hear him speak of being "washed in the blood of the pig." Christ is called a lamb because he was clean and innocent. His blood was shed for us; he died for us. But by the blood of Christ is meant truth. Oh, that we could all see the truth! To see the truth, love it, and obey it, is the way to heaven. Oh, that all truth seekers might find it!

Do you tell Brother Bowman that when we get to heaven, if there are two saints for every harp, it will be all right, for no one would like to be playing on his harp all the time; for while half are playing, the others will put in their time lamenting their lost brothers.

He says: "Everybody will be going to heaven pretty soon, for hell will soon be full."

Hell may be a bigger place than we think, as we havn't been there yet to see how big it is.

A great deal of what Brother Bowman says is merely "ridiculing of sacred things." I wish I could see him and join with him in prayer. But if he says there is no God to pray to, I will ask him to tell me something about his origin. He did not make himself. He was dependent at first for his existence on some power other than himself, and he must be dependent for the continuation of his existence on the same power that made him.

Dear Editor, your "slight disagreement" is a wonder to me. You seem to forget, or not to hav noticed, two things: 1. That as a general thing all animals are afraid of man. 2. That when God spoke to Adam, man had not sinned. A vast change must hav taken place after that event.

And the "mockery of faith" is another wonder. But I will keep back what I hav to say on this subject for another article, provided you publish this and send me a copy.

Yours in love, yours in the very kindest of feelings,

J. R. HAGGARD.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Jan. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been an Infidel or Liberal for fifteen years; a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year; and am a member of the Secular Union. I hav read with interest the various communications from different Liberals with due deference and respect for all my fellows, of whatever shade of belief.

I desire to express my humble opinion. First, I am very sorry to read the special notice or dun for money owing to our paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Such things destroy that confidence we should hav in one another, a confidence which is the only true standard of brotherly love and friendship. When a Freethinker or Liberal cannot, by reason of circumstances, pay for his paper, let him come right out like a man and say so. Then let us put things in a shape so that those who are able will be induced (and, surely, they ought to be willing) to contribute to the deficiency, and without trying to make a show of our generosity either.

Another thing I am very much pained to read in our paper is, that a set of men supposed to be consistent and reasonably well informed, if not a little more intelligent than those who hav traveled through life in the old ruts of superstition, should think that Freethought means to be free to think and concoct crime of any sort, or free to try to overturn any system of civil law—no matter by whom enacted—that is a reasonable protection to humanity, without putting something better in its place. I now refer to Anarchism. When the telegraph flashed the news of that butchery (the outcome of our already too free institutions) in Chicago, the whole law-abiding portion of the United States were up in arms. Knights of Labor hastened to denounce such men and measures, and in almost every city and hamlet public sentiment was a unit against such law-breakers. Now, are any considerable number of Liberals going to allow themselvs to fall into that ridiculous fashion of petting criminals as soon as the bodies of those policemen hav got cold? There is scarcely a criminal in any jail in this country who does not hav a lot of soft-hearted women, with some men, to help start public sentiment in the other direction, and they too often succeed in defeating the ends of justice. It is simply silly to talk of the injustice of the law that may hang those men. If they hav, or one of their number has, violated the law, let them suffer without men from our ranks trying to make intelligent martyrs of those murderers who hav come to this land by the invitation of its people, and then turn on them and try to overturn the laws of the only free government under the sun based on liberal principles. If the law, by which those men may hang, is wrong, go about it in an orderly manner and work for its repeal. I notice one Liberal speaks of that bomb-thrower as being an emissary of the capitalists. Was anything of that kind proven? Besides, hav not those men stood right there in open court, and derided and defied our laws? The outlook under present circumstances for true Liberalism does not look nearly as encouraging to me as it should. No great and good end can be accomplished without unity of action and some regular system or plan, and, most of all, a well-defined good principle must underlie and accompany it throughout. Another thing that speaks bad for the cause espoused by those condemned men is that, to say the least, here in Springfield, where I am thoroughly acquainted, you cannot find a man who will defend those men, except the sluggers, shoulder-hitters, and worst class of vagabonds we hav. They can be seen examining pictures, and eulogizing the condemned men, while they fill themselvs with whisky. Although I lack the polish and education of which I should hav been glad to avail myself, I am not writing for fame or glory. I wish to state—call it prediction or what you may—that our society will grow not one-half as fast among people of intelligence and strict reliability if we are to hav such things to contend with. In my judgment, "N. G. W.'s" private opinion publicly expressed in regard to every mother's son of those policemen at the Haymarket should hav remained a private opinion rather than to be expressed in terms of that character, and I shall prefer to remain egotistic if in order to be free I must espouse the cause of a lot of ranters who in the name of free speech advised murder, pillage, and incendiarism. Those men would never hav had the police there to stop their meeting had they always been conducting themselvs in an orderly, peaceable manner. And if the stopping of that riotous demonstration by the Catholic police was a victory against Infidels, I cannot see it but in the light that our society must advocate Anarchism. I can only look at it that although all Anarchists may be Infidels, yet the majority of Infidels are not in any sense Anarchists. The absolute free speech idea must fall to the ground at once. With that you cannot hinder me from advocating slanders of any kind, or going on the street and preaching in favor of gambling-dens or any other kind of a den that no set of orderly people would tolerate.

In conclusion allow me add I came to this country in 1864 from Switzerland, and hav lived in Sangamon county, Illinois, for twenty-two years continually. I had but five dollars when I landed. Myself and wife hav saved a comfortable property by hard work. We hav never given one cent to the church; never had a living being raise a question against our character for square dealing in any way. I keep a permanent eating-house on a principal street and show THE TRUTH SEEKER around fearlessly among the people, and know what turns more people away from reading and endorsing it than anything else; and I believe nothing would suit church people (who are posted) better than to hav a chance to make it appear that we are Anarchists, Communists, and Socialists.

My best wishes are with the paper, and I do not believe free thought, speech, or press is going down, but want to see the best means used to raise it to the highest standard of right. S. PFARRER.

FORT LARAMIE, WYO. TERR., Jan. 29, 1887.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Let us shake! If there is one thing more than another that I admire THE TRUTH SEEKER for, it is the stand it took in regard to admitting a free discussion of the economic or industrial questions in Liberal Leagues, and its protest in behalf of the condemned Chicago Anarchists. I know of hundreds of simon-pure Freethinkers who hav lost interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the simple reason that having passed through the rudimentary stage of Freethought, which heretofore has dealt almost exclusivly with the religious phase of the question, they passed on to the still more important question of the distribution of the products of labor. Mr. Jamison, together with other so-called Freethinkers who discontinue their subscriptions to this paper because it has dared to question the act of the farce in Chicago, called a court of justice, had better return to the church, where they properly belong. Mr. Jamison exhibits more intolerance than many Christians whom I know, and for my part, I wouldn't lose much time in an attempt to set a man of his opportunities right.

The names of the condemned Anarchists, whom Mr. Jamison would doubtless delight in seeing executed, will occupy a bright page in history alongside those of Robert Emmett, John Brown, and others, when that of Mr. Jamison is buried in oblivion, or only remembered to be despised. Spies, Fielden, Parsons, and the other condemned men are simply paying the penalty of resisting the tyrannical powers that be, and if executed, will go to join illustrious predecessors who hav dared to expose the villainy of the oppressors of the people. Let Mr. Jamison be relegated to the ranks of the consensus of the competent, along with Abbot, Underwood, et al., who joined hands with the law and order element to place D. M. Bennett behind the bars of a bastile. Better a thousand times that THE TRUTH SEEKER should cease to exist than for it to refuse the use of its columns for the free discussion of every question which affects the welfare of humanity. Fraternally, J. ALLEN EVANS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Four Bills.

A gas bill lay on a table green—
The prettiest gas bill ever seen;
Patrician was it, puffed with pride,
It reposed with ease on its paper side,
A pink yonng thing, with a margin wide.
The figures on it in a row
Made a stunningly handsome little show;
They were four in number, small and sweet,
The cost of many a thousand feet;
You may wager your all, they were there complete!

A plumber's bill on a mantel near
Looked down on the sheet with a covert sneer;
It dryly said, "You look so queer,
Puffed out in your pride while I am here!
Really, now, were it worth my while,
I'm not quite sure bnt I'd try to smile!
I'm always about you—can't you see
You are no account by the side of me?"
A wrangle ensued between the two,
As troubles from pride will often brew.

An ice bill grinned as it watched the fun,
Not seeming to care for either one;
It glanced at both as they fiercely swelled,
And then remarked that it felt compelled
To interfere in the quarrel there,
And frowned on each with a savage glare.
"You quarrel for the foremost place,"
It said with a sneer on its clammy face:
"The summer's coming, and then you'll see Where both of you stand by the side of me."

A drink bill then came staggering in—
A bill for beer, and brandy, and gin,
Together with whisky, wine, and rum—
The whole a most astonishing sum.
Said the drink bill to the other three,
"You look dumb gaunt beside of me;
A thousand per cent upon first cost
In crime and pain, I figure, is lost;
You see you are left, I hav no doubt,
So make your bow and hustle out."

Biographical.

I.—GIORDANO BRUNO.

Of all men that ever lived on the planet earth, perhaps not one ever gave such an impulse to science and revealed truth as did Giordano Bruno. Few hav shown such extraordinary mental capacity, and none has expressed himself so clearly and boldly at a period when it was regarded as a crime to think and to talk upon questions not under the sanction of ecclesiasticism.

The town of Nola, not far from Naples, in Italy, is the place honored by the birth of the great philosopher and promulgator of Freethought.

In the year 1548 this illustrious man first saw the light. His original name wus Filippo, but when he became, at fifteen, a novitiate of the Dominican (Catholic) order, his name was changed to that of Giordano.

He early became a doubter upon the recognized problems of Christianity as then taught, and boldly questioned the authorities. He was a born skeptic, and when only sixteen he discarded the doctrin of the "holy Trinity" as most absurd, and laughed at the scriptural version of the origin of man as too ridiculous for belief. Before this, he was reprimanded and dealt with leniently, because he was an able and brilliant scholar, and so bright and shining a light was wanted in the church.

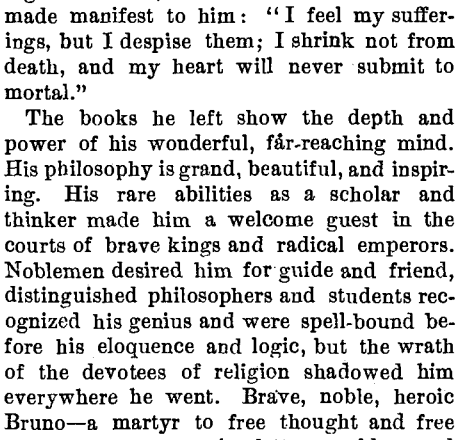
Copernicus had been dead twenty-six years, but had left behind him an astronomical history that startled the world, and this doctrin of the great astronomer became the belief of Bruno, who boldly expressed his adherence to it.

Then, for the third time, was his creed investigated, and as he was about to be summarily dealt with by the priests, he was obliged to flee from the wrath tc come, and he became a wanderer from place to place.

The Protestants were just as bitter against him as were the Catholics, and John Calvin would hav put him to death for doubting the so-called "Word of God," as quickly as he did Servetus. He taught what is now an accepted fact, i.e., the revolution of the earth; and the people were ready to destroy him for it. But he continued teaching and debating wherever he went, from one country to another, and was almost continually compelled to flee after speaking the truth. He was imprisoned in dungeons for seven years, the fiends of the Inquisition having been seeking his death for some time; and was, after submitting to great insult and abuse, sentenced to be burnt alive. It may never be known to what tortures he was subjected by the Romish church in order to make him renounce his convictions. Honestly, bravely, he admitted all the heresies charged against him, and fearlessly gave good reasons for them—reasons that could not truthfully be gainsaid or disproved. He could not, he would not, recant when he knew he had the honest truth and that alone. He tried to make others free, to show the worth and beauty of reason, truth, and common sense over falsehood, duplicity, and hypocrisy. He strove to remove the chains of superstition and bigotry from the human mind, to show the right of all men to think and believe each for himself; and for this he was burnt alive, tied to a stake, and the hot flames made to hiss and scorch and blister his poor body until death brought relief to his sufferings. He said, when his awful doom was made manifest to him: "I feel my sufferings, but I despise them; I shrink not from death, and my heart will never submit to mortal."

The books he left show the depth and power of his wonderful, far-reaching mind. His philosophy is grand, beautiful, and inspiring. His rare abilities as a scholar and thinker made him a welcome guest in the courts of brave kings and radical emperors. Noblemen desired him for guide and friend, distinguished philosophers and students recognized his genius and were spell-bound before his eloquence and logic, but the wrath of the devotees of religion shadowed him everywhere he went. Brave, noble, heroic Bruno—a martyr to free thought and free speech, thy name, in letters golden and eternal, shines as no other name in the heaven of human liberty and human redemption!

Although money has been raised in this country, and in other lands, to erect a statue to his memory on the very spot where he was so cruelly and barbarously executed, yet his greatest monument is, and must ever be, in the hearts of those who are made better and nobler by his teachings. He began a new system of scientific knowledge, showing that everything moved in obedience to fixed and immutable laws, instead of being ordered by a changeable and capricious God, as was then being taught.



An effort has been made to date a new era, the era of science, from the day of his terrible martyrdom in Rome, February 17, 1600, and the same is in use by many Liberals now; but, whether it should ever be brought into general recognition or not, let no one cease to remember the worth, the intellectual grandeur, the greatness, of the immortal Italian philosopher, the friend of freedom and pioneer of scientific knowledge, whose efforts broadened and brightened the world we liv in, who organized a system of knowledge, showing the universe to be governed by law, and gave his body to be burnt for the cause of truth and science—Giordano Bruno.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Where was Bruno born? In what year? What was his original name? When did he discard the doctrin of the Trinity? What does "holy Trinity" mean? Why was he obliged to flee from his country? What did he teach? How long was he in prison, and what for? Could anyone disprove his theories? For what did he strive? When condemned to death, what did he say? What can you say of his teachings? Who recognized his genius? What can you say of his monument? When was his martyrdom? What of the new era? Why should we remember and honor his memory?

Correspondence.

OMAHA, Jan. 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am ten years old, and go to school and learn English, German, and music. I read every TRUTH SEEKER, and like the Corner very much. I would like to hav your yicture; we hav several pictures of Freethinkers in our rooms. I hav heard S. P. Putnam, and like him very much.

Your little friend, JOSIE JUERGENSEN.

ARLINGTON, NEB., Feb. 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON, AND THE LITTLE FREETHINKER FRIENDS: I see so many letters in the Children's Corner, that I thought I would write. My mother and I are at home all alone. I hav a brother and a sister; my brother goes to school every week, and my sister is married. My father has gone to California. You will excuse my bad writing. I will close. Love to you and the children of the Corner. JUSTIN J. HAMMER.

RYERSON, MICH., Feb. 2, 1887

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to you for the first time. I like to read the letters in the Children's Corner. I am ten years old. I go to school. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, and language. My pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for three years. If you think this is good enough to publish, I will try to write again. Hoping you spent a merry Christmas and a happy New Year, I remain, Yours truly. ADA MCEVILLA.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 3, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am ten years old, and go to a public school. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly six years, and I like the Children's Corner very much. I had the "Story Hour" for my Christmas. I hav three brothers and one sister. My brother has "Little Lessons for Little Folks." This being my first letter, I think I will close now, hoping to see this letter printed.

Respectfully yours, RALPH STOUT.

BRADFORD, O., Jan. 30, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw that my other letter was published, so I thought I would write again. I hav no sisters or brothers. Maybe I can write a story for the Children's Corner. Mamma is reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read in the Children's Corner every week. I just finished reading about the world we liv in. Bradford has thirteen hundred inhabitants. It has five churches. There are only three little Freethinker boys here. For Christmas Mamma bought me the "StoryHour," and I think it is very nice. Papa went to hear Mr. Putnam two nights, and he thought his lectures were very good.

This is my second letter.

Yours respectfully, CLAUDE SMITH.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, VA.,
Feb. 6, A. S. 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Your kindly reception emboldens me to visit your cheerful Corner again. I offer a few contributions toward that "Song Hour," which I wish you to edit. If such rhymes suit you, I will let my versetry mill grind out some more of the same sort. Teach the children temperance by all means; without that, other things are not of much account. It is by Bands of Hope, Cadets of Temperance, and such things, that the churches are recruited. Let Liberals not be remiss in the juvenil temperance work. The children are to be the redeemers of the nation, and Secularists must train all the youth they can reach to think well and to drink not at all. The science articles that you hav so well begun in the Children's Corner will be most helpful. They should be collected when done, and bound in a "Science Hour" book. With my compliments to all in the Corner, I shall remain, Your poet ever,

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

ROCHELLE, ILL., Feb. 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a boy eleven years old. I go to a public school, and study arithmetic, language, geography, physiology, reading, and spelling. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has taken it many years, with other papers. He writes so much in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I thought I would write, too. There are eight rooms in the school where I go, and I am in the fifth room. I hav two sisters and one brother. I had a little brother that died two years ago. I think he was the dearest little boy that ever lived. We hav two cats named Thomas Paine and Benjamin Franklin. I cannot tell them apart only by their tails—one is shorter than the other. My father is an Infidel, and I think that is the right way to believe. We hav your "Story Hour" and your "Apples of Gold." We think they are the nicest books in the world. I guess I will hav to close for this time. OTTO WETTSTEIN, JR.

CASEY, IOWA, Feb. 3, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner. It is the first time I hav tried. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight years. He said it was a splendid paper. I read the Children's Corner. I am nine years old, and read in the Fourth Reader. I hav been going to school every day, but I hav been sick for twelve days and didn't get to school. It is so cold here that I cannot go out to play. I hav to stay in the house. I hav five brothers and no sisters, and one sister-in-law, niece, and nephew, and a father and mother. I shall like to see summer come, so my nephew and I can play out of doors. I study geography, arithmetic, reading, spelling, and writing. With best wishes for your happiness, I remain, Your friend,

ANNETTRE HAGER.

BALSTON SPA, Jan. 23, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines to let you know that I was very much disappointed in not seeing you at the convention last September, but I must say that we had a very nice time swinging, rowing, and singing. I met with a great many Liberals there, and they are just the nicest people I ever saw. Well, I will tell you what a joke Mr. Somerby and the rest of THE TRUTH SEEKER people got on my father and mother. My sister Hattie and myself went the first Sunday to the meeting, and had a nice time. So mother and father started the Saturday following, and thought it not convenient for us to go, so went alone by a very early train, and got there just in time for dinner. In the mean time, Mr. Somerby and the rest of THE TRUTH SEEKER people drove seven miles another route, and took sister Hattie and myself over to the convention; and just as ma and pa had sat down to dinner, I tapped ma on her shoulder, and you should hav seen how surprised she was, and they all laughed, and I tell you we had a nice time. I warrant some of them won't forget it any more than I will. Now, the next thing is, I had a handsome surprise at Christmas of a beautiful Christmas card, with two little girls, and a book called, "Little Lessons for Little Folks." I guess where the book came from, but the card is a mystery unto this day. But a thousand thanks to the donors. I hope you had a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year as I did.

Well, I guess that this letter will take up too much room, so I will close.

Your little Liberal friend,

SADIE E. THORPE.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.

SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.

OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

The Injured Pedal.

I believe the millions, and billions, and quadrillions of worlds are inhabited. . . . I think all worlds loyal but this. The great organ of the universe, its pedals, its pipes, and its keys, are all one great harmony, save one injured pedal, save one broken stop—the vox humana of the human race—this disloyal world. And Christ must mend the key.—Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, in Christmas Sermon.

Of course, Brother Talmage, of course,
You say it, and so it must be,
For, whatever Reason and figures declare,
The Truth must with Talmage agree,
Or so much the worse for the truth!
Those quadrillion worlds are sustained
By God and his book, when the sense of the verse
Is rightly drawn out and explained.
(The branches may wither in blight,
The trunk may be twisted and stubbed,
But the crab-tree of God will yield apples of gold
If once it is piously clubbed.)

"He made the stars also." By this
We know that by him they were made;
We know, now, the stars are all glorious worlds;
God knows that we know, hence if weighed
In the scales of an enlightened age,
Earth, satellites, planets, and suns
Revolve in the text, and a wayfaring fool
May read it as fast as he runs.

Hence, therefore, whatever evolves
From darkness, confusion, and doubt,
Rewarding the patience of martyr and sage—
A fact hammered painfully out—
We find it is measured and classed
In scriptures, though wisely concealed,
Till God has been taught by the science of man
How much may be safely revealed.

This great astronomical text,
When prayerfully pondered, implies
All things whatsoever unless it may be
The thing that it flatly denies;
And so it is proper to hold
That beings resembling man
Are dwelling in all these quadrillion worlds
According to God's perfect plan.

This theory, oft entertained
By Infidels, proves after all
That infinit realms of an infinit king
Are fenced in with no common wall;
"But bounded by God on the North,
On the South, and the East, and the West,"
And God is circumference and center, and God
Is all there is of it—the rest
Is sorrow, rebellion, and sin,
And these are a local affair
Produced from the dust of an unruly world,
And finished in hell and despair.

"And all worlds are loyal but this,
Each pedal, each pipe, and each key
Attached to the organ of God's universe
Are one in divine harmony;
Save one injured pedal, save one
Broken stop, which, alas! we must name
The vox humana of the lost human race,
And Jesus must doctor the same."

When Satan, through chaos, from sheol
Arrived at the sun and beheld
The ten million billion quadrillion of stars
That circled around him, he yelled
"Defiance at heaven's blue vault,"
And, spotting this earth for his prey,
As God in his infinit love had ordained,
He spoiled it in less than a day.

Old Jupiter, Venus, and Mars,
Uranus, and Saturn, and all
The neighboring spheres were avoided because
They were not molested. Man's fall
Preconceived, was, however, unwished,
The rich flavored fruit that excelled
Was flavored to tempt, but God never desired
The result those conditions compelled.

Imagin a quadrillion sons
Of one single father—suppose
That all of them dwell in his favor but one,
And he, in his ignorance, shows
A strong disposition to judge,
And choose from appearance—believe
The father in mercy indulges the youth
With evil prepared to deceive;
You see how the boy is at fault,
You see that the father is kind,
The lad has two eyes, he should look through a board,
Or suffer for being so blind;
So Adam, though doomed from the first,
Had power to resist, but the game
He was destined to play, and was destined to lose,
He lost, and was therefore to blame.

The tree standeth up when it stands,
The tree falleth down when it falls,
The wind passeth by as it travels along,
The shock is severe that appalls;
Things are as they are, and they are Not as God fondly hoped they would be,
But fixed by a compact he made with himself,
And does not annul, don't you see?

When Satan had ruined the earth,
Oh, what if the havoc had spread
And upset the Lord in a quadrillion worlds!
Then, Jesus, thy blood that was shed
For this had been needed by those,
And thou wouldst be bleeding to-day—
And ten million billion quadrillion quintillion
Of years would not finish the fray.

An average of four thousand years
To each individual star,
Would hav to be spent in preparing to shape
Thy coming from regions afar;
Then millions and billions of seed
Of trillions of women would bruise
The heads of a quadrillion serpents or more
As Satan might dictate and chose.

Thirty-three weary years at a stretch,
A quadrillion times thou wouldst liv
With beings like man, and a quadrillion times
Thy murderers thou wouldst forgiv;
Three times a quadrillion of days
In hell thou wouldst preach to the damned,
And hell in excess of its numbers to date,
A quadrillion times would be crammed.

A quadrillion crosses and spears,
A quadrillion God-inspired books,
A quadrillion Anthony Comstocks, besides
A similar bill of Joe Cooks,
A quadrillion deacons and popes,
A quadrillion thumbscrews and racks,
A quadrillion Ingersolls going about
Thrice armed with a quadrillion facts.

A quadrillion Talmages, strong
In the Lord and the power of his might,
A quadrillion cushions a quadrillion times
Would pound—but, thank Satan, his flight
Touched no other pedal but this,
At no other stop did he stop;
So, minus one key, the old organ goes on,
And Talmage goes off—with a pop!

FRANK FELT.

A Theological Romance.

It is now a little more than seventeen years since a very remarkable book, entitled, "Exeter Hall," was published in New York, by the American News Company. The book was said to be very ably written, and as the name of the author was not given, reviewers were puzzled to know who the writer could be, and among the numerous guesses Dickens and a certain noble lord and others in the higher ranks of literature in England were suggested as having written the work. Critical notices of the book in London, Boston, New York, and Chicago were largely favorable, and the secular press, though inclined, as usual, to court an approving nod from the church, could not but admit that some unusually clever expert, who was accustomed to be behind the scenes, had given the popular theology of the day one of the mightiest of blows, which sent it staggering, and causing numerous high priests, lord bishops, doctors of divinity, and reverends of the church militant to cry out in affright and confusion. Prominent theologians became alarmed. The five thousand copies of the first edition were soon exhausted. A demand was made for a fresh supply, and though unscrupulous priests had been very busy decrying the book and cautioning the faithful against its seductiv pages, thousands hav read the work, a large majority of whom hav left the church never to return. While struggling against powerful opposition, "Exeter Hall" has now, through the enterprise and independence of Messrs. Colby & Rich of Boston, reached its tenth edition.

Thousands more will hav to read this book; it should be to Liberals a household treasure. Its massiv logic, its keen reasoning, its array of proofs will awaken doubt, and must at last lead to the conviction of every honest investigator, and eventually silence the most stubborn. The highest praise has been awarded to the author for his keen research, for his presentation of biblical contradictions, for his exposure of priestly quibbles, jealousies, and frailties; for his recount of the wrongs arising from present social usages; for his condemnation of land monopoly long before Henry George wrote on the subject; for his strong denunciation of every kind of oppression, and for his deep and genuin sympathy with the poor, the wronged, and the afflicted of every land. All this is shown in a story which has been pronounced "beautiful, tender, and pathetic," and which has touched to the quick every reader who has calmly perused it.

A Chicago editor pronounced the book to be "the most scathing ever written in America since the 'Age of Reason,'" and stated to his knowledge that nearly every woman who was led on by the attractiv narrativ to finish the work became forever afterward alienated from the church. I speak for myself when I say that having been induced to read "Exeter Hall," by a dear friend, now passed away, I was led from darkness to light, and from the power of superstition to that of common sense. I hav read the book over and over, and every time with increased admiration; and I know that other women who hav perused it are ready to indorse this commendation. There should be no jealousy among Liberals, and when from my standpoint I pronounce "Exeter Hall" a work of incomparable excellence, I am inclined to think that few, if any, will deny it that deserved superiority. Some of the ablest writers in the Liberal ranks hav readily admitted as much.

A Boston writer says: "No book has ever appeared of a Liberal or progressiv character so effectiv and deadly a foe to old theology as this work, so deep in its knowledge of the sects of the day, so biting and keen in its sarcasm, and so beautiful in its tender, delicate, and pathetic appeals." The late LaRoy Sunderland wrote: "It treats on matters of which I hav had a life-long experience; and the pictures are all of them most truthfully drawn. It is a book for the million." B. F. Underwood says: "I wish a copy of 'Exeter Hall' could be put into the hands of every intelligent person in the United States," and Junius, Jr., "Not having until recently perused one (a novel) for years, yet I am proud to say that I hav read 'Exeter Hall.' And such a treat! It is ingeniously and powerfully written, and abounds in convincing arguments, splendid delineations of human nature, severe sarcasm, and a gorgeous array of historical data and facts. I would say don't rest until you hav purchased and read 'Exeter Hall.'"

I could giv many extracts from other writers, but those I hav given will be sufficient. It was suggested that "Exeter Hall" should be dramatized, but dreading the frown of the church what actor would risk his popularity, or what theatrical company would venture to shock a pious audience by appearing in characters as Martin Mannors, Rev. Dr. Buster, Rev. Tom McGlinn, or the beautiful Mary Mannors? No, the time is not yet ripe for this, but the stage of the future has a treat in store for the thousands whose applause will reëcho from the walls of empty churches. A translation of the work has been asked for particularly, as I know, by German Liberals. Had I the means and the ability, the people of Germany and France should soon hav one of the best and most enlightening literary treats that could be offered.

The author has written other books of rare excellence, and admirable in their way, but as "Exeter Hall" deals more directly with the Bible, with priestly assumptions, and with laws and usages hostil to the interests of the human race, it is a great iconoclast, and should find a place in the family of every Liberal. Let it be read, and when the scales fall from eyes long accustomed to see nothing but light and glory in Christianity, and when thousands of our infatuated worshipers look around in surprise after they hav become "clothed in their right mind," they will be ready to exclaim, Ex pede Herculem! I feel confident of this; and now, having as a duty said so much in favor of "Exeter Hall," I shall close these remarks by quoting from the book itself a trenchant verse, the prediction of the author:

"We've been waiting through the night,
And the dawn will soon appear;
And the mountain's misty hight,
From the clouds shall burst out bright;
And the eagle in his flight
Reach a radiant atmosphere;
And the toiler on his way
Shall look up and see the day."

—Mrs. E. Ellis in the Banner of Light.

Obituary.

MR. EDITOR: To the memory of the most Liberal friend we had we write this obituary.

Isaac Barclay, M.D., of Gustavus, Trumbull county, Ohio, died suddenly, January 26, 1887, aged sixty-five years. He was sick but about three hours; was driving towards home, and got as far as a neighbor's house, when he died with a violent attack of acute congestion of the lungs, with supposed heart trouble. He was one of a family of seventeen children, twelve boys and five girls, of which three are now alive. He graduated at the Cleveland, Ohio, Medical College, in 1847, and had been in activ practice as a physician and surgeon ever since, having lived in Gustavus the past twenty-three years. His experience in life, his vast acquaintance with the humane side of life, as well as his superiority of mind, led him, so far as is possible to know, to believe not in the Jewish or Bible God, but in the God of nature and humanity, in his own words a "supreme intelligence." So superior as a man, and so magnanimous in mind was he, that with all his acquaintances, and with the vast number of families he became physician to, he tied the cords of love, of respect, and affection so tightly by his kindness, his integrity and generosity, that when he died all were mourners, and his funeral attendance was larger than ever known in the community. The whole public were as one family of mourners.

His mind was clear to the last; in fact, not over five minutes before he died he felt his own pulse, and expressed himself as at peace with humanity. He was not a member of any church. For several years past he had repeatedly expressed himself as devoting his life and ability as a physician and surgeon to the public, and for the benefit of humanity, and he did, in fact, devote hundreds of dollars in service and in money to those needing assistance. To giv an example, in one instance, when a poor woman had raked together ten dollars to apply on her doctor's bill, he took the money, and taking out his pocket-book at the same time, took another ten dollar bill from it, wrapped it around the one the woman gave him, and handed them both back to her, saying, "I guess that will settle the bill." Numberless other cases could be cited, but space forbids. He was always first and foremost to aid in any public benefit, as well as private families needing aid, with his money, his attendance, and all. As a physician and surgeon he was unequaled. He leaves a widow, but no children. May a part of Rev. Mr. King's prayer come true when he said he wished more of us could walk and see as did Dr. Barclay. He never attended any church, but when Mr. Remsburg was here he was known to ride ten miles to hear the lecture, and then sit and talk with the lecturer until one and two o'clock in the morning. D. BURNS and I. N. PAYNE.

New Books.

The Kansas Blade, Concordia, has a few good words for each of following books just published at this office:

"Ingersoll's Lay Sermon," delivered before the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, New York, November 14, 1886. Price 5 cents. Our readers who may want this lecture in a substantial form can get it by sending 5 cents to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. It is one of the best of Ingersoll's lectures.

"Economic Equities; or, a Compend of Natural Laws of Industrial Production and Exchange." By J. K. Ingalls. The subject is ably handled and the work well printed. Price 25 cents. Every one should read it.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks." These are very pleasant stories for children. They explain many things in nature that are, when not understood, mysteries, but with the explanation simple and easy. Few children can read this book without being wiser and better, for it contains nothing but what should be taught, and the instruction is beneficial. Everybody wants to know all about plants and animals, diamonds, and precious stones, and the numerous minerals. This book does not describe all the animals nor minerals, but it does many of them, and in a very fascinating style. There are very few aged people but what can learn important truths from it. Buy one and you will never regret the money. It costs 40 cents, and can be had of Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va., or at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, hav complimented the Gazetteer with the following publications recently issued by them:

"Bible Temperance," by Edwin C. Walker. Mr. Walker givs in this little book every reference to the drinking of intoxicating liquors to be found in the Bible, and these references are classified under the following heads: Passages unequivocally condemning the use of wine (a short chapter, by the way); passages commending or encouraging the use of wine or strong drink (a very long chapter); passages conditionally condemning the use of wine; passages which incidentally mention the use of wine; passages showing that scripture wine did intoxicate. We especially commend this little book to the members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Price 10 cents.

"Personal Existence after Death Improbable," by L. R. Smith. Mr. Smith has gone over the evidences presented by different classes in favor of immortality, and his conclusion is that man is mortal. This book presents the facts of nature on which Materialists base their conclusions in a strong light. "Facts change beliefs, but beliefs can not alter facts," says Mr. Smith, in commencing the investigation, which is true enough. After going over the field he arrives at the conclusion "that there is not the slightest foundation in known facts upon which belief in a future life can be built." The world generally does not agree with Mr. Smith, but it is easier to deny his conclusions than refute his arguments; and yet, how little do we know after all! We recommend this book to Brother Burhans. Price 10 cents.

"The Origin of the Christian Bible," by O. B. Whitford, M.D. Price 25 cents. This is an exceedingly interesting book, and contains many facts regarding the origin of the books of the Old and New Testaments, of which most persons are utterly ignorant. We will not venture an opinion as to its merits, but respectfully refer the matter to the editor of Our Battle Flag.

"A Masonic Vindication of Right, a Protest against Persecution," by O. B. Whitford, M.D. Mr. Whitford was a Freemason, was "fired" out of the order by the grand lodge of Montana, because he wrote and published an antichristian book, and declared himself an Infidel. Masonry dates back by tradition to the time of King Solomon, consequently has nothing to do with Christianity, and hence Brother Whitford has a perfect right to "kick" against the action of his grand lodge. The pamphlet is interesting, and we respectfully recommend it to the thoughtful consideration of the grand lodge of the state of Texas, which body, from recent decisions, we judge to be in harmony of sentiment with the grand lodge of Montana. Price 15 cents.—Denison (Tex.) Gazeteer.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

The Busts of Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll. Cabinet size; true to life, price, $1.50 each. Every admirer of these apostles of Religious Liberty should hav them.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. panel, 10½x17, $3; boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. Gives cheer and hope to the afflicted bysaying and proving that SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., can be cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. No failure in any case.

It is one of Dr. Fellows's valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected by pad and bandage, which cures by absorption, and which is the only reliable method of curing Seminal Weakness and Loss of Sexual Power.

Send five 2-cent stamps for his book "Private Counselor," telling all about the disease, and the external cure, with evidences of success. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J, and say where you saw this advertisment.

News of the Week.

THERE has been a strike, attended by some violence, among the streetcar drivers of Boston.

THE police took in forty-five persons for violating the excise law in this city last Sunday.

SNOW and ice in Montana and Dakota threaten not only floods and disaster in the spring, but suffering and death during the present season.

CHINA has made full indemnity for the attacks on American missionaries some months ago, and the emperor has proclaimed toleration throughout the empire.

THE Rev. Howard Crosby said last Sunday that he believed in the use of wine, and that the scriptures bore him out in that view. Some excitement was caused by this declaration.

THREE of the boys who sing in the cathedral that Mrs. A. T. Stewart built at Garden City, Long Island, were drowned while crossing the ice on a pond on their way home from church last Sunday.

HUNGARIAN MUNKACSY'S picture of "Christ before Pilate" has been sold to Mr. Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, for something over $100,000. which is the largest sum ever paid for a picture in this country.

CLEVELAND has vetoed the pension bill having for its object the "relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support."

THE coal-handlers' strike is over, with no apparent gain on either side. The men who went on strike will go back to work at the old rates, provided they can find employment. Coal is dropping again to former prices.

BILLS are being introduced in the national legislature at Washington to provide the country with guns, armor, and cruisers. There is a big surplus in the treasury, and some people think it should be spent at once.

At Belfast, Ireland, last Saturday night, gangs of Orangemen and Catholics raised a riot and pelted one another with stones. They were dispersed by the police. One man was stabbed, and some policemen were bruised.

MANY of Dr. McGlynn's parishioners hav signed a pledge that they will contribute no more money toward the support of the Catholic church until their pastor is restored to them. There is no prospect that McGlynn will be reinstated.

NEW YORK and Philadelphia capitalists hav just consummated what is one of the greatest coal deals ever made in the Monongahela valley. They hav secured about 6,000 acres of coal fields, and will control the price of coal to a very large extent.

MRS. DAVID RAITH, of Pekin, Ill., was taken to the asylum, having been crazed by religious excitement. This is the second case of insanity caused by the excitement attending a revival in Pekin, and citizens are taking steps to remove the revivalists from the city.

THERE is somewhat of a secession from the pope in Germany. The Catholics of that country oppose Bismarck, while the pope supports him, and the people there as here are protesting against so much politics from Rome. It is claimed for the pope that his design in upholding Bismarck and his army bill is to preserve the peace of Europe.

THE Rev. S. C. George, pastor, of Chamb rsburg, Pa., is charged with attempting to assault a servant girl while he was the guest of Dr. R. W. Ramsey. Mr. George declared that he was under the impression that the girl was sick when he attempted to enter her room. The Presbytery has dissolved his relation with the church, acquitted him of criminal assault, and reprimanded him for imprudence.

A SEQUEL to the encounter between Gen. William Sooy Smith and the Rev. Oliver J. Booth, on a Niagara Falls train, on January 3d, because of the clergyman's attention to General Smith's young wife, was the forced resignation of Mr. Booth from the rectorship of the church of the Ascension. It was then reported that the rector had some habits which interfered with his duties. It is now announced that Mr. Booth has gone to the Asylum for the Insane at Utica. The clergyman, it is said, has an unquestionable craving for stimulants.

Odds and Ends.

THE archbishop of Paris will be the next to receive the red hat from Rome, and is now safe in betting his old headgear on the ward election.

CALIFORNIA widows stand no nonsense. An Oakland paper stated that a citizen had gone to a happier home, and the widow has sued the paper for libel.

OMAHA man: "So you attended the French cooks' ball at St. Louis?" St. Louis man: "Yes." "I hear it was a great success." "It was—all but the supper."

Public Opinion tells us "How to Drink Water." We know how already, as we drink nothing else. Public Opinion ought to try its skill on temperance society officers.—Puck.

SAID a maid, "I will marry for lucre,"
And her scandalized ma almost shucre;
But when the chance came,
And she told the good dame,
I noticed she did not rebucre.

"WHAT do you weigh, Pat?" "Sometimes four hundred pounds, sir; and sometimes six hundred." "How do you make that out?" "Well, y' see I'm drivin' for a coal dealer, an' I always weighs the difference between the coal an' a ton."

"LOOK here," said a man this morning, going into his grocer's, "those eggs you sold me New Year's were bad." "Well, that wasn't my fault." "Whose fault was it then?" "Blamed if I know. How should I tell what was inside of them? I'm a groceryman; I'm no mind-reader."

"YES," said Mr. Hendricks to the minister, "I am proud of that dog. Why, he knows the different days of the week." Just then the dog began to run to a gun which stood in the corner, then back to his master, and wag his tail. "He's made a mistake this time, pa," said Bobby; "he thinks it's Sunday."

A WOMAN was seated in a cutter in front of a store on Monroe avenue the other day when the horse began to kick, and a pedestrian caught him by the bridle and observed, "Seems as if he was frightened at something." "Perhaps he is," replied the woman as she tumbled out, "but I always thought the front of a horse got scared first."

YOUNG husband: "It does seem to me you might learn how to cook better than that. My mother—" Young wife: "There, that will do; I refrain from learning how to cook on principle." "Oh, you do! Thinking of me, of course?" "No, of my son." "Son?" "Yes; I don't intend he shall ever make any nice girl miserable, bragging about my cooking."

IN the Arkansaw legislature. Member from White Oak Fork: "Mr. Speaker, you, sir, hav doubtless read something concerning the tariff. Sir, I am opposed to all kinds of oppression, and I therefore move you, sir, that we abolish the tariff." Speaker: "That power belongs exclusivly to Congress." "And hasn't the state of Arkansaw got anything to do with it?" "No." "Then, sir, I was laboring under a misapprehension. As I arose to make a motion, I will withdraw my tariff motion and move you, sir, that we adjourn till one o'clock."

IN the days of Rome's greatness one Marcus Cassius had a large cooperage at the corner of Appian Way and Mars Hill. Upon a certain day two of his apprentices sought to see which would make a better beer keg. Caius Antoninus was the successful competitor, which so maddened Titus Demetrius that he knocked in the head of Antoninus's keg with a beetle. Caius cried aloud in his agony as he surveyed the ruin that had been accomplished. "See what a rent the envious casker made." Rome's downfall dated from that day.

A BOY who had lived in Paris, Me., until he was eight or nine years old, and had gone regularly to church, where he had heard the doctrin of future punishment strenuously preached, moved to another town. In school one day the teacher told her little folks about some trivial misdemeanor which had been committed by some naughty boys. "Won't God punish 'em?" asked the youngster from Paris. The teacher, taken by surprise, hesitated. "Well, there's a God up to Paris that would punish 'em, anyhow," remarked our young friend before the teacher could answer.

"YOU believe in the Bible, do you not?" asked a man with yellow hair to a Lincoln-street dentist. "Certainly," replied the tooth carpenter, fastening his forceps on a stomach tooth of his questioner. "Believe Cain killed Abel?" "Yes." "Believe the injunction 'Honor thy father and mother?'" "Of course." "And the story about Jonah and the whale?" "Eh, eh." "Believe the Bible right through, eh?" "Yes, sir." "And there is nothing that would induce you to go against the grain of a single sentence?" "No, sir. I am a firm believer in the Bible, and try to practice what it preaches." "Good. You think its all right to take a life for a life?" "The Lord thought so; that's good enough for me." "And an eye for an eye?" "At all times." "And a tooth for a tooth?" "You bet, every time." "Well, just pull these two rows and giv me a set of false teeth in exchange."

"CASUS BELLI has been the cause of more wars than all the other foreigners in this country put together," said the driver of a Blue Island avenue car as he leaned heavily upon his brake. "Who brought on the Revolution? Casus Belli. Who started the war of 1812? Same cuss. Who was it that made us fit the South in '61? Casus Belli Who was it that tried his darndest to git up a war with Mexico? Belli. I see by the mornin' paper that the same beast is figerin' on a war with England over a mess of fish. In the country where I was reared a feller named Bostwick used to go round stirrin' up fights between his neighbors. He had heaps of fun as long as it lasted, but one day, late in the fall, an uncle of mine and the Kendrick family squatted themselvs in a brush heap, and when Bostwick came along they filled him so full of holes that he fell to pieces when they picked him up. I'm for chokin' the gizzard out of this Belli, even if he does come from Roman and Italian stock. He's got no business in a free country. He's wuss'n Satan. How old is he, anyhow?"

Gems of Thought.

IN the theology of India is found much that is metaphysical, much that is abstruse, much of mystery, much that is lofty and elevated, much that is grand and poetic, and also much that is obscure and much that is absurd. Here is found the material that has proved a sufficient basis upon which to build subsequent systems of theology. Here is the source of nearly all the dogmas, rites, sacraments, symbols, and sacred observances which hav been woven into more modern systems of religion.—D. M. Bennett.

"I CONGRATULATE you," said Miss Lascelles, a little coldly, "and yet there is something greater in life than domestic peace." "No, no; there can be nothing better!" cried Mrs. Nisbett warmly. "There can be no real goodness where there is discord at home; and the woman who neglects her own family, that she may giv her time and energies to a 'cause,' is doing wrong whatever the cause may be."—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord.

NOTHING lovelier can be found
In woman than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote;
—Milton's Paradise Lost.

So much for the wife, now for the husband.
To make a happy fireside clime,
To weans and wife—
That's the true pathos and sublime
Of human life. —Burns.

THE gentleman is superior to all sectarian influence, jealousy, and passion. When you see a dogmatist, you see one who has no conception of gentlemanly character in man. It is of no consequence whether the individual belongs to one sect or another: it is of absolute, vital importance that a person hav intelligence and conscience. He should recognize his brother or sister whatever belief may be avowed or disavowed by them; for to be a good man or a good woman is more than a profession of faith in a religious creed, and the two things are not necessarily connected. —Frothingham's American Gentleman.

STERN law-giver! yet thou dost wear
The godhead's most benignant grace,
Nor know we anything so fair
As is the smile upon thy face;
Flowers laugh before thee in their beds,
And fragrance in thy footing treads;
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong,
And the most ancient heavens through thee are fresh and strong.

To humbler functions, awful power!
I call thee; I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour;
Oh, let my weakness hav an end!
Giv unto me most lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice;
The confidence of reason giv—
And, in the light of truth thy boudsman let me liv! —Wordsworth's Ode to Duty.

I HAV made up my mind that if there is a God he will be merciful to the merciful—upon that rock I stand; that he will not torture the forgiving—upon that rock I stand; that every man should be true to himself, and that there is no world, no star in which honesty is a crime—upon that rock I stand; that the honest man, the kind, sweet woman, the happy child, hav nothing to fear either in this world or the world to come. Upon that rock I stand.—Ingersoll.

WHENEVER the clamorous passions of the lower nature in man hav been raging at will and dragging him down and creating war in the soul, whenever these are silenced and brought into subjection to the higher nature, then there is peace where there was discord, there is joy where there was shame and sorrow, there is a consciousness of salvation—salvation of character—where before there was damnation. This is the atonement I believe in. Not vicarious atonement. Not another suffering for me, but my higher nature suffering in tears, sorrow stricken, yea, crucified—because of the sins and shame of my lower nature. And the atonement is a natural at-one-ment of the lower and higher nature, whenever the immoral demands of the lower are subjected to the moral commands of the higher.—W. H. Spencer.

IF there is a devil, he is God's devil. Either this or God is not infinit. If he is infinit, then there is nothing in the world which is not a fraction of his wholeness.—John W. Chadwick.

LIFE lies before us, not behind, and when things are done with it is a man's duty to go past them and press forward to new duties.—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

WISE man was he who counseled that speculation should hav free course, and look fearlessly toward all the thirty-two points of the compass, whithersoever and howsoever it listed.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

"THINK of a being," James Mill used to say, "who would make a hell—who would create the human race with the infallible knowledge, and therefore with the intention, that the great majority of them would be consigned to horrible and everlasting torments."—J. S. Mill's Autobiography.

MATERIALISM [this used to be the favorit name with Mr. Underwood for what was the opposit of orthodox Christianity, and may be considered another name for Infidelity, or what now passes as Agnosticism], which recognizes no other god than nature, no better worship than work, no better religion than morality, no other life than this, is the belief of no small numbers in this country, as well as in Europe, and it is making its influence felt among thoughtful minds of every class. It has among its friends some of the most profound and cultivated minds of the age. The masses, although they can giv but scanty attention to scientific and philosophical questions, hav caught the spirit of the age, and are thinking less about God and more about themselvs, inquiring less as to "what they shall do to be saved" in another world, and asking more how they can add to their comfort and prosperity in this world.—Underwood.

Notes and Clippings.

TWENTY-FIVE more Mormon elders are reported to be in the South making converts to this sect of Christianity.

THE Senate of this state has passed by a vote of 20 to 9 a bill giving women the right to vote in municipal elections.

THE Leavenworth, Kan., Times thinks that the enfranchisment of women will be an issue in that state at an early day.

GENERAL BOOTH, of the Salvation Army, says that he livs and sleeps clothed in red, and that he hopes to die and be buried in it. Some of his back-sliding converts hope that the redness will be continued to the extent of Avernian vestments.

A FEW months ago there was an account in this column of the burning of a young woman in the West, whose nightdress caught fire as she kneeled in prayer. Miss Josephine Mackey was fatally burnt in the same way in Louisville the other evening. She was kneeling before an open fire, and a coal snapped out upon her dress.

THREE years ago John Lute secured a claim in Sargent county, Dakota, and two years after died. The widow was left with the claim, a cabin, and five children under ten years of age, and with her own hands she is making a living for them off the land. One of the coldest days recently she went alone three miles to haul a load of straw for her stock. On the way the load upset, and she reloaded, with the thermometer 25° below zero.

SENATOR Blair, the New Hampshire hypocrit, says the World, has a curious conception of the true significance of the phrase "progressiv legislation." He wishes to force upon the people an old-fashioned, puritanical, blue-law Sunday. If Senator Blair had his way no cars should run, no newspapers be sold, no mail be distributed, no boots be shined, no chins be shaved, on the day of rest. But the world does not roll backward, and dubbing legislation "progressiv" is not an effectiv way to deceive the public.

A REVIVAL has been in progress at the Fair Haven church for a number of weeks, and many hav professed conversion. Edward Berry, one of the leaders of the colored population of the little hamlet, was a convert, and soon became violently crazy. In his paroxysms he imagined that he was John the Baptist. He was taken to the Trenton Asylum for the Insane, and after a great deal of suffering died. It seems to us that it would be well for the Methodists to keep negroes out of their revivals rather than out of their universities.

J. B. PARKES, a substantial farmer living near Kingston, Madison county, Ky., has successfully trained a force of seven large monkeys to work in his hemp fields, and to break and prepare the hemp for market. They do the work more quickly and better than the negroes he formerly employed, and at about one-fourth the cost. It required about four months of patient work to train the animals, but they now do their task with rare intelligence. The monkeys were sent to Mr. Parkes by a brother, who is in business in Cape Town, South Africa, and who had seen the animals put to similar uses there. Mr. Parkes has sent for ten more of the useful imitators of human workmen, six of them to be used by John G. Taylor, a neighboring farmer, who is also an extensiv raiser of hemp.—New York Times.

AWAITING the decision of the Andover Board of Visitors upon the recent heresy trial, the Philadelphia Evening Call sarcastically observes: "The Kamschatkans, the Hawaiians, the Zulus, and others of the benighted lovers of candles and despisers of all raiment except plug hats, are no doubt anxiously awaiting the decision of the learned clerical court. Of course, if these Boston theologians determin that the heathen must hear of Christianity before he dies, and will not be permitted to hav any chance afterward, the lovers of missionary diet will hav to bow to the inevitable. The fact that the people engaged in the case cannot by any possibility know anything about what they are to decide, will not make any difference. There will be a decision all the same, and one that the ruler of the land of the large umbrella will be compelled to respect; if not in this world, certainly in the next, which is completely under the dominion of these theological 'Pooh-Bahs.'"

THE Legislativ Committee on Railroads of Connecticut has reported favorably a substitute bill to regulate the running of Sunday trains. It provides that no railroad company shall run any train on Sunday, except from necessity or mercy. Before 10:30 A.M. and after 3 P.M. it may run trains carrying United States mails, or such other classes of trains as may be authorized by the railroad commissioners, to whom an application must be made, stating that such trains are required by public necessity or for the preservation of freight. No freight shall be unloaded except from necessity or mercy. A violation of the act is punishable by a fine of $250, to be recovered by the state. No company shall transport passengers on Sunday for less than the highest regular fare collected on week days, and no commutation, special bargain, or mileage tickets shall be provided for use on Sunday under a penalty of $50. The act is not to be considered as repealing or superseding existing statutes, which prohibit secular work or recreation on Sunday, except so far as it may be found in its operation to be inconsistent with them.

"REGULATORS" are at work in the backwoods of Chester county, S. C. They are ignorant men and women who are banded together to purify their neighborhood of all licentiousness and other wickedness, and are very religious, and they always hold prayer-meetings before going out on raids. Their practice is to go to the house of a person whom they think in need of correction and take him out into the woods, and, after delivering him a speech on the effects of his evil-doing, pray over him and then apply the lash. The number of lashes depends on the enormity of the crime. After chastisment the Regulators warn their victim that the treatment will be repeated for every act in continuation of his evil-doing. Among those who hav received attentions from the Regulators are violators of the Prohibition laws, disturbers of church service, and adulterers. A white man was severely whipped for living openly with a colored woman, while a colored man found in the house at the time of the raid was whipped for being in bad company.

Communications.

Ethics.*

The late John Roach, in a published argument concerning our shipping interests, said that he had within fifteen years performed $100,000,000 worth of work, and usually employed more than five thousand men, but he had never asked a favor, and never had a lawsuit or a complaint of defectiv workmanship. Some years ago, while in the practice of law, I brought suit for clients in New York against the Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company. Soon after there came a statement that the pendency of a suit, wholly irrespectiv of its merits, with so powerful a corporation impeded future business and profits in dealing with the same corporation, in such a degree that to carry it to trial, whatever its result, would damage my clients to an amount many times greater than the sum involved. With each expansion in their own business it had become less possible for them to quarrel with profit. Thus with evolution of the individual in power, and with the simultaneous rise of those with whom he deals, there is an ascending scale in ethics. The savage animal, pauper, tramp, pirate, zero stage is, if he has what you want, kill him. This is the Cain and Abel stage. The second criminal stage is, don't kill but rob him. This is the Joseph and his brethren stage. The third stage, don't rob but defraud him. This is the Jacob and Esau stage. The fourth stage is, don't defraud him but sue him. This is the Roman and British stage, when the law takes the place of the club, and perjury supersedes violence. The fifth stage is, don't sue him but buy him, he can be useful to you hereafter. This is the Simon Cameron, Oakes Ames, Jay Gould stage. The sixth stage is, don't buy him, but explain the matter to him so that he will discern the harmony between his interests and yours. This is the stage we are all anxiously waiting for. To pass from the first stage to the sixth, a race must undergo industrial, scientific, and superstitious changes which spread over several thousand years. In the first stage he is a hunter of beasts and of men. In the fourth, fifth, and sixth stages he has never carried a weapon nor fired a gun. In the first he clothes himself in the pelts of the animals he has slain. In the sixth he could not tell within three thousand miles where or by whom any article of his apparel was made. In the first stage he saw a mysterious evil spirit in henbane and another under the serpent's tongue, and to this he attributes the poison. But in the sun, earth, and winds there are other spirits. He is a fetichist or polytheist. The number of gods he believes in bears a general proportion to the number of men he has slain. His superstitions are coterminous with his crimes, and his crimes are the measure of his lack of social power. In the sixth stage he delegates the care of poisons to his physician, and the care of the mysteries to his theologian; and it is all he can do to get a moment's peace, because his front door bell is continually on the ring to let in some new financier who has a scheme for making him richer. If any person raises a quarrel with him, a hundred influential persons are ready with their mediation, their services, and their cash to aid him in settling it. If you doubt that all the principles of ethics undergo a complete revolution as you advance in wealth, that your rights increase and your obligations diminish, try the experiment of causing it to be believed that you hav got a surplus of five millions which you would like to invest on good security. An adventurer in New York, a few years ago, being actually penniless, lived three years on the deposits which flowed in to him from people who thought he had five millions to lend. He bought him a country seat, a turnout, and came near going to Congress. Thus we see that all the amiabilities, virtues, amenities, kindnesses, affections, tendernesses, devotions, and disinterestnesses are showered upon us in the degree that we rise in that social power which stands expressed in the three forms of wealth, position, and reputation. It is idle to say that this is not an ethical gain. It involves the true secret of all ethical gain. When Lear had given away his kingdom to his daughters, he learned gradually that they had no moral characters. If he had kept his kingdom they would hav continued loving and affectionate.

The civilizee accomplishes far more in the way of self-gratification by purchasing, persuading, inducing, than the barbarian does by killing, lying, stealing, coveting, etc. But he does it by means of later appliances which in earlier ages did not exist at all, and which even to-day do not exist in the hands of some.

An advance in ethics, therefore, means the substitution of those means of commanding the services and coöperation of our fellow-man which are incident to abundant wealth and a well-trained intellect for those which are incident to scant resources and mere animal passion without intelligence. For, as the individual man develops in health, wealth, intellect, social power, and address, he constantly comes into possession of a larger power to make the interests of others harmonize with his own interests, and a larger wisdom in the use of this power. With this accession of power the disposition to kill, lie, steal, to carry off one's neighbor's wife or slaves, disappears, and the decalog resolves itself down into one command—what you can't obtain by persuasion or purchase, by reason or work, wait for.

Ethical growth, then, is merely the growth of the power of the individual over his environment, and as it proceeds, the individual, instead of acquiring new ethical rules, forgets the old, and finds himself conscious more and more that life consists in liberty, while law loosens, one by one, its shackles, like the schoolmaster, the parent—which are combined in the church and Mrs. Grundy—but finally leaves him, if he desires it, an absolutely free man, free even from the last forms of bondage—the fear of what others will say.

It is well, however, to observe the condition on which this emancipation can alone happily proceed. viz., that of free exchange, which implies a large capital and a good bank account on the part of the person who claims the right to be thus free. He may take up his residence in the big house on the hill, provided he is at all times ready to tender a fair exchange of thoughts, truths, and purposes with those who dwell in the valley. No man can be hap pily free from the obligation to serve his fellow-man. But as his freedom increases and his means increase, this service, which was once a bondage, becomes the strongest of all the passions, since every element of self-sacrifice disappears from it, and in serving others he is always serving himself.

What, then, is this power within which makes for righteousness? It is simply the power within to adapt itself to the powers without. It is called in Genesis replenishing the earth and subduing it. It is called in political economy the growth of the power of man over nature. It is called by Spencer the increasing adaptation of man to his environment. It is called by Fourier the harmonial adaptation of the passions to the universe. The word passion has been falsely identified by the religious with those qualities of our nature most essential to our existence, such as the passion for personal freedom, the appetite for food, the passion for property, for power, for the sympathy of the other sex, etc.

These we hav been told by those distorters of human nature—the priests—are to be subjected to the rack, the thumbscrew, and the gibbet; and, in their stead, the hight of ethics will consist in magnifying those other passions by means of which priesthoods are aided in taxing mankind for their own support, such as the passion for knowing something about what can't be known; the passion for doing wrong without being punished for it; the passion for having our wishes obeyed by the deity so as to run the universe in some degree ourselvs; a passion which finds its vent in prayer; the passion for finding out what is to become of us after death, and for insuring ourselvs against accidents in that connection.

These passions hav nothing to do with the welfare of the individual, and tend only to the preservation of the priest, to the building of costly edifices for him to strut in, either physically in his costly robes or intellectually in his ideas, most of which relate wholly to magnifying the machine of which he is a part. This has resulted in an inverted ethics known as religious ethics, in which all passions and duties are made to be holy in just the degree that they benefit the priest and the ecclesiastic machine only, and are base and groveling in the degree that they tend to make the people grow in wealth, in freedom, and depth of thought, in individual independence and in moral self-sufficiency. The priest's effort has always been to conquer the growing man with mystery.

But this is the reversal of the natural process, the end of which is the complete triumph of man over destiny, when he stands on the summit of Mt. Nebo, with all of nature below him—conscious that he is himself the highest development of mind known or knowable—that that which has been called God is only his own shadow thrown upon the clouds—that above him there is no heaven, only empty spaces and silent stars, that below him there is no hell, only nature's lawns and the volcano's fires—that before him is the great mystery which no plummet has sounded, upon which Moses, Jesus, and Paul, pope, bishop, and preacher, all enter, knowing absolutely nothing as to whither they are going.

The right, therefore, is like the present, an ever-shifting standard. A few years ago slavery was right—the best thing possible, because the very money in which to pay wages did not exist. To-day slavery is wrong, but working for wages is right. In a few years more, perhaps, working for wages will be deemed a form of slavery, and all men will demand to be permitted to work for profits. So a few years back it was thought not disgraceful that woman should be purchased in marriage, and the money paid. To-day it is disgraceful to buy the affections of woman, but not the toil of man. But as the world grows richer, it may, peradventure, come to be as disgraceful to offer coin for toil as it now is to offer it for love. Men may possibly demand the same choice of working where they can work passionately, as women now demand of loving where they can love passionately. Yesterday was the day of force. To-day is the day of purchase, but purchase may not last forever. Behind it stalks the age of reason. We think to-day there could be no society without the judge, the penitentiary, and the scaffold. Two centuries ago they thought there could be no society without the rack, the thumbscrew, and the Inquisition.

The first step in ethics is to learn that the whole structure is transitory—that with the advance of man toward his highest destiny the old religion becomes a tinkling curiosity, like the old school-bell; the old work is looked back upon as if it were a pair of gyves upon the wrists; the old science dissolves into the mere husks which enfolded for us the new truth, and at the very apex of the great pyramid of Existence stands the new man, transfigured into all the fulness of sovereignty, serenity, and light, declaring to the universe in his own behalf, Thou shalt hav no other gods before me, for I, Humanity, am a jealous god, and am unwilling that any shall worship the shadows in presence of the substance.

The Christian Amendment to the National Constitution.

When a building full of people and property has been blown to pieces by the explosion of a dynamite shell within its walls, and the whole neighborhood is terrified by the concussion, those who flock to see the ruins immediately ask the questions, Who fired the bomb? where was the deadly material manufactured? who brought it here? and what was the motiv in producing all this wreck of property and life?

Mr. Washburn, in his lecture delivered at Investigator Hall, and which is handsomely published in the Investigator of the 25th of January, exhibited and commented on a dynamite bomb which he found in the organization and purposes of the National Reform Association, better understood as the God-in-the-Constitution party. But I strongly suspect there was not a man in his audience who knew where this particular bomb came from, who made it, and how it ever got into a country like this, whose government is entirely secular, and knows nothing of any God, any religion, or any other world but this. Now, I respectfully submit to Mr. Washburn, whom I regard as a very heavy piece of metal in the Radical park of artillery wherewith we are battering down the fabric of the old superstition, that he prepare another lecture, in which he will giv information on the points mentioned in the sentence immediately preceding this; for I think no person can understand the proper relations between the state and the church, and the large, iniquitous progeny born of an adulterous union, unless he is acquainted with Scotch and English history, and especially that part of it which began with the sixteenth century and extended down to the final expulsion of the Stuart race of kings from the English throne. As I hav lived for half a century in western Pennsylvania, where this amendment party was organized, and which is still its stronghold, I at the time it began its career attacked it, and, of course, to do so intelligently and intelligibly, had to examin the subject carefully. Now, if Mr. Washburn will take the hint above given, and prepare a second lecture on the same subject, he will find all the material he needs in the volume entitled "The Confession of Faith," published in 1813 by W. W. Woodward, of Philadelphia, and containing, besides the "Confession of Faith," and "Larger and Shorter Catechisms," three very remarkable documents: First, "The National Covenant of the Church of Scotland," subscribed at first by the king's majesty and his household in the year 1580, and thereafter by persons of all ranks in 1581, and then again by Charles II. at Spey in 1650, and at Scone in 1651. Secondly, and next in order, the famous document called the "Solemn League and Covenant," signed by all ranks and conditions of men from the king down. Third, "A Solemn Acknowledgment of public sins and breaches of the Covenant, and a solemn engagement to all the duties contained therein." If Mr. Washburn would trace the history of that movement in the British Isles down to the time when a handful of the old Cameronians, disgusted and disheartened with the government for annulling the Solemn League and Covenant, migrated to these shores, about one hundred years ago, and set up the same claims for Jesus Christ as king of this nation as their fathers set up for him as king of Scotland and England, a lecture could be made of deep interest to those who are not content with studying things on the surface, but wish to make themselvs happy, as the Roman poet expresses it, in understanding the causes which produce them.

The great advantage which the founders of our government and the framers of our Constitution had was that the history of the world lay before them, every page of which shed light on the subject of their study. Our government was not a growth, as the British, French, and every other government in Europe was, out of religious barbarism. It was a new creation altogether, adumbrated by the miraculous birth of Minerva, mature and all armed, from the brain of Jupiter. The theory promulgated by the God-in-the-Constitution party, which appeals so powerfully to the chivalric loyalty of every Christian to Christ as his leader and king, is not an untried one. It was tried thoroughly, as any one may see from the authorities I hav quoted, in Scotland and England, and is proved by its own documents to hav been the prolific mother of hypocrisy and of sin generally, in all its shapes and forms. But the mischief is, that in this heels-over-head, rough-and-tumble insanity of money-making, which characterizes our age, men will not take time to examin the subject in the light of history and philosophy. The benumbing influence of this craze after wealth, this ridiculous ambition to be known as a millionaire, is seen in the radicals themselvs. Look at the tameness of their submission to the constitutional and legal enactments of the different states of the Union, throwing out of court the testimony of a man in cases involving liberty, life, character, and property, unless he believes the false and childish dogmas of the popular religion. For when the framers of the Constitution had nearly finished their work of making it a purely secular instrument, remembering, as they did, that the organic laws of the thirteen states were modeled after the priest-ridden nations of Europe, and had no proper regard for the rights of mankind concerning religion, they designed to cure the evil by Article 6, Section 2, of the Constitution, declaring that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." And yet Chief Justice Waite, who is an Episcopalian Christian, in administering the oath of office to Garfield and Arthur, as presidents of the United States, made them both "kiss the book."

Mr. Washburn says that the "watchword of the amendment party is 'unity of essentials;' these essentials being the doctin of the trinity, total depravity, vicarious atonement, and the necessity of faith in Jesus Christ to secure salvation." The chain of doctrins, however, is not complete. It lacks the last, and most important link of all: salvation from what? Why, from eternal hell-fire. But the revolutionists, as I call them, omitted these fearful words, in order to catch such gudgeons as Dr. Miner, of the Universalist Church, and Dr. Mayo, of the Unitarian.

But Mr. Washburn amazes me by saying, "It does not seem possible that a very large party could be formed on such a platform as that." Why, look at the great national sects, by which I mean those sects whose churches are located in all the states of the Union—the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Methodists, the Lutherans, the Episcopalians, and, I may add, the Congregationalists, who are powerful in the New England states, and in all that tier of states in the Northwest over which the New England emigration has swept. To this day, with all the abrading influence of civilization and common sense against them, the Puritan notion that you can, and ought to, make a man religious and moral by law is rife, as is seen in the prohibitory legislation which abjures the national Constitution and sets up the authority of the Bible in its place. A man such as Beecher was before the locks of his strength were shorn off by Delilah, with the fire of the old Crusaders, Peter the Hermit and Saint Bernard, in his soul, and followed by a host of younger apostles like himself—there is no telling what they might not do if they would undertake a new crusade to glorify Christ by putting him and his religion into the Constitution and making presidents, governors, and legislators out of his "saints." The sects of this country raise millions of dollars every year to support their religion at home and abroad. The politicians are all under cow to them, as was evinced in our Pennsylvania legislature a few weeks ago, when a simple-hearted member, at the opening of the session, moved to dispense with the empty formality of a chaplain's prayers. The politicians of both parties fell upon him as a lot of hungry wolves would fall upon a stray sheep, for his impiety, while not one of them really cared a snap of his finger for religion or any of its formalities. It was only intended to show their constituents at home what good Christians they were. Look at the voluntary contributions made to the class called evangelists or revivalists, who are generally illiterate men, but full of zeal and the Holy Ghost in converting sinners. They are all making themselvs rich—Moody and Sankey, Sam Jones, and Sam Small, to say nothing of the reverend layman, Joseph Cook, and the women preachers. All that saves us from a crusade to revolutionize the country and "put the government squarely under Christ and his saints" is the extent to which the leaven of Infidelity has leavened the whole lump of state and church. I know we liv in the nineteenth century, but human nature is the same now as it ever was, and whenever you meet with a really religious man, you see one who, if you know how to play upon the instrument of his feelings of loyalty and devotion to Christ his savior, can be lashed into excitement that would dare and do anything in his service. I don't like the idea of our liberties lying at the mercy of any set of men. A. B. B.

The Four Canonical Gospels.

Any student of the only authentic writings of the first century, viz., Paul's and Clement of Rome's epistles, is at once convinced that there existed then no such work as that called the four canonical gospels. No allusion, quotation, or intimation of their existence can be gained from these authentic writers. Later on, and in the beginning of the second century, numerous gospels appeared, such as that of Nicodemus, of the Infancy of Jesus, of the Virgin Mary, the Memoirs of the Apostles, the Protevangelion, which we hav, and many others now lost, but from which the fathers of the second century quoted freely, giving most of the time the name of the gospel from which their quotations were taken. But up to the year 180, not a single one of them quoted from any of the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; the names of these evangelists appear nowhere in their quotations. This is so absolutely true and correct that we invite every Secularist to defy and challenge all the priesthood, Catholic or Protestant, to produce one single authentic instance where a father of the church makes a quotation, declaring that it is taken from Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John, prior to the year 180.

In that year, 180, Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, was the first Christian writer (ad Antolycum, ii, 22), who quoted one of the gospels, as follows: John says that "in the beginning was the word, and the word was with God." (See Waite, History of the Christian Religion, p. 354.) Up to that time the fathers had preached and quoted every day from thirty or more other gospels, never from the canonical ones. This is certainly a proof that the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were not in existence prior to 180.

But in that year, and in the following ones, the Christian world was flooded with the first edition of these freshly manufactured gospels, bound in one volume. This sudden apparition of hitherto unknown gospels was the work of a gang of forgers, at the head of whom were Eleutherus, bishop of Rome, and Irenæus, a fanatic at his service, as will be demonstrated immediately.

Such a forgery has not even the excuse of being a pious fraud, invented for the glory of God, as many others hav been; it was made only and especially to satisfy the ambition of the bishop of Rome by elevating him above all other similar dignitaries of Christendom. His accomplice, Irenæus, who was another subaltern ambitious, was also, as a reward for his services, to be invested with a bishopric in Gauls. What Eleutherus wanted was to establish as a positiv fact that Christ gave all his powers to Peter, and that Peter transferred them to all his successors on the seat of Rome, of which already popular opinion had been adroitly induced to believe that Peter had been the first bishop. To establish these points by authentic writings, there was an apparently insuperable difficulty; not a single one of the thirty or more gospels then in use could supply a word, text or sentence which could be interpreted as giving to Peter more authority than to the other disciples. Eleutherus was not to be stopped by such a difficulty. If there were no text in the old gospels to foster his ends, he had to make new gospels in which they would be found. Hence the forgery was resolved. Exactly how the desired interpolation was done of course we do not know, but it is presumable that it was done by forging marginal additions as desired on some of the manuscripts of the old gospels so freely used in the composition of the new ones, which marginal additions Eleutherus and Irenæus forced their scribes to insert in the new text, as being an authentic part of the old ones; and so it was done.

That they had a large force of scribes is evident from the rapidity with which that new edition was distributed in Europe, Asia, and Africa, during the years included between 180 and 190, where they are found in almost general use, and where they were unknown ten years previous.

Now what were these forgeries? Not many certainly, but all to the point. Some of them may be cited here and are certainly forgeries, since such texts cannot be found in the old gospels from which the new gospels were entirely manufactured. In Luke xxii, 29, Christ is made to say to all his disciples: "I giv unto you a kingdom, as my father has given one to me." In Matthew xviii, 18, he intrusts to all his disciples the power to bind or loose everything on the earth, promising to ratify their doings in heaven. These are forgeries, made for the purpose of erecting the priesthood as a privileged aristocracy above the common people. But now we come to the forgeries made for raising Peter above the other bishops. In Matthew xxvi, 18, they made Christ say to Peter: "You are a rock, and on that rock I will build my church." In verse 19, he is said to hav given to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and also, of course, the power to bind and loose every thing on the earth. This was one of the main objects to be attained, viz., erecting Peter as the successor of Christ. The next one was to give Peter the power over the other disciples, and over all laity; it was forged and inserted in the manuscript intrusted to the scribes or monks who were writing the gospel of John, and is found there in chapter xxi, 15, 16, 17, where Christ is supposed to hav given to Peter the supremacy over the sheep and the lambs; that is to say, over the whole clergy, and over their flocks.

The introduction of the above text was the only motiv for the production of the four canonical gospels.

We hav said that the forgers used scribes, and we must add that these were Greek students, at least those who were intrusted with the reduction; the other ones may hav been simple copyists, slaves probably, as there were any amount of them in Rome in these times. Who were these Greek writers? Most probably the monks already installed at Rome from Alexandria, where they originated, and from whence they sent colonist into Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and other large cities of the empire, during the late end of the second century. (See Sesarios, Zozomen, and especially Jerome, the vitâ eremit., part 3.) These were nativ Greeks of Egypt, and were Greek students. Hence the first four gospels' Greek text; the first Latin version was that of Jerome, at the end of the third century.

These monks left imprinted on these gospels many material proofs of their part in it, not only in the idiom of the Greek language used by them, but also in many places in the text itself; and, since I hav quoted John's gospel about the lambs and the sheep, it will not be amiss to finish this short notice by calling the attention of the faithful to the two last verses of that (John's) gospel. We read in xxi, 24: "This is the disciple (John) which beareth witness of these things, and who wrote these things, and we know that his witness is true." Who says we know? Certainly it is not John himself, since the writers speak of John. The we are evidently the Greek monks who wrote the Greek gospel of John. The last verse (25) seems to bear the stamp of the fanatic Irenæus. He don't say we, he says I. Speaking of the deeds of Christ, he says, "If they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself would not contain the books that should be written." This is, I believe, the greatest hyperbole of language ever risked by any writer. We may attribute it to Eleutherus, but probably it is the work of the fanatic Irenæus. H. J. Seigneuret, M.D.

An Intemperate Temperance Advocate.

The voice of science has well said that there is no hallucination so vain and fatal as is the idea that alcoholic beverages are ever of any use.

The Spiritualist and the Materialist may boast of their brains and insight, and as Freethinkers in philosophy, and as citizens of a democracy, claim their right to tamper with themselvs, and argue their personal liberty to torment other people by drinking or selling intoxicating liquors; but in so doing they hav not risen above the ancient orthodox theology which believed wine to be a good creature of God, and counted Medford rum as the apocalyse of divine mercies.

It profits comparativly little that inverstigation into the properties of matter, and the enunciation of the principles of forces, has swept, or is sweeping, away the idle fears of former ignorance, and strikes the iron scepter from the hands of a priest-sanctioned despotism, so long as the rum power holds undisputed sway, and political emancipation leaves men in brutal slavery under the compromise of a license law.

It is of slight moment, as set beside the mightiest want of the time, that Spiritualism has come to this world of sepulchers freighted with the blossoms of a summer-land beyond the frosty tomb, if to its substantialized hope of immortality it does not add its blessing upon the temperance theme and lend its aid to the present struggle to prohibit the giant incubus of drink from further polluting the earth with its noisome form.

What signifies it to know that we shall meet beyond the river, if, knowing it, our lives are not made better on this side, and why should we care to know each other there if we do not learn to love each other, or at least respect each other, here? And both self-regard and mutual esteem preclude the indulgence in whatever weakens body and mind, without affording greater strength somewhere at some time, and thus debarring it, determins that we not only close our own gates to the danger that may rage in the streets, but also commands that we clear the highway of society from every pestiferous libertin that subsists on the lives and property of those so unwise or unguarded as to allow it entertainment.

Dogmatic Atheism arrives at the conclusion that the idea of a God is the king of superstitions, and it sees no hope of the freedom of man in the world until the throne is tugged down from the sacred skies and sunk in the sea of oblivion.

Yet Atheism, at its best, being only negativ in itself, offers nothing but an opportunity, however broad that opening may be; and whilst acknowledging the gods of fabulous conceit and fraudulent crafts to be airy nothings, though of electric potency over vacant minds, and conceding that the notion of God is the king, however short and shorn a king, of superstitions, yet it must be more strenuously stated that alcohol is the emperor of hallucinations, before whom God himself is made to bow by his own worshipers, and supplicate for his very being, and beg for a sheltering shingle upon his earthly temple.

Trinity steeple may point its spire of faith to heaven and sport its fashionable piety on money gathered by the lease of its estates for gin-mills; it may dispense gospel grace in mission chapels for the poor by ministers paid with the wages of sin, and boast its Christian charity in alms earned by weeping mothers which the fathers spend for rum.

The Secular Union prints well its nine demands of Liberalism. Still it is only half-way Liberal, nay, only half-way just, in that it does not demand the enfranchisment of woman, and it lets the lesser evils shut the greater from sight, in its silence on the subject of the liquor traffic, and it givs countenance to the hateful trash by echoing the barkeepers' hypocritical cry of personal liberty.

It is captious to complain of the cost of the clergy, while it is the minor expense of anything in the name of culture. However much mistaken the ministry may be in its methods, it is not to be once mentioned for criticism by the side of the saloonocracy, which not only swallows the major share of labor's money, but damns men to a worse hell, if not as lasting, as Calvin ever dreamed of.

The Jewish Jehovah is but a pigmy, lost in the boots of the lurid Gambrinus who invented German lager beer. Labor is lost, and learning is in the shade, whilst the brewery rules the land and men are afraid to speak for fear of a shot.

News and Notes.

I hav had a busy campaign since I landed in Brookville, and hav been lecturing every night. The Bavaria Secular Union has done splendid service since its organization. It has had lively meetings, and the community has been in a blaze of excitement. When it was noised abroad that the Infidel was coming, the Christians declared that he should not hav the use of the schoolhouse, which up to this time had been used for all public meetings of whatsoever kind, the Christians occupying it for their Sabbath services. They evidently forgot the Golden Rule, and did not want that others should hav the same privileges that they themselvs enjoyed. The air was full of threats by the disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus—that, if necessary, there should be a little knocking down in order that the mouth of the Infidel might be shut. So there was promis of an interesting occasion. Any life is better than no life at all, and "bloody noses and cracked crowns" are preferable to absolute indifference.

The Bavaria Union arranged the series of lectures to be given in the county of Salina, where there is a large Liberal element, as well as plenty of religious bigotry. I was met on my arrival at Brookville by that good Hercules of our cause, the "village blacksmith," F. H. Terry, who can bring fire, both mental and physical, with his sturdy blows. Notwithstanding his outspoken Infidelity, he has the best business of any man in the county, for the Christians know that he can shoe a horse with skill and neatness, and they don't care for his religious opinions so long as he can do superior work. When it comes to business, Christians know a thing or two as to their worldly profit.

Along with Mr. Terry was Mr. A. S. Hall, Newton Mitchell, A. K. Mott, E. G. Hall, A. C. Hall, Enoch Lewis, I. D. Roberts, A. N. Case, president of the Union, and others. Their hearty reception was all that was needed to restore me to wonted vigor and good cheer after an all-night and all-day ride. We joined our forces for a good square meal, and the hour or two before the lecture went merrily by. The town hall of Brookville was filled by an appreciativ audience, and I gave my lecture on "Universal Mental Liberty." The second evening was severely cold—it blew almost like a blizzard, so that but few could come from the country, but the hall was full, and I pictured "The New Heaven and Earth." There are many Liberals in Brookville among its leading citizens, and I hope for a flourishing organization in the future. It has about twelve hundred inhabitants and is rapidly growing. The country about it is excellent, producing wheat, corn, etc., though a large part of the lands are used for grazing purposes, hills and knolls quite rocky and precipitous being scattered about. The Smoky Range is about twelve miles away, and quite lofty for this prairie country. This is called Spring Creek Valley, about a dozen miles long, beautiful indeed when the silver glittering wings of spring are shining over, and the horizon is fringed with glowing hights and luminous groves—a happy valley indeed for those who can be content with the fair fruits of earth and rural complacency.

I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Ingraham while at Brookville. Mr. Ingraham is one of the foremost business men of the place and is fearless in the expression of his Liberal views, and it does not seem to hurt him in the least, even so far as the patronage of Christians is concerned. Mrs. Ingraham is equally advanced and frank in sentiment, and although her mother belonged to the church, her father, Mr. W. Mardin, is of the Liberal faith according to the gospel of Ingersoll.

Many others I found in this genial company of Freethought—Mr. Frank Blackburn and wife, Frank Hoag and wife, Alfred Hoag, Daniel Hurford and wife, O. P. Bicknell and wife, J. D. Roberts and wife, Levi Roberts, Dr. Stearns, Newton Mitchell and wife, Mrs. Crosier, of St. Louis, etc. Mr. Newton Mitchell, who introduced me at the lectures, is one of our best posted Freethinkers in this part of the country, and it won't do for the clergy to engage in controvery with him, for he knows more about church history than any ten of their ordinary caliber put together.

Once in a while I come across a really interesting Christian, who has some originality, and such a one is Mrs. Ira Freeman, who is a kind of a transcendental Christian, and has a wonderful way of interpreting the Bible, which she devoutly believes to be the word of God, the whale story and all. At the same time she thinks that Ingersoll is the greatest man living, and she delights to read him. She has declared that she will convert the Infidels, or the Infidels will convert her. I guess the latter will be the outcome. She admits that the Infidels are right in theory, but they lack the holy spirit. They hav not the "God-principle." I told her she must take my "New God," and then her way would be perfectly clear, and Infidelity and the "God-principle" would be all right, and fit together like the two sides of a hinge, and harmony would prevail, and the doors of progress open. Mrs. Freeman's husband is the celebrated Yankee razor strop man, who has been during the fifty years of his career in every city and village in the United States, and has sold, I guess, about a million strops. He is an Infidel, with but one article to his creed—namely, razor-strop. His catechism is as follows: "Do you believe in almighty God?" "No, I do not. I believe in the razor-strop." There is no doubt his one article of faith and business is of more value than all the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Still when it comes to "shaving," I shouldn't wonder if the theologians beat him.

So my time in Brookville went pleasantly by, and on Friday morning, February 11th, I took the train for Salina, the county-seat, fifteen miles distant, a bright and activ place of about eight thousand inhabitants, with large prospects, its real estate doubling almost every twenty-four hours, as it passes from hand to hand. New railroads are to be built, and it is expected that Salina will be one of the foremost cities of the state, with a population of twenty thousand in a year or two. It already has a Catholic university, and a Methodist and normal college. It has quite a progressiv aspect, and a good Liberal element among the leading people of the place—Mr. J. M. Ittem and wife, M. D. Teague, A. L. Dodge, Judge Osborne, C. E. Martin, Henry Rosmond, Joseph Henry, author of that excellent pamphlet, "Hints About Funerals," etc., a veteran of seventy-four years, and thoroughly interested in reform; Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Abbott, of New Cambria, both live Infidels, who keep things on the go; John Buchi, A. S. Peterson, Oscar Seitz, J. H. Hardison, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Garverich, Mrs. Helen Eggleston, Mrs. Mary Bicknell, John Foster, Frank Ferlem, Mr. Reese, John Gibson, Dr. Newman, A. J. Anderson, L. C. Sawin, Dr. W. S. Hauser, J. Beetem Wise, of Industry, who walked about thirty miles to attend the lectures; O. Fasse, Matt Hederich, August Holinquist, and others. The friends in Salina did all they could for the success of the lectures, and were generous in their contributions, and I hav not found a more pleasant company.

The lectures were given in the Opera House, the largest and best audience room in the city, and for three evenings it was filled with intelligent gentlemen and ladies, who found in the ideas of Liberalism the most satisfactory, intellectual, and moral stimulus. On Sunday evening, February 13th, an organization was effected, and I hav no doubt that Salina will be one of our brightest points, and as it grows in material and business wealth will also be on these broad and beautiful plains a beacon-light for freedom.

This is a lovely country, indeed. If I were a farmer, I think I might choose this Arcadian land, where you can look for miles upon a delightful prospect—rolling prairie, soft blue horizons, little valleys and wide-sweeping undulations, plentifully watered with creeks and rivers, the soil bursting with wealth, and flowering into splendid fruitage. It seems an easy life here, to tickle the breast of Mother Earth and make her laugh with harvests. Monday morning the sun shone with golden luster, and bright fleecy clouds floated along the immeasurable blue, and the billowy landscape rolled against the remote azure with gray and glimmering ranks. Friend Terry took me over from Salina to Bavaria behind his fleet-footed mare, and the ride was a spell of joy indeed, and work was forgotten amid the magnificent peace of nature. When we got to Bavaria, however, there was tumult. The Christians were still determined to keep us out of the school-house, and had signed a petition to that effect, and loud were the threats of what might be done. However, we kept on the even tenor of our way, knowing that the dog who barks the loudest bites the least. When evening came the building was crowded to its utmost capacity—some being obliged to go away. Our opponents were present, but not a move was made, and all listened attentivly to my discourse on "Universal Mental Liberty," and even Christians began to think that Infidelity has some good points. My friend Mrs. Freeman, the transcendental Christian, made an onset, and spoke eloquently in favor of the whale story, and a few other miracles that the "ruler of the universe" might perform. She had read in the Science Monthly that the whale had a big reservoir of fresh air constantly on hand. That settled it. If Jonah had fresh air he might survive, although he had nothing to eat or drink. Mrs. Freeman did not, however, explain how Jonah got through the whale's throat without being choked to death. Perhaps for that especial occasion, the "ruler of the universe" made an India-rubber throat capable of being stretched to meet every emergency like Mrs. Freeman's interpretations of the scriptures. She can make the Bible mean anything, no matter what it happens to say. For her especial benefit, I gave on the second evening "The New God," for I felt that she needed that more than anything else, as a restorativ to sound logic, for the old God is indeed a God of confusion. Some of the allies of the church tried to make a disturbance on the second evening, but the tide of Freethought went triumphantly on.

We had the largest meetings ever held in the village. and the Christians are now thoroughly ashamed that they ever undertook the role of persecutors. The Bavaria Secular Union has won a grand success. It is composed of the best citizens of the country, who maintain their cause with dignity and determination, and from this time on the Liberal movement will hav greater power than ever. Mr. A. N. Case, the president of the society, presided at the meetings. I hav enjoyed the hospitality, while here, of Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Mott, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Hall and family, Mr. and Mrs. Enoch Lewis and family, and so the days hav passed pleasantly and swiftly, and recreation has been mingled with labor. Yesterday I visited Mr. George Hanley, one of the brave soldiers and officers of the war, who entered as private and won a captain's rank, and, as the result of his patriotic services, is now suffering from paralysis. He is a Deist somewhat after the manner of Thomas Paine, who believed in a God and future state. He is not exactly satisfied with my Agnostic attitude, but in spirit he is thoroughly in favor of liberty and justice for all, and so our platform is about the same after all.

I was pleased to meet with Mr. W. F. Adams, a teacher in the schools here, a man of fine ability and eloquence, who has valiantly defended our cause in spite of the attacks of the church. The orthodox hav tried to remove him from his public position, but the universal sentiment of the community would not allow. He is deservedly popular in his profession.

Mr. John Geissler, Mr. Davis Armstrong and wife, Mr. Albert Loucks, Mr. David Rodenbush, Mr. A. O. Bolund, Mr. John Bennett, Mr. Harris, Mr. David Douglass, Mr. Eugene Douglass, Mr. Martin Dean, Mr. Wm. Shaw, Mr. Wm. Bartel, Mr. Cramer, Mr. J. W. Yount and son, and others, are among those whom I hav had the pleasure of meeting, and who are in activ sympathy with Freethought.

Some of our enthusiastic boys who are in favor of fair play serenaded our friend Terry last evening; the Stars and Stripes greeted the morning sun in honor of the victory for free speech, while some mystic hand draped in deep mourning the orthodox fort. There is general jubilation, and the dogs of war hav slunk into their holes.

I shall keep the battle a-going in New Cambria Thursday night with our stanch friends, Mr and Mrs. J. W. Abbott. I shall lecture at Windom Friday; at Dodge City, Feb. 20th; at Garden City, Feb. 21st and 22d; at Greeley, Col., Feb. 27th; at Longmont, March 2d; at Denver, March 6th and 13th; and other places in Colorado as arrangements can be made. I hav received a call from Prescott, the capital of Arizona, and hope to be there March 16th and 17th. I shall be at Los Angeles, San Diego, Santa Ana, from March 20th to 27th; at Tulare, Visalia, about March 30th and 31st; at San Francisco and Oakland, April 3d and 10th; San José, April 17th and 24th; and Sonoma, Stockton, Sacramento, and other places in California until June 1st. I shall be in Oregon in June; Washington territory in July: and return Eastward in August by way of Baker City, Oregon, Boise City, Idaho, etc. Will friends please keep a long look ahead and arrange for lectures so that every possible point can be covered and the movement pushed along the whole route? SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

It rained so hard on the evening of Friday, the 18th, that hardly one hundred persons braved the weather to attend the 435th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club held on that date; but those who were present wouldn't hav missed it for a good deal of money. To say that the meeting was lively would be the faintest possible expression of a great truth. The Chair. in opening the exercises. had considerable to say about the trouble Herr Oppenheimer, the lecturer of the evening, had taken to inform himself concerning the theories of Karl Marx, which he would proceed to elucidate. The Chair's prodigality of praise for the lecturer. raised the expectations of the audience to a high altitude. and therefore when Herr Oppenheimer ascended the platform he was greeted with a round of applause. The orator bowed condescendingly in acknowledgment of the salute, and said he was convinced. from the reception accorded him, that all present did not regard him as an unkempt pirate, as THE TRUTH SEEKER's reporter had so unjustifiably described him. Mr. Oppenheimer intimated that he was prepared to enter a contest of beauty with his critic. As for his German accent. he couldn't help that, having been born in a country where that accent is quite marked; but he believed he could speak English a good deal better than the reporter could speak German. The orator seemed to hav the sympathy of the audience the same being evinced by hearty applause every time he gave the badge pin man an unusually hard jab

When Herr Oppenheimer had said all he had to say on the foregoing subject, he tackled his lecture on Socialism. The following is about what he said:

Karl Marx was the Darwin of political economy, and his name represents the idea of evolution in that domain. Nobody can speak of political economy without mentioning his work "Das Kapital." published in 1867, in which he destroyed the fallacies of the present system, and laid bare the sores on the body politic. He showed how the few are robbing the many, and appropriating their earnings; how chattel slavery was succeeded by serfdom, and the latter in turn by industrial bondage; how factories and the means of production in the hands of monopoly reduce the workers to freedom only in name and to slavery in fact. Depravity and vice are the inevitable results.

As a substitute for this system Marx proposes Socialism or universal co-operation. Some may say, "You foreigners are not needed. We hav a domestic remedy. Henry George's land nationalization is the great panacea." But Henry George's scheme of land nationalization is not original with him The doctrin was put forth by a German professor of political economy in 1878 [sic] before "Progress and Poverty" was written. His books, in which he devotes three pages to consideration of the scheme. hav laid unread in the Astor Library for ten years. So Mr. George's doctrins are not patentable. But something more radical than land nationalization is needed. The government should own the railroads, the telegraphs, and the mines—take them just as they are now organized, and eliminate the profits of the greedy capitalists. Laborers will then be the servants of their fellow-citizens instead of Mammon. Socialism is democratic. and the people can at any moment recall any person who betrays his trust in office. Values would be fixed by the cost of production, which a central bureau of information would keep apprized of and publish daily. There would be no overproduction. Children will not labor under the slave yoke of wages; every man will hav to work. and none will be allowed to fatten on vested rights. There will be libraries accessible to all, hospitals, houses of refuge. and infirmaries for the aged. We may paint the future in all the glowing colors of the imagination. but anything our fancy can suggest must fall far short of the actual under the reign of Socialism. Our present system must take its place among the curiosities of the museum.

Mr. Wakeman maintained that the lecture had fulfilled his expectations, and was now open to discussion in speeches of ten minutes each.

Mr. Sutherland arose to inquire if there would be wages under Socialism. Herr Oppenheimer arose to reply that the abolition of the wage system was what Socialism aims at.

Dr. Weeks predicted the ultimate adoption of such a system as the lectured had outlined, but he didn't think Herr Oppenheimer should sneer at Henry George. He believed Oppenheimer had more pride in maintaining his own position than zeal for the truth. The first great divine commandment is, "Root, hog. or die." And the second is like unto it, which is, "Giv every hog a chance to root." Henry George's theory offers us all a chance to root. Others may hav mentioned the theory of land nationalization, but George had popularized it, and his books hadn't laid ten years unread in the Astor Library, either, but were known all over the world.

Following Dr. Weeks's remarks came what was beyond dispute the speech of the evening. It was made by Captain Clark, a man of varied experience on land and sea, and who has the advantage of being able to fortify his opinions by observations taken in all parts of the world, civilized and barbarous. In a few well chosen words Captain Clark thanked the writer of these reports for the cordial invitation to return which had been extended to him. Reference was then made to the lecture. Captain Clark said that when he joined the Liberal Club, and began boring the audience in afflictions of ten minutes each. he did not know it was a Socialistic camp. He had a dream the other night to the effect that the devil came on earth, and Herr Most took him to the Liberal Club to hear a lecture on Socialism, and upon going back below he assured his guide that there would soon be as big a hell on earth as there was now in his domain. "Somebody," said the captain, "has suggested that the Socialists follow the example of the Pilgrims, and go to some foreign shore. Why don't they do it? For the reason that Socialists can not exist apart from those who are not Socialists. They are parasites. Uncle Sam is a sleeping lion, but it won't do for you Socialists to rile him too much, or he will strike back, and when he does strike, he will utterly spifficate you. What do discussions on Socialism amount to? A distinguished lecturer says tweedle dum. Then a distinguished critic says tweedle-dee; whereupon the distinguished lecturer replies that, in reference to the remarks of his distinguished critic, he would say that with a slight modification there really is no difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee." Captain Clark's address caused much merriment, and he said he was glad to furnish the club with amusement, which was a thundering sight more than most of the speakers did. The captain is rapidly improving as an orator, and keeps his course a good deal better than he used to.

Colonel Hinton opened his address with the remark (referring to the previous speaker) that it was idle to answer a fool according to his folly. The colonel further said Captain Clark, in going all over the world, had demonstrated that no matter how far an ass travels, he will never come back a horse.

Dr. Eccles regretted the turn affairs had taken. The question should be discussed calmly. In his opinion the lecture was merely palaver. Socialists theorize, but always avoid placing cause and effect side by side. They are dreamers. You hear the same sort of talk in the asylums. Insane people are apt to be logical. but they are afflicted with a lesion of the brain. Dr. Eccles welcomed Socialism as the redemption from the curse of Henry George. It was the case of one poison antidoting another.

Lawyer Searing quoted some poetry from Goethe for the benefit of the writer of these lines, and then Mr. Oppenheimer closed the debate.

A Party at Colonel Ingersoll's.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll and his wife celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding Sunday night, the 13th—not formally, but most delightfully. Not caring to hav any of the timeworn and troublesome silver wedding foolishness, they told no one until their friends had all assembled, and then the happy tale was passed from one to another, merely as an interesting fact, not as an announcement of great importance.

It is generally understood among their friends that the Ingersolls will be at home on Sunday evening. They liv on Fifth avenue, a few squares below Twenty-third street. The location is central, and the hospitality is of the most natural and friendly order. The result is, a company of the most interesting men and women in New York drop in on them. No formal invitations are sent. Every friend who chooses to go is welcome, and one friend can introduce another. Some go first to church, and then, by way of refreshing contrast, go to Colonel Ingersoll's and breathe the fascinating air of Infidelity. Mrs. Ingersoll is a handsome lady, who makes everyone who enters her house feel that he is very welcome. In appearance she is a regal Roman matron, handsome enough to be a striking figure anywhere. In manner she is as gracious and kind as hostess can be. And the two daughters—I hesitate to speak of them as beautiful, because that word doesn't mean anything any more when applied to young ladies. But they are beauties, of the sweetest types of beauty—the beauty of soul as well as person. Somebody has said that in a family sons are like cedars of Lebanon, but daughters are like roses of Sharon. Never anywhere hav I seen daughters who more thoroughly resembled "roses of Sharon" than these. I heard a guest say to one of them,

"You hav no brothers?"

"No," she answered, "no brothers;" and her tone didn't indicate any regret whatever.

"Well," said the questioner, "your father is boy enough for one family."

"Yes," she answered, "we don't need any brothers."

One feels at once that this is a house without any shams. Everything is genuin. There is no pretension before the world of what does not exist. The atmosphere of harmony is so contagious that it takes hold of the guests, and in a little while they are moving about and chatting together in the most comfortable way, exactly as though they had known each other all their lives. Everyone who has ever entertained knows that it takes extraordinarily natural entertainers to make guests feel so much at home.

The great Infidel moves about among his friends like a big boy who is delighted to see them, and has something pleasant to say to each one. There is no studied attempt at entertaining. It is all quite like "home folk." And it is home folk ways, for the Ingersolls liv in the very arms of the public, as it were. Their big house is always full of people; their family includes an enormous number of friends.

Whom does one see at the Ingersolls' on Sunday evening? Here is a well-known western politician, a good-looking, bright minded man in the middle of life, and in the heart of success. Over there is Mrs. Croly (Jenny June), whom everybody likes because she has a really kind heart, and likes to see all get on and be happy. And not far from her is Miss Helen Gardener, who lectures on the same unorthodox topics that the great colonel handles so eloquently. He introduces her to her audiences in this city frequently. She is a pretty, petite, girlish-looking lady, whom nobody would suspect of holding opinions so ponderous, and launching them so courageously at the public. She writes books worthy of the biggest-brained man and the most radical in America, but she doesn't look it. To the right, talking music with a lady who adores it, is a California journalist, good-looking and exceedingly graceful as to tongue. The stout man with the longish curly hair is Harry Hilliard, artist, whom all the world knows of. Three or four professional singers are scattered about—tenors, contraltos, and sopranos. They sing at fitful intervals when solicited. Pianists of high degree are also to be seen. Here a journalist. The tall form of Allen Thorndyke Rice flits about a brief hour, and vanishes. Harry Edwards, of Wallacks, and his wife, beam upon the company. Mr. Edwards is a perennial beamer. Like Ingersoll himself, he will never be old, because he has a strong grip on the interests of life. Colonels, judges, and other title-wearers are numerous, but they all forget to be stilted at Ingersoll's. Any affected dignity falls away from them as a garment. The air of the house doesn't encourage it. Poets are there, and enter into the heartiness of the occasion so much that they forget to be jealous of each other.

We were all invited to be sure to be present when the golden wedding was to be honored, and even the diamond wedding, which the cherubic colonel assured us he intended to remain here to be on hand to celebrate, and we all wished that he would be.

Names Wanted.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send us the names of all their friends who are Liberally inclined, so that they may receive a sample copy of this paper? We desire to largely increase the subscription list, and shall be grateful for all aid extended.

If our present subscribers would mention to their Liberal friends that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper to subscribe for, it might be the means of materially helping us.

Lectures and Meetings.

WE are informed that a series of essays or lectures, on religious, moral, and social subjects, from a scientific point of view, by Mr. John Lord Peck, is to be given at the rooms, Number 28 Lafayette Place, on Sunday afternoons, at 3 o'clock, during the next two months, commencing February 27th.

DR. J. L. YORK, whom the Californian papers call the celebrated orator of the West, has plunged into his work again with his usual vigor and eloquence. On the 13th inst. he began a four weeks' course of lectures at Los Angeles, Cal., at the completion of which he will go to San Bernardino, Anaheim, Santa Ana, and San Diego. About May 10th he will start East, stopping at Salt Lake, Denver, and other prominent points on the line, wherever Liberals giv him encouragement, for a night or a week, as required. As his terms are reasonable, we advise those desiring lectures in their towns to write him at once at San José, Cal. The doctor's wife will accompany him East.

FOR striking the happy medium and pleasing all while displeasing none, the Cass County Leader, of Belton, Mo., is entitled to the contents of the pastry-shop for the following report of one of S. P. Putnam's lectures: "The lecture delivered at this place Tuesday night by the Freethinker, Samuel P. Putnam, of New York, was pronounced a very able effort by those with whom that belief obtains. Of course there were those present who did not think the lecture very argumentativ because it was not in the nature of their views to do so. Upon the whole, we suppose Mr. Putnam fulfilled the mission of his visit here in delivering to the disciples of Atheism a discourse upon their theory of the mission of man on earth, where he begins and where he ends. We think that every man should be entitled to his belief, whether Christian or Atheist, and be respected in it as long as he does not obtrude his opinions in an obnoxious way upon people who hav different convictions. Some men are Atheists because they cannot see and understand why they should be Christians, and on the other hand, the many are Christians because they cannot believe otherwise, and are heartily glad of it."
